Fair Housing Commission Should Go To Voters

Since July of last year, Burlington Mayor Gordon Paquette's Housing Task Force—a working coalition of landlords,tenants and city planners—have been working on a system of efficient, equitable redress of landlord-tenant grievences. But last week its hard fought effort fell short of its mark when Burlington's Board of Aldermen decided not to include their proposal of a Fair Housing Commission on the March 4 ballot.

The dissenting Aldermen's arguments against the proposal varied. Two Board members said they had not been given enough time to consider the plan, even though Chairman Joyce Desautels served on the Task Force for several months.

Another Alderman said that the power to legislate on all city matters, including laws pertaining to rental practices and rates, must remain the Aldermen's alone, that such a Commission would pre-empt the Board's legislative prerogative.

One of the Alderman argued that rate adjustment and the collection of rents by a Fair Housing Commission would infringe on the rights of the private sector.

Tenant spokesman Seth Lipschutz of PACT and Task Force director Alan Hunt explained to the board that the landlord-tenant interests and concerns had "never been closer together." They advised the Board to include the proposal on the ballot. Otherwise, they said, the matter would inevitably be pursued in the form of a special election, with a proposal void of consensus, one that might be much more difficult to implement.

The Cynic stands behind the Task Force proposal of a Burlington Fair Housing Commission and its inclusion on the March 4 city ballot. The voters must be allowed to decide whether or not the City of Burlington needs such a Commission. In the past ten years, student demand for housing has tripled. Meanwhile an inelastic supply of apartments have allowed Burlington landlords rent charges far and above a reasonable rate. Landlords, too need an arbitor. Students renting apartments have caused heavy damage to landlord's property, and instances of non-payment or fraud are common.

A Burlington Fair Housing Commission Would provide an equitable process for settlement of landlord-tenant disputes.

Letters to the Editor

Does UVM Support Human Rights?

To the Editor:

Last semester the UVM Trustees had the opportunity to set a standard: to provide an example of corporate responsibility to the University community. But by a 7 to 1 vote the Investment Committee rejected a resolution submitted by the Investment Advisory Committee (made up of students, trustees, and faculty) titled a "Resolution regarding certain corporations that are suppliers to the South African military and police." It called for UVM to "seek to exercise its rights as a shareholder in corporations that sell military equipment and supplies of a strategic nature directly or through their subsidiaries to the South African polices and military forces."

Existing United States law prohibits U.S. corporations from selling supplies to the South African military or police. Unfortunately, U.S. corporations get around this by using their South African subsidiaries to do their work. It is the South African military and police that are the chief enforcers of the apartheid rule in South Africa. Sadly, the UVM trustees felt that as long as U.S. corporations are abiding by U.S. law that everything is okay. (Regardless if the corporations are only getting by due to a loophole). The trustees expressed admiration for U.S. companies and their efforts to improve the situation in South Africa — but did not wish to exercise their rights as stockholders.

Not even UVM student trustee Matt Baratz voted in favor of the resolution — a sad statement since it was the Student Association's resolution on divestiture a while back that got the trustees to consider the issue. After months of work by the Investment Advisory Committee, including effort by UVM Professor Tim Bates, the Investment Committee wasn't even going to second the motion on the resolution, except out of "courtesy" for the Advisory Committee. Profit-minded UVM trustees apparently don't want any human rights issues to interfere with their stock portfolio. In the end, UVM gets its profit, South Africa's minority regime keeps its minority rule, and the student's concerns are forgotten. Worst of all, a chance to plug a loophole in UVM's and the USA's policy was lost.

Neither a Lender Nor a Borrower Be

To the Editor:

Being a UVM student, an avid skier, and a potential season's pass purchaser, I recently was involved in an extremely unpleasant experience which I would like to share with other UVM skiers and potential season's pass purchasers.

One morning after an exceptional snowfall I decided to borrow a friend's season pass at Sugarbush North, just to take a few runs in the morning. I've always considered myself an honest person, and since I was only going to take a few runs I didn't feel it was any serious injustice. After all, the worst that could happen is that my friend's pass would be revoked. Right?

Wrong. All season's pass holders and regular day-ticket holders should know that to lend out your pass or ticket is considered by the Vt. Legislature a crime under the Theft of Service statute. The penalty is a maximum sentence of ten years and a maximum fine of $5,000. So if you think it's expensive to ski, I can assure you it's far more expensive to ski illegally.

A word to the wise is sufficient.

Address Correction

To the Editor:

We greatly appreciate the factual, well written article on genetic counseling which appeared in the Dec. 11th issue of the Cynic. Unfortunately, both the address and phone number of the Genetics Center were omitted. This office, located at A-115 Medical Alumni Bldg., serves as an information and referral center for all of Vermont and for several of the northern counties of N.Y. State. We encourage individuals who are concerned with the possibility of risk of inherited disease to contact us by calling (802) 656-4024. Thank you.

An Unconscionable and Inhumane Act

To the Editor:

On Dec. 28, 1980, I witnessed what I believe to be as unconscionable and inhumane an act as any I have ever seen in my lifetime.

The place was Windham Superior Court in Brattleboro.

A party appeared in Court, unrepresented by an attorney, to tell Superior Court Judge Keyser that her husband, whom she was suing for divorce, had not paid support money, as ordered by the Court, for her and minor child in the past six weeks.

The husband, in Court with his lawyer, gave no reason for his failure to pay as ordered, and was not required to give any reason by Judge Keyser.

The Judge, who had issued the support Order, knew that the woman and child had no other resources to live on except what they received as support from the husband and father.

The woman also told the Judge that lawyers she had contacted to represent her would not be interested to represent her unless she came up with a cash retainer. And because she had no money she was forced to appear in her own behalf. She also told the judge that she did not feel capable of being able to protect her interests in a Court of law, without a lawyer.

If you're wondering whether the husband was too poor to pay the support, take it out of your heads. The husband had testified before Judge Keyser at a previous hearing that his real net personal income was in excess of $96,000.00 (Ninety-six thousand) a year.

The Judge then recessed the hearing to Chambers where a written Order was issued by Judge Keyser.

The order says that the three checks made out by the husband for the past six weeks support of the wife were impounded by the Court and placed in the hands of the Court Clerk to be given as a retainer when the woman hired a lawyer.

Judge Keyser also imposed a penalty on the woman, to be paid to the husband for the expenses and legal costs to appear in Court with a lawyer, without considering that it was the husband who had disobeyed the Court Order in the first place. Judge Keyser ordered that the penalty be paid to the husband in the form of deducting half of the next two months support payments..

The husband has departed for a vacation in sunny California for the Yuletide holiday. Judge Keyser, presumably, will be enjoying the good cheer and comforts of his home in heavenly peace. The woman and child are wondering how they will survive the Vermont winter. The winter slowly grinds on.

Inside the Press -
Media Needs to Learn Restraint

By Sarah Bailey

The last week has been filled with celebration and rejoicing with the return of 52 Americans held against their will in Iran for fourteen months. No issue since Vietnam has captivated the nation – and the American press – as much as the confusion and uncertainty has in this chess game involving American pawns.

They are home, thank God, and what is now left is for those people and their families to put their lives back together again. Perhaps it is also time for the American press to look back and reflect on how they behaved and, I hope, realize the mistakes they made along the way.

The American media has always prided itself on being the first with the news. They try to be on top of things, the first to know, and thus be informers for the American people. But in their eagerness to "get a good story" during the Iranian crisis, they invaded the privacy of the hostages' families, people who had enough on their minds already.

As I watched the live coverage of the arrival of the hostage plane in Algiers, there was a sense of overwhelming relief that the entire ordeal was over and no last minute snag had fouled things up. Those feelings turned to intense anger, however, as the networks switched to the various homes of hostages' families.

The cameras showed groups of people, all hoping and praying that their husband or son or daughter was really on that plane. Yet, not only did they have to deal with the uncertainty of whether the ordeal was really over or not, they also had to contend with television lights, microphones, and inane questions from reporters who could normally be considered intelligent.

The scene was like something out of a Doonesbury cartoon. One understands where G. B. Trudeau got his character of Roland Burton Hedley Jr. The self-important, bumbling idiot was in evidence on all the networks last Tuesday night, repeatedly asking the question, "How will you react when you see your son/husband/etc?"

How did we expect them to react? With relief and joy, of course. No one can predict precisely what one will say in a situation like that, but we all know the general attitude.

The American press should have had the compassion to understand that these people were going through enough hell as it was. At an intensely emotional moment such as this, the reporters should have had the decency to understand that this was a story they didn't need to cover live.

This is not to say that the entire hostage story should have been ignored. It was important for the American people and the families to know that we hadn't forgotten the hostages in Iran, and that the United States government was trying its best to get them home. But it should have been left to the families to decide when, and what, to say.

Louisa Kennedy, one of the hostages' wives, headed up the organization known as FLAG (Family Liaison Action Group). By doing so, she accepted the challenge of dealing with the fuss and bother that the press so easily creates. But other people really wanted to be left alone, to deal with their fears privately. The son of one of the hostages managed to keep his identity quiet for a very long time, in order to keep his life a little more sane. But, when he voluntarily chose to speak publicly, he began to receive similar treatment from the media.

It must have been very hard, almost impossible, for family members to answer ringing telephones and doorbells, only to find yet another newsperson shoving a microphone into their face asking what they felt the latest developments meant. Or trying to celebrate Christmas and having to open presents and go to church – which are very personal acts – with kleig lights shining in their faces.

No one would argue that this was a very difficult story for the media to approach. There is always a fine line between getting an important story and harassing people.

But the discrepency here is that so much of this "important story" was filler, especially in the television field. The first few nights of ABC's NightLine, immediately after the embassy takeover, were informative and well produced. However, as solid news became scarce, it quickly degenerated into repetitive, non-vital information and conjecture.

The Neilson ratings on hostage stories were high, and the TV media enjoyed having "exclusive" stories. But in their quest to get more information than other news agencies, they turned to the only available sources – again the families.

Understandably, government officials were keeping quiet much of the time. When there is no solid information, it is damaging to publish conjecture. In dealing with the often erratic and unstable Iranian government, publishing rumors could be detrimental to the ultimate goal of release.

But these public informers had to have some grist for the mill. Therefore, they turned to some of the victims, and attempted to extract any gleaning of information – no matter how irrelevant – to fill their newspaper columns or their television time.

God willing, such a situation will never have to occur again. If it does, I only hope the American press can be as compassionate as it is eager for a story.

Media's Top 10 Phenomenonsense

By Mike Hambly

At the outset of a new year it's common to see "10 best" or "10 worst" lists of the previous year. In that vein, I've chosen several losers in the news as well as outstandingly bad phenomena in the media, worthy of the following "Booby Prizes for 1980."

1. The "I Was a Teenage Werewolf" award for worst film of the year goes to that celluloid sleaze, The Blue Lagoon. It was a strange mixture of children's story and porno flick – sort of an X-rated version of Hansel and Gretel. Lagoon's promoters had the chautzpah to place ads in Reader's Digest and Parents' Magazine, advising mothers to take their kids to view a tale of "natural love." Brooke Shields continues to be the most sexploited commodity in Hollywood (notorious for her Calvin Klein come-ons). Her mother made sure she had a sexual stunt-woman stand in for her in the clinches with co-star Chris Atkin, though. To show just how awful it was, I cite this example of the film's most poignant dialogue: Brooke to Chris: "I saw you playing with your thing." I rest my case.

2. A Republican joke last fall went this way: Who has the two biggest boobs in the world? A: Miss Lillian... their names are Billy and Jimmy. "Schlemiel of the Year" Billy Carter was exposed last summer as a dupe of Libya, and the resulting flap left the administration on the defensive for months. While testifying before a Senate committee, he exclaimed, "Billy Carter is not a 'buffoon,' a 'boob' or a 'wacko'." Sure... and chickens have lips.

3. The "I'm Glad I Didn't Say That" award goes to NBC News correspondent Tom Pettit. The morning after George Bush's upset win in the Iowa caucuses, Pettit opined authoritatively that politically "Ronald Reagan is dead." He was no better at predicting the presidential contest than the National Enquirer's stable of "psychics." To a seer, they foresaw a Teddy Kennedy landslide.

4. The "Next Time Try Pepto-Bismol" award was earned by Roberto Duran in his rematch with Sugar Ray Leonard. Much touted as boxing's "macho man," he turned out to be a petulent paper tiger. The 7-Up people quickly withdrew their ads featuring Duran. Who knows? Perhaps it was an excess of the Un-Cola that caused his fateful intestinal gas. Another big loser in the ring was Muhammad Ali, who seemed to "sting like a butterfly, float like a tree" in his pathetic comeback attempt against Larry Holmes.

5. The "Why So Tense?" prize is appropriate for Jimmy Carter, whose wooden performance in his debate with media-wise Ronald Reagan cost him millions of votes. His inane remark that implied his prepubescent daughter was an expert on nuclear disarmament (later parodied by Johnny Carson, Roger Staubach, and Bob Hope), was typical.

6. The "That's Abominable" award is bestowed on those distorted "reality programming" shows – That's Incredible and Real People. Perhaps the shows' producers got the idea from the Howard Beale Show in the movie Network. Andy Warhol once said that celebrity in the current sense will become obsolete – each person in America will be a TV star for 15 minutes, due to the medium's insatiable appetite for material. These shows make Warhol look prescient. I suppose segments depicting daredevils fracturing bones on motorcycles and burning in tunnels of fire appeal to those who slow down to look at car accidents. Even more obnoxious is the hosts' habit of constantly introducing each other.

7. "Come Hell or High Lava" kudos go to octagenarian Harry Truman, who refused to budge from his homestead near Mt. St. Helens. He told would-be rescuers, "If the mountain goes, I'm gonna stay right here and say, 'You old bastard'." He is now part of an igneous rock formation in southern Washington state.

8. The "Frankly My Dear..." award is bestowed upon those who hyped the shooting of J.R. Ewing. Big deal. So it was Bing Crosby's daughter that tried to murder the "I Dream of Jeannie" refugee. If this country spent less time and energy worrying about such fictional felonies and more trying to prevent criminal phenomena like Mark David Chapman, we'd all be better off.

9. "Dumbest Ad of the Year" was the one for Hertz that showed O.J. Simpson soaring through an airport to a rented car. This begs the question "If a person had the power of flight, why would he need to use planes and autos for his transportation?" Runner-up was the ad featuring a frump incapable of lifting a frypan until given Anacin on hidden camera.

10. The "R.I.P. and Good Riddance" prize goes to disco "music" whose on-going demise is welcomed by music lovers everywhere. This "disco apocalypse" is signified by the decline of groups like the "Village People." These macho musicians got their start in gay bars on Long Island, yet in the film on their origins "Can't Stop the Music" they neglected this fact. The movie played to empty houses for a week or so before being yanked from distribution. Another flick in the disco genre was Xanadu, the story of a heavenly inspired discotheque. Word of mouth killed this one too. Some would say rumors of disco's demise are premature, that it's not quite dead yet. Well,... I guess there are still some mood rings and pet rocks around, too.

COMMENTARY

Are the Commies Really Afraid?

By Luke Albee

This past year has seen a rebirth of the Cold War and a resurfacing of Cold Warriors, many of whom are now poised to take over key positions in our government. These Cold-Warriors have ridden into Washington on an anti-communist tide, which began with the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and continues as they appear ready to march on strife-ridden Poland.

Yet there is another side to this Cold War, one that we Americans rarely think about. In the last twelve months, America has acted in ways which have undoubtedly exacerbated this dangerous situation. Our actions have puzzled and terrified the Soviets to a point where cooperation and trust is no longer a feasible option for them.

The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan was hailed by President Carter as "the greatest threat to world peace since World War II." In fact, many Americans believed him. Pictures of Soviet tanks ruthlessly destroying people and towns did wonders for the saber-rattlers in Washington. Yet how many people remember what happened in the Dominican Republic in 1965? In that year, President Johnson sent in the Marines to prop up a faltering puppet regime. Without military aid, this regime would have been replaced by a government which would not have catered to American interests. Granted, many of us were not old enough to understand or care, but try to imagine a portly Politburo member ambling out to the Kremlin rose garden and announcing that the American excursion into the Dominican Republic was the greatest threat to world peace since World War II. The World would have laughed. The reason it didn't happen was that they respected, and we expected them to respect, our sphere of influence.

Is Afghanistan really different? The only thing the grain embargo and the Olympic boycott ensured was greater world instability and a fatter hand-out to the boys in the Pentagon.

Presidential Directive 59 is a measure announced by Carter in the heat of the campaign that will drastically alter the nuclear balance that has existed between the two super-powers. Until this directive, our safety rested on a concept known as Mutually Assured Destruction (M.A.D.). Put simply, M.A.D. rested on the premise that neither country protected their cities from nuclear attack. One country realized that even if it launched a pre-emptive nuclear attack, it would still be vulnerable to a counter-attack that would kill millions of its own people. It was a logical, if somewhat crazy, concept.

Presidential Directive 59 has retargeted our nuclear weapons away from Soviet cities and pointed them at their weapon systems. This fact does not seem to ruffle many people because, after all, we know we would never launch a surprise attack on the Soviet Union. But turn the tables. Pretend it was the Soviet Union that had retargeted their missiles, and that theirs were now aimed at our I.C.B.M. silos in North Dakota and the Strategic Air Command in Omaha. Would we be so sure that those evil Communists weren't planning a sneak attack that would leave us all defenseless, if not dead?

The point is that the leaders of the Soviet Union are as paranoid about our actions as we are about theirs. President Carter's attempt to garner conservative votes by standing up to the Russians did not work. Instead, it has encouraged the build-up of new weapon systems, increased the plausibility of a limited nuclear exchange, and seriously jolted an already precarious nuclear balance.

The issue Cold Warriors have embraced in their quest for power is the complete rejection of S.A.L.T. II. This treaty, as Charles Percy recently stated, is "dead as a doornail." Six long years of negotiations have been cast aside because the result, they say, would heavily favor the Soviet Union.

I find this claim particularly hard to understand. Even by an arch conservative, S.A.L.T. II could be convincingly defended. It allows for both the MX missile system, and the deployment of our new super-weapon, the cruise missile. Furthermore, if the Soviet Inter-Continental Ballistic Missiles are not limited as they would be under S.A.L.T. II, the Soviet Union would have enough of these missiles to knock out the MX system once it is complete. In other words, without S.A.L.T. II, the MX is worthless.

Why don't the Cold Warriors endorse S.A.L.T. II? Many claim that the treaty leaves our land based missiles vulnerable. This claim, regardless of its validity, is irrelevant. The majority of America's nuclear strength lies in our submarines and on our bombers. Those would certainly remain invulnerable under S.A.L.T. II.

The real reason this treaty has died is the effect of the American election. Politicians find it much easier to say, "The Communists will melt our children with their diabolitical weapons unless we rip up S.A.L.T. II and arm to the gills," rather than, "We as Americans must conserve energy, or must cure inflation," etc.

The Cold War has been reborn. Jimmy Carter, with his eyes glued to the polls, contributed a great deal to this rebirth. And the future looks worse. Secretary of Defense-designate Weinberger announced that future arms control talks will be based on the behavior of the Soviet Union, which implies we are doing the Russians a favor by negotiating with them. Is this not the same man who served under Richard Nixon when Nixon gave the order to mine the North Vietnamese harbors shortly before embarking on an historic trip to the Soviet Union? As usual, we judge our behavior by one standard, and the behavior of the Soviet Union by another.

All the aforementioned events lead to the conclusion that it is impossible for the Soviet Union to trust the instigators of American foreign policy. The result of all of this may well be catastrophic.

U.S. Support In El Salvador: a Paradox of Ethics

By Maggie Hayes

On March 24, 1980, Archbishop Rimero was gunned down as he celebrated Mass in the Latin American country of El Salvador. Rimero was the outspoken critic who dared to speak out against El Salvador's military government, which oppresses the people of El Salvador. He was assassinated after his appeal to the National Guard to cease their violent acts against their own countrymen.

Why is this such a concern to me as a United States citizen? I am deeply concerned and horrified that my country sends military aid to such a violent and repressive military junta led by President Napoleon Duarte. This money is "unstructured aid" which is used for training and supplying the military.

El Salvador's history is one of repression, where living is barely possible under the corrupt powers of the government. In response to this repressive institution, the people of El Salvador have risen to form a broad coalition, the Revolutionary Democratic Front. U.S. media describe the R.D.F. as a few "terrorists" and "extremists." In actuality, this liberation movement is comprised of 80% of El Salvador's population, some of its aristocracy, and the non-violent support of the Catholic church – hardly a minority.

The Revolutionary Front has resorted to violence because it has found no other way to gain basic human rights for the people of El Salvador. In El Salvador, where 21% of the people are landless earning $88 a year, where the average McDonald's employee brings home two to six dollars a day (while the produce is sold at American prices), where the people live in terror of the "death squads" that rampage the villages committing brutal murders, the people have reached the point where they must take the offensive in order to create a humane government.

In spite of atrocities inflicted upon the people of El Salvador, the United States government continues to send military aid to the regime. On December 16, 1980, the United States granted El Salvador $20 million with a further $45.4 million two days later. This brings our total economic aid for 1980 to 150 million dollars! $150 million to shoot down innocent people in the street, to train young men to become murderers, to kill four American missionaries who were working among the poor.

Why do we do this? One reason cited is that through our aid, we are protecting the country from the onslaught of communism. But once again, our fear of communism blinds us to the brutal reality of what is really happening in El Salvador. The United States economic interest in this tiny country is the real reason for our support of the regime. For example, we send clothing to El Salvador to be sewn together by factory workers, who earn three dollars a day. It is then shipped back to the United States and sold at retail prices. Meanwhile, El Salvador poses no exporting charges on the merchandise. Of course, the United States would not risk losing this benefit by stopping military aid. So it supports a corrupt and inhumane government in order to make a profit, at the expense of human lives.

It is our duty as humane people to insist that we withdraw aid to El Salvador. Recently, 15,000 American citizens joined in an ecumenical service in Washington, D.C. to commemorate the ten thousand killed in El Salvador, and to demand an end to United States intervention. Burlington, too, has participated this past week in protest of the affairs in El Salvador. On January 17th, the Burlington Peace Coalition, the Sisters' Senate, and the National Assembly of Women Religions sponsored an educational night, which included a film, "El Salvador: A Country in Crisis" and a lecture by Mary Knoll Sister Helen Carpenter. Activities included a memorial service at the Unitarian Church in memory of the four American missionaries, followed by a march down Church Street. Petitions were presented to the Vermont Congressional Delegation appealing to President Reagan to stop all military aid.

We, as citizens who believe in the basic human rights of people, must demand that United States military aid to El Salvador cease. Be aware that the United States has ignored the United Nations condemnation of the repression in El Salvador. The UN states:

"Expresses its deep concern at the grave violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador... Calls on Governments to refrain from the supply of arms and other military assistance to El Salvador in the current circumstances..."

Report to the President 2000 Global

Entering the Twenty-First Century

By Hart Van Denburg

"Environmental problems do not stop at national boundaries. In the past decade, we and other nations have come to recognize the urgency of international efforts to protect our common environment."

Those words, spoken by President Carter in his environmental message to Congress in May, 1977, resulted in an Executive Order directing the Council on Environmental Quality to prepare The Global 2000 Report to the President. The report was released in November of last year.

In the words of the former president again, "...the study is to serve as a foundation for our longer term planning." As such, it should not be seen as definitive work, but rather as a volume to be used in conjunction with other global surveys.

If you are looking for some good news during these times of environmental hazard, threat of war, economic doubt, and generally confusing political attitudes, this report is not the kind of thing you ought to be reading. Intended to "...develop trend projections using, to the fullest extent possible, the long-term global data and models routinely employed by the Federal Agencies," this report shows page after page of very sobering and at times frightening facts and figures.

Global 2000, so named because it sets out to predict what life will be like as we enter the 21st century, rests its projections on three major assumptions. The first is that public policies relating to population control, natural resource conservation, and environmental protection will all continue in their present form. Secondly, the report assumes that our rapid rate of technological development will continue, as will social adaptation to these new technologies. Third, the authors operate under the premise that there will be no major disruptions of international trade or economic relations as the result of political tensions, and possibly war.

These are almost utopian outlooks. Yet the report could only be valid within these guidelines. There would be too many variables involved in assembling the data otherwise.

The rich get richer.

The Global report used the Gross National Product, GNP, as an indicator of the way they expect an individual's quality of life to shape up by the year 2000.

Although a "rough and inadequate" indicator, the world's output of goods and services is expected to rise by an average of 145 percent by 2000. But the unequal distribution of the benefits between the industrialized nations and the lesser developed countries (LDCs) is striking.

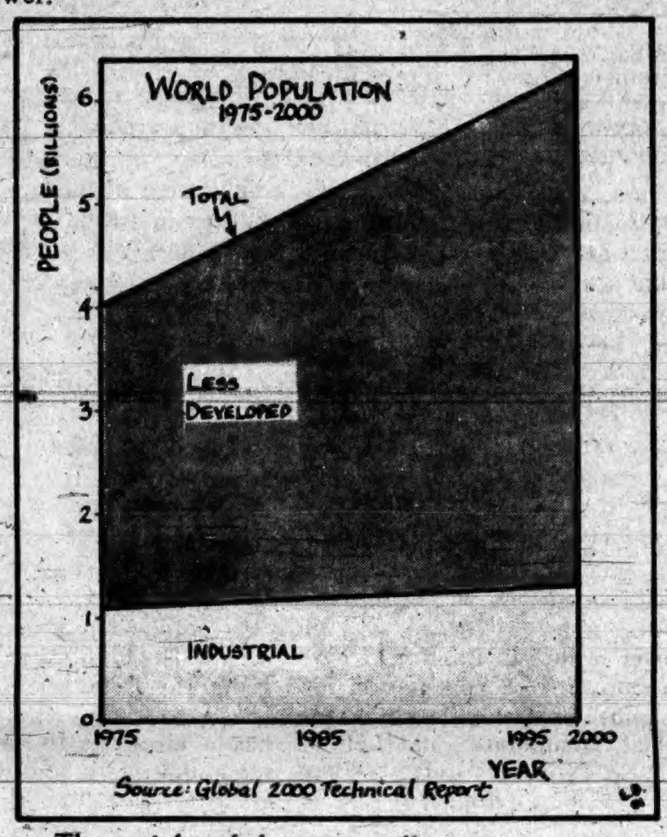
By 2000, the industrialized nations of the west are expected to have an average GNP of $8,500 per capita, while the LDCs will only be at around $600 per capita. That works out to be a ratio of approximately 1:20, or for every $1 made by an LDC, $20 will be made by an industrialized nation. The report is quick to point out, though, that the LDCs will at least be able to report that their economies did grow.

The population growth projections are perhaps the most worrying figures in Global 2000. A worldwide population increase of 55 percent is being predicted, with 95 percent of this growth taking place in the LDCs. To put this in practical terms, Mexico City by 2000 will have a population of more than 30 million. That is three times the size of the New York metropolitan area today. And many other LDC countries will have urban areas of more than 29 million, with a majority of the people living in what the report calls "uncontrolled settlements," better known as shanty towns and slums. Global points out that "the only thing that will slow the growth" of LDC cities "is lack of food, poor housing, and disease."

Tightening our belts

Food production is expected to increase by 90 percent before 2000, but the ways in which the increase will take place are in conflict with the needs of our ecosystems. Higher use of pesticides is predicted, especially in the lesser developed countries, where pesticide use is expected to quadruple. High technology ought to aid in raising outputs, as will the breeding of higher-yielding strains of crops. But the increased tendency towards monoculture with these high yield strains will increase the chances of being vulnerable to drought and crop failure.

As with so many facets of modern day economics, the cost of producing food will be highly affected by the rise in price of oil, since so many fertilizers are petroleum based. So, although there will be a 90 percent increase in food production, this will be accompanied by a 95 percent price rise. A quick glance at the future economies of the LDCs shows us that they simply will not be able to afford the necessary foodstuffs for their people.



As it is, LDCs have an average caloric intake of only 94 percent of the minimum recommended by the Food and Agriculture Organization. By 2000, North Africa, Central Africa, and the Middle East will not even have enough food to let their children reach normal body weight.

The World Bank prophecy is even more grim. "Malnourished people in LDCs could rise in number from around 400 to 600 million in the mid-seventies, to over 1.3 billion by the year 2000."

There is a vicious circle developing here. The United States is expected to increase its role as the breadbasket of the world, yet to do so, it must employ means which will be detrimental to our environment. More monoculture, more fertilizers, and higher technology in harvesting means more food, but at the same time it means more expensive food, more susceptibility to natural disasters, and a more rapid deterioration of our topsoil. To complicate this dilemma even more, the United States must cut its erosion of topsoil in half if it is to reach the kinds of production needed to achieve maximum output.

More Nuclear Energy

There will be no "early relief from the world's energy problems," says the report. Geologists and engineers are projecting petroleum production to peak by the end of the century, and while higher energy costs will encourage the adoption of alternative fuels and technologies, the figures point to increased use of hydro-electric and nuclear power.

The weight of the poor will grow...

Energy demands will go up 58 percent by 2000, and nuclear and hydro power are expected to jump in production 226 percent to meet those needs. This is despite the fact that "...it has not yet been demonstrated that ... wastes from nuclear power can be safely stored and disposed of without incident."

Wood does not seem to be the energy answer. While the supply of most sources of fuel are expected to rise in 2000 with the exception of oil, the supply of wood will drop, and "...the projected shortfall of fuel wood implies that fuel consumption for essential uses will be reduced, deforestation expanded, and wood prices increased."

Other environmental consequences

It would appear that no matter which way one looks at the situation, it is a continuing saga of give and take. In exchange for enough food we are likely to see a higher degree of pesticide use, which leads to more water contamination and disrupted natural lifecycles of countless animals, insects, and plants.

The industrialized nations of the world are expected to use coal as a major energy source of energy. Global 2000 estimates that by the mid-twenty-first century, the Carbon Dioxide content of the air due to increased burning of coal, and the environmental and climatical implications of this, are great, An increased CO_2 layer in the atmosphere will lead to a warming of the earth, an increase in desert regions, a decrease in the size of the polar ice caps, and will affect the current weather trends. Acid rain, a CO_2 derivative, will also increase.

The increased deforestation that is predicted, as well as adding to CO_2 level in the atmosphere, will cause depletion of ground water, topsoil erosion, silting of river-basins, and greater susceptibility to drought and flooding.

The future

We are facing a dilemma. The world's resources are finite, and will be over taxed in an effort to feed and shelter an all too quickly expanding human race. In the process, our natural environment will be the real victim. The world in the year 2000, seen from this vantage point, will be a very different place. According to the Global 2000 Report to the President:

"The time for action to prevent this outcome is running out."

Irish-British Solution Possible, Hume Says

By Jon Goodspeed

Northern Ireland civil rights activist John Hume said Monday that only a change in current British policy, and a Dublin more politically involved with the North, will solve the 300 year old Irish conflict.

The first speaker of the "Leaders and the Led" lecture series, Hume called for discarding the "traditional way of thinking of the Northern and Southern Irish, and of the British." This is not an outdated religious quarrel, he said, but a clash of national identities between two sections of people who share the same island.

Two major groups are at the heart of the conflict. The Unionists are Protestant, loyal British subjects, and in the majority in Northern Ireland. They perceive only a divided Ireland. The Nationalists, on the other hand, are mainly Catholics who desire only a united Ireland. Hume called these groups "exclusivists."

"Each faction is trying to exclude the other," he said, "but you cannot exclude any section of a country, especially if that section is religiously labeled." The volatility of the situation is evident in the 2000 murders that occurred in Ireland just last year.

A change, however, will not be dictated by a compromise between these two groups. "All power resides in London. I have no power of persuasion in Ireland," said this leader of the Social, Democratic, and Labour Party of Northern Ireland. When the British no longer guarantee security over any section of Ireland, changes will be able to occur, he said.

Hume is not calling for a united Ireland completely isolated from Britain, and he does not believe unity in Ireland should "involve a conquest of the North by the South." He envisions a country with a new relationship between the North and the South, as well as a new British link with the North, thereby pleasing the Protestants. The exact nature of these new relationships can only be determined with time.

Hume began his career in the 1960's by protesting for basic civil rights for the Catholic minority in Northern Ireland. These Catholics were left stranded by the existence of a political and religious border.

"In a partition, you always leave some people on the wrong side of the line," said Hume, commenting on the inevitability of sectarianism which develops, as it did in Rhodesia, when two large groups with different religious and social outlooks live in one country.

Today, Hume, a member of the European Parliament, is fighting for Northern Ireland as a minority within the context of Europe. Since World War II, there has been a struggle for a peaceful, united Europe. "This has been successful except in one small corner, where in six small countries a struggle continues," Hume said.

This conflict has taken its toll. Unemployment in Northern Ireland is now 19.6 percent, up eight points since last February. Hume submitted a report to the European Parliament, asking all European countries to join together to relieve Northern Ireland's plight. The Parliament's response is due this February.

Asked if he thought Britain has a more sinister motive for remaining in Ireland, Hume said there is the possibility that if Britain loses Northern Ireland, the two remaining colonial countries, Wales and Scotland, might also decide to leave. With large amounts of oil in Scotland, a cessation from the Union would be catastrophic for Britain. A dependency of the colonies on Britain also exists and Northern Ireland is no exception.

UVM's Natural Areas: To Be or Not To Be?

By Eliot Bergson

The best things in life are free... almost.

Formally recognizing "the growing concern... over the degradation of the natural environment" in a 1974 resolution, UVM's Board of Trustees has accepted over a thousand acres donated by individuals and the Nature Conservancy for its natural area system, "to be preserved... for educational and scientific purposes."

The UVM natural area system is a collection of many unique and diverse ecosystems which serve as invaluable outdoor laboratories for student and faculty research. The top of Mt. Mansfield, the highest elevation in Vermont, contains fragile alpine vegetation, while Molly Bog, a registered National Landmark, is a rare example of early peatland succession. The system also includes Redstone Quarry, used extensively by geology students for field work, and the Four Brothers Islands in Lake Champlain, an important nesting location for thousands of waterfowl.

Six other areas are included in what experts call the best university-owned natural area system in the nation.

But the University has not fully accepted the necessary financial responsibility for the preservation of these valuable educational resources. In the seven years since the passage of the Trustees' resolution, the UVM administration has allocated only $1300 in direct funds to Dr. Carl Reidel, Director of the Environmental Program, for upkeep of the system.

"It's the least-funded natural area system in the country," he said.

Reidel was designated chief administrator of the system with a mandate to perform several tasks "deemed necessary to carry out the intent of the resolution," by the Trustees. These include erecting signs at all entrances and barriers across all access roads, making trail improvements, preventing certain abusive activities in the areas, such as snowmobiling, and "recommending budget appropriations necessary to implement essential management programs."

Reidel has had to resort to the use of volunteer student and teacher help and donated materials to meet the mandate. But the effort is proving futile because Reidel lacks the manpower to properly police the areas.

Reportedly, trails have been destroyed, benches taken, coniferous trees uprooted, fragile vegetation trampled, and markers removed. In addition, trailbikers, and snowmobilers have used Centennial Woods in violation of regulations.

In a letter from Dr. Ann Spearing, an active Committee member, to Dr. Mark Lapping, acting Director of the Environmental Program at the time, dated November 6, 1978, it was pointed out that a keg party of 180 dorm students in Centennial Woods caused damage to trails and vegetation. Reidel also said a student was found living in a tent in Centennial Woods for part of a semester.

Most importantly, critically needed management plans have only been written for three of the ten areas.

Because the funds are not being made available, Reidel claims that the present administration is in violation of the binding Trustees' resolution.

the Natural Areas Advisory Committee (N.A.A.C.), established by Reidel to aid him in administering the system, the University has given them direct funding on two occasions. In 1975, the committee was given a $3,000 Educational Incentive Award, most of which was earmarked for a study of the possibility of establishing a natural history museum on campus. Dr. Thomas Hudspeth, a long-standing Natural Areas Advisory Committee member, said $2000 was spent on the museum study, leaving only $1000 for the maintenance of the natural areas.

The Committee, to this day, does not have a single power tool.

The only other funds given directly to the Committee according to inter-office memos between Committee members and Dr. Arns' office, was $300, used to mend a badly broken fence near Shelburne Pond. The funds barely covered the cost of materials. Volunteer labor and tools were supplied by teachers and students.

Dr. Arns said that the University's budget has been very tight. "It takes a long time to solve problems. We have spent money on the legal aspects and surveying of the system. My instinct is to approve the request (for the coordinator's position)

It's the least funded natural area system in the country.

To solve the problem, Reidel has been requesting a "Natural Areas Coordinator" position for several years, but his budget proposals have been turned down by Dr. Robert Arns, Academic Vice President. Reidel says Arns must make that money available to insure proper management and maintenance of the areas.

"It's up to him to decide that these areas are in fact as valuable as the Trustees say they are," Reidel explained.

According to members of but we must identify the relationship between the educational and scientific scope of the areas."

Reidel has shown the Administration evidence of that relationship for several years, but with few results. In a letter to Arns dated October 17, 1979, Reidel wrote: "these sites are used intensively by a number of instructors, by students for course-related studies and research... and by a broad range

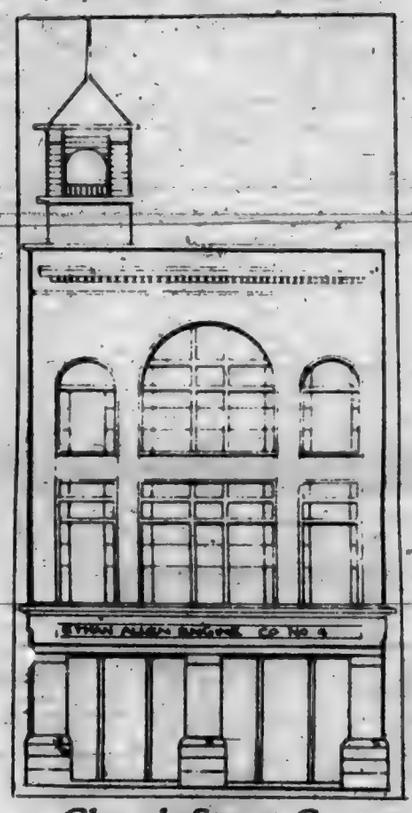
Church St. Center Caters to All Tastes

By Wendy Goodrich

The UVM Church St. Center for Community Education offers a variety of non-credit mini-courses, workshops, and activities for the general public. Established six years ago in the then newly renovated firehouse downtown, the Center is funded by grants from area agencies, public donations, fees charged for mini-courses and workshops, and community participation in activities sponsored by the Center. There are no prerequisites or restrictions on who can register for the courses at the Church St. Center. They are open to anyone interested in attending.

Ann Turkle, Director of the Center, says, "Our goal is to create a University presence in a way a lot of people can relate to. We provide an opportunity for experience that people might not otherwise have access to."



The Center offers an extensive course selection comprised of lecture topics that are interesting, informative, and helpful to people in all walks of life. A few of the special activities sponsored by the Center include "Open Poetry Reading," "Marketplace Art," "Workshops for Women to Succeed in Government Employment," and "China: People to People." They are free to the public. Other mini-courses and workshops, however, require a fee: "Introduction to Stained Glass." "Income Tax Preparation," "Mime," and "Passive Solar Design" are a few examples.

Many of the courses available at the UVM Church St. Center are ones that University students could not find offered on campus. These include "An Introduction to T'AI CHI CHUAN," "Healing with Herbs," "Integrative Massage," "Basic Dog Obedience," "History of Rock Music," "Beginning Mountain Dulcimer," "Beginning Ice Climbing," and overnight cross-country ski trips.

"For students the courses are a change of pace from what they're concentrating most of their time on, and one course, "Outdoor Careers for Women," is particularly useful for people trying to make a decision on their careers," says Ms. Turkle.

The UVM Church St. Center opens its 1981 Winter Session on January 19. It will continue until March 29. The mini-courses and workshops start at different times throughout the season, and most require a fee and registration one day in advance to the start of the course. Typical fees range from $20-$40, and classes usually meet one day a week for a 2-10 week period. The course schedule changes four times a year, and catalogs are available for each quarter's course listings.

Along with the regular courses offered by the Center this season there is also a Winter Festival being held from February 14-22.

Church Street Center

"The Winter Festival is a free sample," Ms. Turkle said. "Activities that normally go on at the Center are demonstrated so people that walk in have a chance to see what is typical here. These activities include art, dance, music, and general classes sponsored by the Center."

Public participation at the UVM Church St. Center has shown that people are interested in what the Center is doing.

"Attendance varies from activity to activity, but we are generally well responded to. We need a minimum of six people in the mini-courses and workshops so that the classes can pay for themselves, but we usually get a good turn-out," Ms. Turkle said.

The staff at the Center is composed of three full-time employees and 13 work-study students from the University. Ms. Turkle emphasizes that the Center is always interested in work-study students. The course ideas and instructors come from a variety of places.

"Sometimes we have University instructors and local craftsmen conduct courses. Many people from the Burlington area just come in and initiate their own programs," Ms. Turkle said. She said occasionally students come in and offer a course. "We've developed our own sense of what's useful to people so that we can then go out and look for someone to provide, and repeatedly provide, other programs. We try to take each course as it comes."

By combining diverse course topic selection, talented instructors and reasonable registration fees, the UVM Church St. Center has embraced community life and appealled to all kinds of people. Ms. Turkle says: "Our success is due to flexibility. We are responsive to people's interests and needs."

Sanders Blasts Paquette; Calls For Tax On UVM

By Richard Hyland

Bernard Sanders, Independent Coalition Candidate for mayor, unveiled his plan for municipal tax reform at a press conference in City Hall earlier this week.

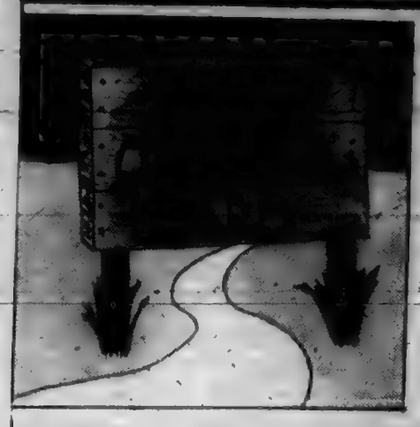
Stating that the people of Burlington "are sick and tired of the same old approach to citywide taxation," Sanders proposed various schemes which he believes would place the burden of taxation more on wealthy individuals, businesses and institutions rather than on low-income property owners.

If elected, Sanders promised that the Burlington business community will be asked to accept a larger share of the city's tax burden.

Citing the generosity of Burlington taxpayers in protecting the downtown business district's interests through municipal financing of the Church St. renovation and Pyramid Mall litigation, Sanders stated it is his hope that businesses will voluntarily view these contributions as "a loan" and not a direct subsidy.

"UVM's 8,000 students, like all citizens, make demands on city services," said Sanders, "and it seems to me long overdue for the University of Vermont to begin making payments to the city for many services rendered."

He referred specifically to the students' annual "Spring Fling" for which extra policemen are needed each year. The candidate pointed out that other college communities such as Orono, Me. and Hanover, N.H., have raised revenue from their local colleges and that an expenditure of $250,000 for UVM would be only ¼ of 1 percent of their total budget.



Sanders also stated that eventually "the property tax must be completely junked as the main support for education and city services." It should, he said, "be replaced by a progressive personal and corporate income tax system which will draw its income from those individuals and institutions best able to pay." The candidate called the present property tax "an extremely regressive system."

"It taxes two homes of equal value at the same rate, regardless of the fact that the home belonging to a wealthy individual may be only one small part of his wealth – while for another individual it may be his total assets," Sanders argued.

He suggested that a city "piggy-back" income tax of 5 percent of Federal taxes for people earning over $25,000 and an 8 percent tax for those earning over $50,000 could gain the city approximately $900,000 in revenues. Moreover, this city income tax would affect only 12 percent of the households in Burlington – the most affluent 12 percent.

Finally, Sanders proposed the possibility of charging a

It's Tax Time

The Internal Revenue Service offers the following reminders to students:

1. You must file a tax return if (a) you had an income of more than $3,300 in 1980 ($5,400 combined, if married) or (b) you had any Federal Income Tax withheld (regardless of income) and you want to get it back.

2. You can, and should, claim yourself even if your parents claim you on their return.

3. Use the peel off label that came with your tax package. If you need to make corrections, do it right on the label. This speeds up processing for a faster refund.

4. Be sure to check your Social Security number on the label, and enter it properly on your tax return.

5. Employers have until January 31 to send you a W-2. If you still haven't received your W-2 by then, contact your employer. If you still don't receive the W-2 within a reasonable period of time, contact the IRS.

6. Make sure that the address on your return is one at which you will receive mail when your refund is due. If you move, file a change of address with the Post Office.

7. Keep a copy of your tax return. You may need it later if, for example, you apply for a grant or scholarship, and it will take six to eight weeks to get a copy of your return from the IRS.

8. All tips are taxable. If you earn tips where you work, keep a record of them. Tips of $20 or more in one month must be reported to your employer each month. For more information, ask the IRS for free publication 531, "Reporting your Tips for Federal Tax Purposes."

For more information on any tax subject, call or visit the IRS. You can call toll-free from any phone in Vermont by dialing 1-800-642-3110. In the Burlington area, call toll-free 1-800-225-0717.

Jeanne Mance Co-op Working

An academic cooperative has been organized on the fifth and sixth floors of the Jeanne Mance Residence Hall. Sixty students living on these two floors make up the first academic cooperative in UVM history.

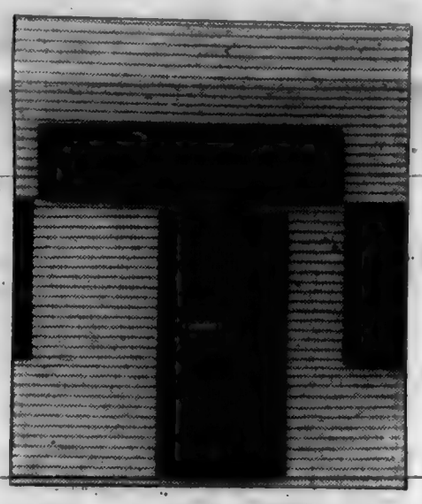
The cooperative concept began last semester when students came to a mutual understanding that from 7 p.m. to 7 a.m., Sunday through Thursday, noise in dorms would be kept to a minimum. Any pent up frustrations accumulated during study hours could be let loose during "Noise Hour," 10 p.m. to 11 p.m. each night.

The quiet hours have been fairly successful. Quite often, faces from the lower floors miraculously appeared in the sixth floor lounge. As one member commented, "I like it. We can study in our rooms, and I've heard you can't in other dorms."

Another successful project in Jeanne Mance is the "course board," which lists the names of students in the dorm who are taking, or have taken, particular courses. A student can now quickly locate a fellow dorm resident with whom he can share his academic frustrations and agonies.

They have established a committee with two chairpersons and a secretary to organize activities. Ideas for the future there include: an "Invite your Advisor" party, wine and cheese parties with deans and professors, special interest panels to discuss career possibilities, and a presentation and slide show by representatives of the Overseas Student Exchange Program.

Overall, residents of Jeanne Mance wish to develop a closer relationship amongst themselves and their faculty and staff in a more informal and relaxed atmosphere.



But they do not wish to confine their activities to the sixty students on the fifth and sixth floors of Jeanne Mance. They invite any and all students and faculty and staff to share in the first Academic Co-op of the University of Vermont.

The Better Alternative Looks Ahead

By Elise Brown
WRUV Public Relations Director

1980 was a good year for WRUV-FM. We won a college radio display contest, published a program guide, organized a Broadcast Lecture Series, and sponsored an Earth Day fundraiser featuring Richie Havens, which netted over $250 for four local community groups.

WRUV had a staff correspondent at several European jazz festivals over the summer, as well as representatives at the Playboy Jazz Festival in Los Angeles and the Newport Jazz Festival at Saratoga, N.Y. WRUV also attended the Jazz Times convention in Washington, D.C., the Heatwave (New Wave) Festival in Toronto, and the National Student Broadcasters Convention in Hartford, Connecticut.

We did phone interviews with Ron Carter, Manhattan Transfer, Bernie Taupin, Jerry Harrison of the Talking Heads, while Livingston Taylor, Chris de Burgh, Taj Mahal, Jimmy Cliff, and even Ted Mondale visited our studios.

WRUV also received valuable publicity. Media blurbs mentioning WRUV were cited in Jet magazine, Billboard, and College Media Journal.

1981 promises even better prospects for the station. A new executive board, elected last month, is busy organizing alternative programming, specials, and events that we hope will bring WRUV increased partnership with the audience it serves. The WRUV Advisory Board, consisting of faculty, student and community members, was implemented in 1980 to help develop long-range planning and program development for the station. It conducted a listener survey during the fall, in which over 400 students and community members responded – with a generally positive outlook towards WRUV's non-commercial programming. The survey gave us a better indication of our audience and its variety of interests.

WRUV must rely on various fund-raising activities to supplement its university sponsorship as a non-profit organization. Funds are constantly needed for equipment maintenance and replacement, phone and correspondence costs, as well as syndicated programming such as "Soundstage" and the "BBC Rock Hour." Current fund-raising plans include a 24-hour Radiothon in February and a benefit at Hunt's March 10 featuring two local bands.

WRUV listeners can look forward to an innovative and diverse programming schedule in 1981. A meeting for students interested in getting involved with any aspect of WRUV's operations will be held Thursday, February 5th, in Billings' Marsh Lounge, or are invited to come by the studios.

Money For Energetic Ideas

The Department of Energy announced January 15 the beginning of the third annual cycle of federal grant awards under the "Appropriate Technology Program for New England." New applications were available on that day.

Regional representative Harold J. Keohane said, "This year's program will provide funding to support energy-related projects using small-scale technologies 'appropriate' to local needs, skills, and available energy resources."

Examples of appropriate technologies are solar applications, use of wood or wood wastes, wind systems, use of geothermal resources, waste heat recovery systems, methane production from organic wastes, small hydroelectric systems, aquaculture systems, solar storage systems, energy conservation measures, integrated systems and cogeneration.

"One of the big attractions of this program," said Keohane, "is that smaller projects are able to get seed money to develop a relatively low-cost energy project and, at the same time, help reduce this nation's dependency on foreign oil."

Keohane said that his office received more than 1600 applications last year. In the final selection, 81 grants were awarded to individuals, non-profit organizations, institutions, state and local agencies, and small businesses.

The AT program, established to promote energy conservation and use of renewable energy resources, is currently funded at $12 million nationwide. The program provides regional grant awards of up to $10,000 for idea development, and up to $50,000 for device development and demonstration projects.

Projects funded last year in New England included a vertical-axis wind energy conversion system, an urban neighborhood solar demonstration, a wood gasifier for auxiliary power and heat, development of a more efficient maple syrup evaporator, a methane generation system from dairy farm wastes, and a solar powered radio station for emergency communications.

Individuals, small businesses, Indian tribes, public interest groups, and state and local agencies are eligible to apply.

To obtain a copy of the Program Announcement and application, or for more information about the program, write Robert Chase, Appropriate Technology Program Manager, U.S. Department of Energy, Region I, 150 Causeway Street, 7th floor, Boston, MA 02114. Or call, toll-free: 1-800-343-6388.

The deadline for filing applications is March 19, 1981. Announcement of grant awards is expected by early fall.

Bars Vie For Weekend Dollar

By Randy Ross

In the interest of every student's quest to cut operating expenses and still stuff his punhim (face), we examined the free assorted culinary delights offered by local bars for the price of a draft. The ideal eating situation would be self-service food (no waitress or server to give you dirty looks while returning for fourth and fifth servings, meanwhile splitting drafts four ways), cheap beer and no waiting lines. No bar offered all of these, but we have compiled here a list of the better deals in town.

Our journey commences at The Windjammer Restaurant. Amongst flora, fauna, and high backed bamboo chairs, we find free self-service cheddar cheese, goldfish crackers, and shrimp and oysters for 25 cents each. The late 20's, early 30's crowd is mellow. We recommend the Jammer for dates and small groups. Crucial stats: draft – 75 cents, no pitchers, gin and tonic – $1.35.

The Holiday Inn, located next door to The Windjammer, is a good place for serious volume consumption. The egg-rolls are put on a table in plain view with its self-service feature: no lines, no grief. The Fox and Hound Lounge offers a good view of the lobby and is inhabited by the hotel crowd – not a good place for obnoxious college kids. Stats: draft – 75 cents, no pitchers, gin and tonic – $1.25. The food, egg-rolls and chicken wings, which lasts until 7:00. Bring your own duck sauce.

Located next to Tech Hifi on Church St., we find the Rusty Scuffer. For an appetizer, this establishment provides a seven inch hunk of pepperoni, accompanied by cheddar cheese and crackers. The entree this week was steamed mussels with drawn butter. If you can ignore the appearance of the mussels, they are quite delicious. Due to this tremendous deal, the crowd is largely collegiate. All food is served by a waitress, so one must order more drinks to obtain seconds. Stats: draft – 75 cents (16 ounces; most drafts are between eight and twelve ounces), double shot drinks – $1.00, bottles of Lowenbrau – 50 cents. The food varies from week to week between mussels and shrimp.

Next stop on our pilgrimage is the early welfare decor of The Chickenbone Cafe, where much of the furniture has been customized by inebriates (chairs with broken slats and human teeth marks). The traditional fare is chili (ground beef and bean medley in a caustic tomato sauce). Due to the crowded "Who Concert" atmosphere, an early entrance is advised. The masses descend upon the waitress with hun-like tenacity so be on your guard and move fast. Stats: pitchers – $1.25.

Churchills, located at the top of Church St., offers cheese and crackers plus chicken wings. Due to the rationing program, this is a difficult place for hungry collegiates. One cook in a white suit distributes the food, two wings per plate. The recommended approach is to snatch three or four plates, explain that they are for your grandmother and that people would be inconvenienced if she lined up in her wheelchair. With their succulent bread coating, the wings are worth the hassle. Stats: draft – 60 cents, no pitchers, double drinks – $1.50. The food, out between five and six, varies between ribs, chili, egg-rolls, wings, and dogs depending on the week. The crowd consists of mainly young nine-to-fivers and some collegiates.

Here is a summarized list of other offers:

The Winding Road

By Sonny Valentine

Our hero, Barry Cutlass, the long-since retired full-time student now devoted to the pursuit of hobbies and fighting evil, once again finds himself in the jaws of danger. Summoned by what he thought was a call from his secretary, Missy Featherdress, Cutlass speeds from his subterranian mansion (with an ocean view) in his customized Camero. While negotiating the cliff side hair pin turns at sixty mph, he notices in his rear view mirror a black, what appears to be, Turbo Saab approaching.

"Mmm... either this guy is in a real hurry or, oh my gosh, it's... Dr. Crimson Vulgar!" Cutlass observes.

The vengeful vice figure whose twisted scientific mind is bent on destroying our hero cackles as his Gyro Turbo Blurbo Saab swings around the turns.

"Ha, ha, ha I've got you now Cutlass. The atomic gyroscopes I placed in each hub cap enable me to reverse centrifical force and thus accelerate at will on this winding road. Soon you will be within range of my new antiorganic gun that will activate every carbon molecule in your body, causing you to explode. I want you to be my first guinea pig!"

While attempting to out-run the crazed Dr. Vulgar, Cutlass recalls to himself how he first met the once great scientist.

"I knew no jail could hold that poor misguided man. After I foiled his attempts to detonate all of the nuclear war heads stockpiled in the American south west, he vowed to get revenge. I doubt I can out-race him so..."

Sliding almost out of control around a turn, Cutlass's rear bumper crashes through some road side bushes, snagging several. Meanwhile, Dr. Vulgar has closed the gap between the speeding cars to one hundred yards.

"Now he's in range. I'll blast him on the next straight section of road. I've waited for this moment for years. The pushing of this trigger will erase my biggest headache, Barry Cutlass! Te, he, he!" Vulgar titters.

With that, the wild eyed bediamite aims and fires his anti-organic gun. The fiercely powerful rays head straight for Cutlass. Fortunately for the free world, the rays hit the bushes snagged on his bumper, causing the plants to scatter like a splash in a frog pond.

"That lucky Cutlass. Now I'll have to let the gun recharge for a minute," wails Vulgar.

Up ahead, approaching the speeding autos is an eighteen wheeled flat bed with two large turbines strapped on. Cutlass squeezes by the big truck on a turn with just an inch to spare on both sides. When Dr. Vulgar passes the rig, the magnets in the turbines cause the atomic gyroscopes in his wheels to malfunction, sending the swift Saab soaring two hundred feet down into the blue sea.

Cutlass, after rounding the next hair pin turn, sees the black machine knife cleanly into the water.

"What a shame a mind like that had to be wasted on the fruitless production of evil and misery. He could have done much to help improve this beach ball of a home we've got," Cutlass philosophizes.

Two weeks later, Cutlass finds himself hopelessly entangled in the arms of Missy Featherdress.

"Barry, did you see that nutty story in the paper about trees exploding along the highways yesterday? It sounds so scarry," the thinly clad typist inquires.

"No I didn't see it. But I can't say I'm too surprised," Cutlass replies with a chuckle.

Panhel Symposium Proves Good Career Forum

By Wendy L. Laramee

For the few women who attended the "Women in '81" career symposium January 24th, the day presented a unique learning experience not available elsewhere on the UVM campus.

The ambitious student who devotes much of his/her time to researching career information could not match the quality and quantity of information presented by the Panhellenic Council-sponsored event. The variety of backgrounds and personalities of guest speakers lent a special richness to the program. Professor Beth Mintz challenged the audience to take a critical look for themselves at the realities of the status of women in careers. Alice Outwater and Frances Bagwell shared a wealth of personal experiences from their lives as career women. Tom Balistieri brought the wares and talents of the Center for Career Development, and gave a workshop in resume writing and interviewing techniques.

The afternoon session featured two panel presentations – "Women in Education" and "Women in Health." Members of both panels typified the broad variety of career choices within these fields. Lynn Whalen, a UVM researcher, spoke candidly about woes of women in the conservative realm of science.

Vermont Lt. Governor Madeleine Kunin captured the audience with a relaxed and easy style.

Despite the variety of personality and careers represented among the guest speakers, some words of wisdom for women entering careers were echoed throughout the day for the audience at hand:

*Know yourself well.

*Be "the best" to be considered an equal.

*Opportunity for women in careers is better than it has ever been, yet women do not hold the high-paying, or high-ranked jobs.

Natural Areas Funding of local youth, conservation, and recreation groups."

"As you know," the letter continued, "there has never been a budget item for either a coordinator or supplies and equipment necessary to give these sites minimal protection... it may be necessary to ask the Trustees to reconsider their policy — a policy we simply cannot implement without... financial support."

In addition to this evidence, statistics showing student use of Centennial Woods are now available in a comprehensive management plan by Dr. Spearing, with the help of a Work/Study student

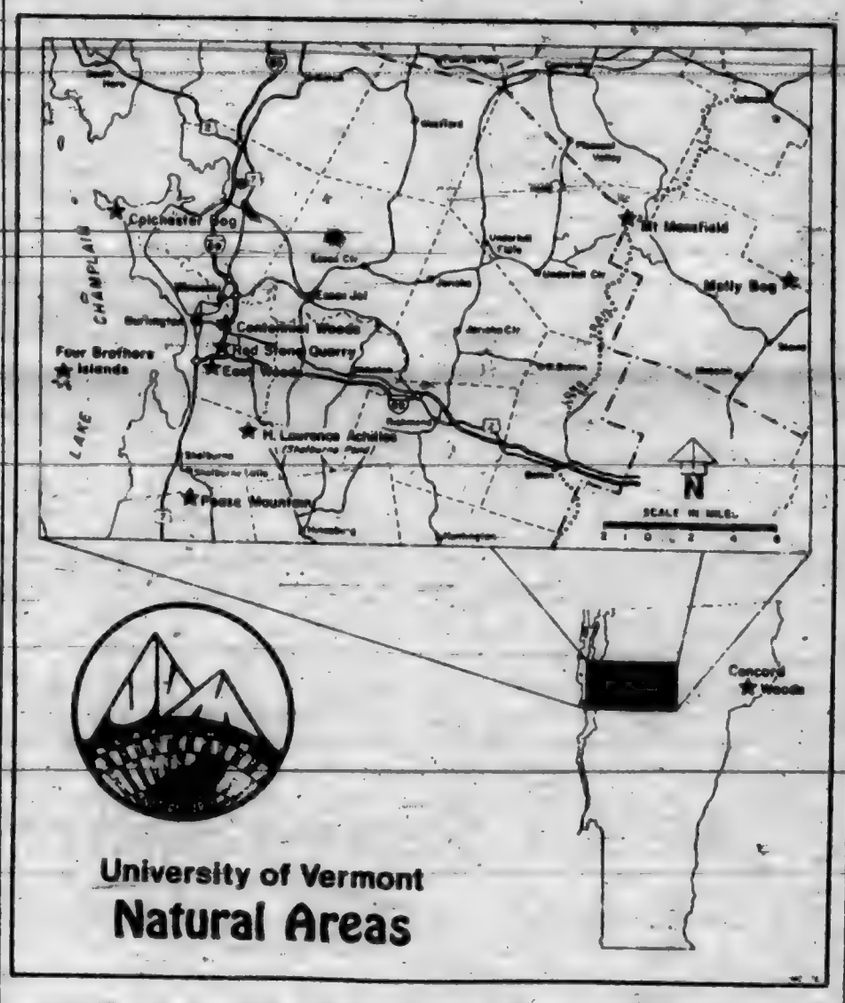
The report, modeled after the comprehensive outline suggested by the Nature Conservancy, shows over 1600 students from eight departments used Centennial Woods for field work last year. It also notes that many more students use the area for passive recreation, such as ski touring and hiking.

Dr. Hubert Vogelmann felt that in the past, the administration was more inclined to give funds for programs and facilities that have more "observable" potential, such as the library expansion, the major work underway on Gutterson Field House, and the planned Natural Resource building. Vogelmann is Chairman of the Botany Department and a veteran member of the N.A.A.C. and the Nature Conservancy.

Reidel pointed out that the only other comprehensive management plan is for the top of Mt. Mansfield. Within that 400-acre UVM Natural Area lies a "co-location" area where WCAX and other stations have transmission towers and dishes. That area has been funded for several years by the University with a separate special budget.

"I don't even look at that small area up there as part of the natural area. It's not natural," Reidel said. "The issue is that there are other natural areas that have value in education and research, but are getting no funding," he said.

Reidel argued that granting the request for the $12,000 coordinator's position would result in management plans for all the areas. Even if only some of the plans are completed, he said, teachers with already full schedules won't have to struggle to help administer the system. The coordinator would also supervise and integrate Work/Study and volunteer student help.



"Getting a management plan for these areas would bring us a long, long way," Reidel explained.

Charles Johnson, Vermont State Naturalist and chief administrator of the state's natural area system, explained the necessity of having management plans.

"Problems of managing natural areas can be seen in a situation like Concord Woods, UVM's natural area near St. Johnsbury. The area contains some of the last remaining stands of virgin White Pine in the state. A management decision must be made as to whether the University wants to maintain Concord Woods as is, or let it go toward natural, hardwood succession. And that decision must be made soon," he said.

Reidel said he has been operating under a "catch-22." "All the areas have deteriorated gradually," he said. "They (the Trustees) accepted the responsibility to do something to protect and manage the areas for educational and scientific purposes. I would say the University should not accept any more land... if we don't intend to appropriate money and write management plans for them."

On January 6, 1981, the University accepted another donated tract of land for the H. Laurence Achilles Natural Area, near Shelburne Pond.

Architecture: Revealing the Past

By Wendy Lappell

If you had come to Burlington in the late 1700's, you would have found only three houses at the foot of King Street, where, by the lake, a few logs moored to the shore served as a makeshift wharf. Since then, Burlington has grown into a city unrecognizable as that "village" on the shore of the lake.

Right now, much of the attention in Burlington is being given to changes that signify the continuing growth and prosperity of the city – such as the new library at UVM, the new wing of the Fletcher Free Library, the new Marketplace on Church Street and other such renovation projects. But over the years, not all of the changes in the city have been as abrupt as the conversion of Church Street into a pedestrian marketplace. If you are ever downtown watching the construction progress, look up past the commercial facade and you will see the remnants of a history that still remains in the faces of the buildings above Church Street.

Many people walk by these buildings every day without realizing the changes that have occurred in them. For example, had you walked down Church Street a hundred years ago, you would have found The Howard Opera House in place of Magram's Department Store. This building, built in 1878 by John Purple Howard at a cost of over $100,000, catered to the theatrical taste of Burlington's elite. Men with waxed mustaches, dressed in their best, escorted gowned women into the main gallery, a room which seated over twelve hundred people and was over forty feet high. It was decorated with frescoed ceilings, ornately carved woodwork. Gas lamps in crystal globes were lit by ushers with tapers on long poles between the acts. Until 1888, that is, when the lighting system went electric.

The combination of skillful productions and ample accommodating facilities made the Howard Opera House one of the finest theatres in the country. Unfortunately, due to lack of money the Opera House was forced to close on November 30, 1904, after twenty-five years. Howard then leased the building and it was used as a girl's dormitory before being taken over by Magram's Department Store.

If you expected to stop into Finbar's a hundred years ago for a refreshing drink after a day of shopping, you would have been quite embarrassed. That building was a Baptist Church. Reverend Hiram Stafford started construction on this building so that his congregation could have a church closer to town. The church was finished after his death by Reverend I. H. Parker. When Burlington began to get more crowded and noisy, the members of the church decided to move to their present location on St. Paul Street. After this, the building had several owners – including George Bigelow, the editor of the Burlington Times, who took down the tower, the cupola and other ecclesiastical trimmings. Today, the only indication that Finbar's was ever a church is a row of pilasters which extend slightly from the east wall on Church Street.

Another building which epitomizes the many changes in Burlington's history is one of the city's most successfully renovated buildings. The charm of the attractive Ice House Restaurant is partly due to the work of architect Colin Lindberg, who was hired to restore the building by its new owner, Derrick Davis.

The original structure was built in 1808 by John Winan, who in the same year constructed Burlington's first steamboat. Actually, the Ice House never really stored ice. Huge chunks of ice were cut from the frozen surface of the lake and carried to the building across the street, which was connected to the Ice House by a tunnel. This allowed cold air to flow into the building which was also used for cold storage.

When the first building burned, it was replaced by a large red house-like structure. This building was used by The Champlain Mattress and Furniture Company, who covered it with a layer of yellow corrogated steel. That's what the building looked like when Lindberg was hired. Outside, he removed the steel shell and painted the tin roof red. Inside, Lindberg saved the old wooden beams and left the stone walls in the basement exposed. The result is the Ice House restaurant as we know it today.

Burlington has buildings with interesting histories. Many of them are, like these, ones that we use every day. Each building tells a story of its own – by the unique way it has been built, the ways it has been used and by the effect people have had on it throughout its existence.

Many of Burlington's buildings tell a subtle story about a city – one that has always been changing and still is.

Help Is Here

By Nancy Robinson

Would you like, for once in your life, to sit down to an exam feeling relaxed and confident? Do good grades seem to evade you? Are you getting everything you can out of a college education? Chances are you're not.

If you're like the majority of students who need better study habits, you can find salvation in a valuable Study Skills course taught at UVM.

The course, developed by acclaimed psychologists B. F. Skinner and Dale Brethauser, teaches various methods for improving overall learning and study habits. It instructs how to make sense of lectures and text book assignments. It divulges secrets for predicting what a professor might ask on an exam, for memorizing the material the test will cover, and for answering objective test questions. The course also gives tips to help you pick a topic for a paper, find and select the right information, and compile that information into a neatly organized treatise. The learning skills seminar even offers speed reading and relaxation techniques.

For example, one hint from the course for grasping the meaning of a passage in a text book is to read the first and last sentences of the passage. Then, generate questions you think the rest of the section should discuss, and go on to read the whole passage together. This method has been shown to be effective in helping the reader to develop an interest in the material, thus enabling him to memorize and learn it.

Furthermore, relating the facts in the book to something else remembered is extremely valuable.

The course is given free of charge, with no credit. The student meets with the instructor, Jeffrey Baruc, several times outside the class to gear the course to his or her individual needs. It is offered once a semester, both during the day and at night, twice a week for four weeks.

The course began earlier this week, but Mr. Baruc said that those who act quickly can still be admitted. For a worthwhile subject that can yield infinite benefits, try the Study Skills course. To enroll in the Study Skills course, call 656-4227.

license fee on physicians' offices in Burlington. "If we can ask hundreds of dollars from a vendor on Church St., it is not inappropriate to consider asking wealthy physicians for a moderate license fee," he stated.

"I should point out here that the 1.5 million dollars for the Church St. Marketplace project — which Mayor Paquette, the Democratic and Republican parties, and the entire business community fought for two years ago is almost exactly the amount of money that the mayor now wants this year for essential city services," the candidate said.

Sanders added that if businesses were unwilling to agree to this renegotiation, he would call for an immediate reappraisal of business inventory and equipment updated to strict, 1981 price standards to raise additional revenues.

Sanders also said that it would be "totally appropriate" to ask the University of Vermont and the Vermont Medical Center, both tax-exempt institutions, for $250,000 each in lieu of taxes.

Give and Receive

By Carolyn Shartenberg

Making others happy can be a "real ego-boosting experience." Although some people believe that "volunteering" involves a one-way situation in which the volunteer does all the giving, Anne Desbecker, the director of the Student Community in Action (S.C.I.A.), views student volunteering as "an extension of classroom studies" that benefits both the student volunteer and the community recipient. While students spend a great deal of their time looking for interesting extra-curricular activities, they often overlook the possibility of being a student volunteer.

The Student Community in Action is the base for twelve student-run volunteer groups. The prospective volunteer can become part of the group, or groups, which interest him/her most. Students who have, for instance, left small brothers or sisters at home, or enjoy working with children in general, could volunteer as a big brother or big sister to a child in the Burlington community. The G.Y.S.T. program (Get Your Self Together) and the H.O. Wheeler tutorial program are also designed for helping children in the community.

For those interested in pursuing a career in the field of nutrition or dietetics, the Nutrition Awareness program would be a worthwhile activity. The group helps members of the community, from grade school children to senior citizens, learn about and understand many aspects of nutrition.

While the Vermont Children's Magazine is always looking for volunteers with journalism and artistic talents, the M.S. Reachout group and the Council for Exceptional Children program are both great for students interested in the allied sciences and mental health fields.

The Adopt-A-Grandparent program has become so successful that Vermont Life is doing an article on the group and its student volunteers. The pleasure the elderly citizens derive from a student's attention can only be

S.A. Speaks

The fall semester was a new experience for many people involved with S.A. for the first time. Through the learning and confusion came some impressive results: senate elections with more students than ever voting (34%); a textbook exchange that enabled students to beat the bookstore's prices; a successful Legislative Day which was well attended by students and legislators; a voter registration drive that resulted in over 800 students either registering to vote or requesting absentee ballots for the recent Presidential elections; a forum on the draft; a debate between Vermont Attorney General candidates on election eve; and the involvement of more students in S.A. related activities than in previous years.

This semester the Student Association has targeted four major issues in which to involve itself.

(1) UVM tuition will be rising a minimum of 11% next year. The University has requested an 11% increase in State aid too — anything less than this will result in a rise of more than 11% for in-state tuition. Here is an issue where student involvement can make a difference.

S.A.'s Legislative Appropriation Steering Committee is now organizing plans for the Student Lobby effort. Students will be needed to testify before the Vermont Legislature, to write letters, to do research, and to assist in other areas of the effort. Angry about Tuition? Here's a chance to do something about it. Watch for further publicity and please stop in to the S.A. Office if you are interested.

(2) The Student Action Committee is now hard at work on a student evaluation of courses. Modeled after evaluations done by other Student Associations, the goal is to produce a course handbook where students may look up a particular course and see how other students felt about the course. It is separate from regular departmental evaluations, since the only goal of it is to provide students with means of learning about courses. Our goal is to do a mid-semester evaluation that will be available to students by pre-registration in the late Spring. There are literally hundreds of courses to be evaluated and hours of background work if this project is to succeed. Please stop in the S.A. Office if you would like to help, and watch for further information.

(3) During our first General Assembly, scheduled for February 5, 1981, at 7:00 p.m. in North Lounge, Billings, we will be discussing the inadequacies of Billings as a student center and the feasibility of a new student center. A lot of discussion is needed on the issue, so we encourage all students to attend this important General Assembly Meeting.

At our first Senate Meeting of the year other issues for the coming semester also came up. They include: the upcoming Winter Carnival (February 19th–23rd), the possibility of a pub on campus, plans for the end of the year party, and clubs that are up for recognition. Currently, VPIRG, the Student Admissions Club, and the Parachuting Club are up for recognition. A resolution supporting the University's recognition of Martin Luther King Day (Jan. 15) was passed and sent to the Trustees.

The Spring semester is also a very busy time for the Finance Committee. It will be working with S.A. clubs all semester as each club submits its budget requests for next year. It's a really big job that culminates in the final budget hearing at the S.A. General Assembly on April 8.

In the midst of all that we are planning and struggling to achieve there is also next year to think about. Presidential and Vice-Presidential Elections are coming up later this semester. Anyone who is a full-time undergraduate may run — just stop up to the S.A. Office if you are interested.

The Student Association is working on a variety of issues this semester, but without student involvement beyond our senators, little will be achieved. We need your help. Reach out to your senators at the weekly residence hall meetings, or stop in at the S.A. Office in Billings. We are the voice of the UVM students. Get involved, for a change.

Volunteers

matched by the knowledge the student volunteers gain from the adopted grandparents.

The time needed to be a volunteer varies, but is usually only about an hour per week. To be sure, the need for new volunteers is an ever-present concern. Anne admits she finds this frustrating because "the students should be coming to us." S.C.I.A. is, however, doing well with the 340 volunteers presently involved with the twelve programs. Highlighting last semester was S.C.I.A.'s participation in the Alumni Phon-A-Thon contest in which they won fourth place and $175. The money was used to put the previously inactive darkroom back into working order.

Looking to the future, S.C.I.A. and the UVM Boulder Society will be coordinating the Second Annual UVM Affair with Burlington Square, tentatively set for Saturday, March 14.

The Student Community in Action is an organization in the student community that often goes unrecognized. The outlet it provides for individual growth through volunteering shouldn't be overlooked. If you are interested in a real "ego-boosting experience" this semester, or want some more information on the other volunteer groups, contact Anne at the S.C.I.A. office in Mansfield House at x2062.

"Computer Simulation?
It was my take off to a great future."

Becoming a Link Engineer has made a big difference in my career. I wanted a challenge. And the chance to design something exciting. Link gives me that chance and more.

Modern simulation technology was born at our company more than fifty years ago and ever since then, we've been the industry's leader in the design and manufacturing of aviation and aerospace training devices. Our trainers can realistically fly you from New York to L.A. and Houston to the moon without ever leaving their hangar.

THE WOMEN

FEBRUARY 1
GILDA

Rita Hayworth stars in this story of gambling casinos, infidelity and murder. Hayworth plays the woman in Glenn Ford's past.

ROMAN HOLIDAY

Audrey Hepburn captured an Oscar for her portrayal of a modern day princess who, rebelling against her royal obligations, travels the city of Rome on her own. Stylishly directed by William Wyler, this romantic comedy ranks as one of the most enjoyable films ever.

FEBRUARY 15
MY MAN GODFREY

Carole Lombard stars as a rich young socialite who rescues a Depression-era bum. This screwball comedy is marked by excellent performances throughout, especially Lombard's screwball antics.

FEBRUARY 22
A STREETCAR NAMED DESIRE

Vivien Leigh brilliantly captures the role of Blanche DuBois in this cinematic version of the classic Tennessee Williams play. Leigh gives just about the best feminine performance ever, as well as an interpretation by Marlon Brando that nears perfection. Directed by Elia Kazan.

HIS GIRL FRIDAY

Starring Rosslind Russell, this film is one of the best examples of verbal slapstick in Hollywood history. Cary Grant plays the hard fine newspaper editor and Russell is his ace reporter (and exwife). He has twenty-four hours to win her back. Directed by Howard Hawks.

MARCH 8
MILDRED PIERCE

Joan Crawford stars as a woman who rises from waitress to restauranteur, and whose sole motivation in life becomes the happiness of her decadent, spoiled daughter. Crawford won an Oscar for Best Actress for this convincing performance. Directed by Michael Curtiz.

MARCH 15
PLATINUM BLONDE

The late, great Jean Harlow stars in director Frank Capra's early Depression film farce about wealth, social demands, non-conformity and love.

AFRICAN QUEEN

This is a unique and unforgettable combination of romance, comedy, adventure and spectacular color photography. Katharine Hepburn gives a super performance to counter Bogart's Oscar-winning portrayal of Charlie Allnut. Directed by John Huston.

CAMILLE

Excellent performances enhance this tale of love, won and lost, set in the 18th century France. Greta Garbo's performance is said to be "the single most beautiful performance in the sound film." Directed by George Cukor.

APRIL 12
HOW TO MARRY A MILLIONAIRE

Marilyn Monroe, Lauren Bacall and Betty Grable make a pact to try and arrange wealthy marriages. Jean Negulesco directed this early Cinemascope film.

GASLIGHT

Ingrid Bergman marries a brooding pianist (Charles Boyer), not knowing that he murdered her aunt. When they inhabit the aunt's old house, Boyer tries to drive her insane. Directed by George Cukor.

GIANT

This is a story about an eastern woman (Elizabeth Taylor) who marries a Texas land baron (Rock Hudson) and attempts to adjust to his way of life. This vast epic panorama was nominated for 9 Academy Awards.

BLACK GIRL

Focusing on the myth of decolonialization, this film follows a Senegalese maid who is taken to the Riviera by her employers. Once out of Africa, she is no longer a person, Diouanne, but "the black girl." Shot in 1965, this film made a profound impression at several international film festivals and marks an important point in African cinema.

CESAR AND ROSALIE

Convinced that he can win back his woman by the same hard work ethic that got him his fortune, Cesar campaigns to eliminate his rival for Rosalie. The result is a perceptive comedy about what happens when three intelligent people find themselves caught in a romantic triangle.

MORGAN

This lunatic love story follows the eccentric Morgan as he tries to win back his ex-wife in riotous determination. As Morgan escalates his wildman efforts to recapture his wife (booby traps, camping on her doorstep, etc.) the film builds to its hilarious resolution. One of the funniest movies you'll ever see.

THAT OBSCURE OBJECT OF DESIRE

Luis Bunuel's darkly humorous and satirical film focuses on a fiftyish gentleman who falls head over heels for a woman half his age. Into this love struggle intrude the violence and absurdity of the outside world, Bunuel style.

THE MERCHANT OF FOUR SEASONS

A sensation at the 1972 New York Film Festival, this film sparked renewed interest in the new German cinema. Fassbinder's tale about a fruit peddler whose life disintegrates, expertly combines social comedy, politics and irony.

KWARDEN

Directed by Masaki Kobayashi, here is a tetrology of horror stories. Though reminiscent of some of Edgar Allan Poe's best, these hair-raising tales of the macabre are thoroughly Japanese in content and viewpoint.

Gilda Radner's Broadway stage debut is caught perfectly on film. Comedy as only the former Saturday Night Live star can create it: hilarious, nostalgic, crazy, touching. Also featured is a hilarious performance by Father Guido Sarducci who appears with you-u-guessed-it, The Pope.

LAST TANGO IN PARIS

Brando and Maria Schneider appear in Bertolucci's controversial film exploring themes of death, sexuality and culture. It lays bare the primal nature of man as no film has done before. One of the few art films to make it big, it created an international stir in 1972.

MARCH 6
BLACK STALLION

A boy is saved from a shipwreck by a beautiful Arabian stallion. After their rescue from the island, Mickey Rooney guides them into horse-racing and to triumph. This gorgeously filmed story was one of the most highly praised films of 1979.

WHATEVER HAPPENED TO BABY JANE

This Friday the 13th special will chill your spring fever. Bette Davis and Joan Crawford star in this story of sibling envy, hate and revenge. A classic tale of the macabre.

COAL MINER'S DAUGHTER

Sissy Spacek portrays Loretta Lynn in this moving biographical film. Born a coal miner's daughter, she marries at 13 and has four children by 20, when she begins her singing career. A rags to riches story with a lot of hard times inbetween, and plenty of music.

APOCALYPSE NOW ($1.50 w/ID)

Francis Coppola's epic creation deals with the horror, madness, seriousness and moral dilemma of Vietnam. Capt. Willard (Martin Sheen) must kill Colonel Kurtz (Brando), the AWOL American officer who has set up his own army deep in Indo-China. One of the most controversial and intense films ever created.

AMACORD

Fellini's most popular, and one of the most popular foreign films of all time, deals with the filmmaker's youth in fascist Italy. It combines his early comic approach with the fantastic style of his later films. A loving and imaginative film.

ANNIE HALL

One of the few comedies to ever win the Oscar for best picture, this film stands with the greats. Primarily a romantic comedy, it takes a semi-autobiographical look at Allen and Diane Keaton. Resulting is an honest and often hilarious view of the pitfalls of a modern relationship.

Double Jeopardy Hits Hoops

By Christina Fiorini

Last week, disappointment followed high spirits for Vermont basketball. The Cats began Wednesday by pouncing on Sienna College 86-79, only to suffer two consecutive back-to-back losses to the University of Maine Friday and Saturday, 90-83 and 83-72 respectively.

The first game against the Bears, played before a large, vocal crowd at Patrick Gym, was a close affair which the Bears won in overtime, according to Maine Coach Skip Chappelle, because they "were patient with our shots near the end."

Only once did the Cats manage to gain a lead in the first half, when a lay-up and a free throw by Mike Evelti gave Vermont a 17-14 advantage.

The Bears regained and held the lead in the second half until 13:13 left in the game. At this point, Dane Correll stole the ball and fed a pass to Jeff Brown, whose basket tied the game 56-56. With 7:13 left in the game, Steve Thode scored and gave Vermont the lead, 67-66. For the remainder of the period, the two teams fought neck and neck. With two minutes left in the game, and the score 77-77, Brown fouled out and was replaced by Tim Woodley. Time ran out and the game then went into overtime.

The Cats played fiercely, but Maine began its takeover. Champ Godbart completed two freethrows making the score 82-81. Vermont trailed as Maine moved on to advance the score now 86-81. The Cats didn't give up as Correll scored, however they were unable to catch the Bears, finally losing 83-90.

"I think we gave away many opportunities in the first half to win," commented Salzberg. "We had the advantage in terms of tempo, their key players had to sit out a lot. The stats show that we were playing well, but I don't think so. The stats show we made a lot of lay-ups, fast breaks, but we didn't act on it."

The Black Bears completed 68% of their shots; the over-all game scoring leader was Maine's Godbolt with 30 points. For Vermont, Brown led the scoring with 17 points followed by Correll and Evelti, both with 16 points.

"I was really surprised with Correll's outside shooting, in fact with that of the whole team," remarked Maine Coach Skip Chappelle. He also commented that, "Evelti is as good a player as we've come across. Inside, he's a low-hole power player!"

"I don't think any coach is in favor of back to back games," remarked Chappelle, as he stated that he had no idea what Saturday's game would bring. In any event, one victory followed another as Maine retained its crown, managing once again to beat Vermont 83-72. The game was played with close score as the Bears consistently held an average 11 point lead over the Cats.

"It was the toughest 10 point lead to keep!" admitted Chappelle, as the Bears this time completed 63% of their shots.

"We didn't play well. We had 11 more free throws, six more shots," remarked Salzberg, "however, there was no contention."

According to Chappelle, the game strategy was to cut off the inside. Maine's team member Rick Carlisle succeeded in being a key player for the Bears.

For the Cats, Evelti was a key offensive player, "Mike was really covered. He played as well as always," remarked Salzberg. "One thing is he's in a position where he's at the mercy of the other players. There were times where he had an open area but no pass came. We threw passes away by just going to the side instead of the middle. Mike needs help inside!"

The over-all game top scorers were Maine's Godbolt with 30 points, and Carlisle with 20 points. For Vermont, top scorers were Brown with 20 points, followed by Nocera and Evelti, both earning 13 points and 12 rebounds, and Correll with 12. Bruce Beynon did not play due to a pulled calf muscle from Friday night's game. Although Salzberg did not consider injuries to be a major factor in the game, he did mention that the team missed having Beyonne play, who is one of the Cats' more consistent players.

As a result of this past week, Vermont fell to a 7-8 record. How do the two losses affect Vermont's prospects for the playoffs? According to Salzberg, "aside from the overall picture, they hurt the chances of getting the home court advantage for the playoffs."

This week, Vermont moves onward in the season as the Cats turn around to face New Hampshire and Robert Morris.

Super Sunday?

By Andy Cook

"...Then on Sunday, NBC Sports presents the biggest event on earth – THE SUPER BOWL! See it all as the Oakland Raiders and the Philadelphia Eagles hook up in a battle for the big prize! LIVE!"

Yes, it was Super Sunday, and with the Eagles as only three point favorites, you expected one hell of a game. This would be a classic – the game that would keep you glued to your TV set all afternoon – or as the networks have done it – all evening.

But it really wasn't a Super Sunday. First of all, the Oakland Raiders won the game 27-10 and were in control of the contest by the middle of the third period, allowing you to hit the refrigerator or do whatever one is supposed to do on a cold Sunday night in Vermont. In addition, with the release of the 52 hostages from Iran, most people had their minds on West Point, NY, and not New Orleans, and thus the NFL title game appeared anticlimactic. But most importantly, if you consider yourself any kind of pro-football fan, you should have been able to know the outcome before the game started.

This was supposed to be a good year for the Eagles, and it was. Although not loaded with colorful stars like "Too Tall" Jones, Joe Greene or Earl Cambell, the club has several very talented offensive players, such as the consistent Harold Carmichael, the powerful Wilbert Montgomery, and of course, the "Polish Rifle," Ron Jaworski. Defensively, the Eagles never resembled a team from the city of brotherly love, and when Philadelphia had just one defeat in the first two-thirds of the season, everything was going as expected.

But during the final five games of the year, small and subtle things began to occur that would dictate the final destiny for the Eagles. They lost two out of three games, which destroyed their momentum and proved they might not have escaped the Philadelphia "choke" syndrome. Wilbert Montgomery got hurt and so did many others. Suddenly it was up to Louis Giamona to carry the team to the playoffs.

Finally, the public became aware of the "go-get-'em" type of coach Dick Vermeil is. Although cheerleading coaches may seem to be more capable of motivating sore and aching players, history

Disaster Ices Cats

By T. Goode

The University of Vermont Hockey team dropped a hard-fought decision to the University of New Hampshire Wildcats at Gutterson Saturday night by a 6-4 score that left the Cats winless in the New Year and with bleak prospects for reaching the division playoffs a month and a half away. Wildcat goalie Greg Moffet's stellar third period kept Vermont's offense at bay while at the opposite end of the rink, the Cat's beleaguered netman Sylvain Turcotte, starting in place of the flu-ridden Andy Ashforth, was pounded by the big New Hampshire forwards into giving up two tallies that : the contest out of reach.

Vermont scored first, as Mark Litton rocketed a screaming drive from twenty feet out that found the far post at the 8:52 mark of the first period. New Hampshire fought back on a power play two minutes later with a set of perfectly executed passes culminating with a goal which Turcotte was helpless to prevent. The final minutes of the period were marked with some brutal hitting on the part of UNH. Referee Tom McCabe, oblivious to these blatant infractions, was nonetheless right there with his rulebook when irked Catamount Craig Homola

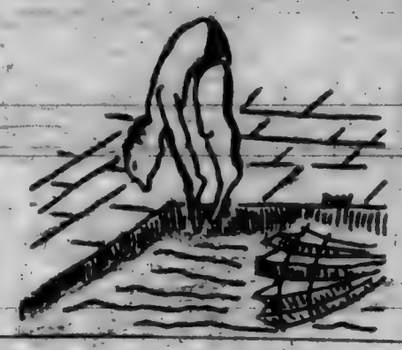
Hurt Cats Hang On

By Harry Eastman

Although severely outmanned, and with several team members recovering from hampering injuries or the flu, the University of Vermont men's indoor track team came away with a victory in its first intercollegiate event of the season.

The meet was held at Bates College on January 24th with teams from the host college and the University of New Hampshire also competing. The final score of the three-way meet was UVM 30, Bates 65, and UNH 70.

Some fine individual efforts were recorded by the Catamounts. Co-captain Charlie Claudio (Sr. Providence, RI) took the 35 lb. weight throw (53') and recorded a career high, when he threw the shot put 43'4". The other co-captain, Joe McClallen (Sr., Rutland, Vt.) won both the 55 meter dash (6.72) and the long jump (21'7"). Erik Stabenau (Farmington, Ct.) was instrumental in the victory with a personal best in the pole vault (13'6"). With a distance of 42'8", Jim Rideout (St. Johnsbury, Vt.) finished third in the triple jump. Another third place finisher was Steve Stebbins (Burlington, Vt.), who had a time of 9:19.7 in the 2 mile run.



After the outstanding performance at Bates by UVM, Coach Ed Kusiak looked at the importance of that meet. "We had a lot of young kids for whom this was their first intercollegiate competition. I think we learned a lot about ourselves as a team."

UVM Tops Middlebury, 6 - 3

By Cealy Anderson

The UVM Women's Ice Hockey team has opened the 1981 season with a satisfying win over the local rivals from Middlebury and a loss to Dartmouth. Playing soon after a long vacation, the Catamounts were frustrated in various attempts to score against the Dartmouth defense, supported by an able goalkeeper.

UVM proved the value of practice time in the strong, balanced effort used to defeat Middlebury Monday night at the Gutterson Rink. The visitors scored early, taking advantage of mistakes in front of the UVM goal. The Cats returned to dominate the second and third periods, coming away with a total of six goals, to the visitor's three. Scoring for UVM were Lila Kirkland with two goals and Cathie Cope, Ellen Zeman, Jeanne Gaudreau and Bonnie Daley, who each scored once.

Champs In Action

By Lon Brettell

The University of Vermont's men's ski team dominated the competition at the University of New Hampshire Winter Carnival, held at Waterville Valley, New Hampshire.

In Friday's giant slalom, Tor Melander led UVM, which placed all five racers in the top ten. Following Melander were Mack Lyons (Dartmouth), John Morrissey (Middlebury), Dave Bean (UVM), Pete Murphy (UVM), John Teague (UVM), Tim Itin (Dartmouth), Chris Mikell (UVM), Mark Altmeyer (Middlebury) and Dan Suits (St. Lawrence). Another UVM skier, Jon Zedechlik, finished in sixth position. These results gave UVM an almost insurmountable lead going into the next day's slalom and 4x10 kilometer cross-country relays.

Saturday's events proved to be more of the same as Tor Melander again placed first, and Chris Mikell followed with a second place finish. Dave Bean and Pete Murphy placed sixth and seventh to give Vermont a first in the slalom. The cross-country relay team of Rick Solie, Todd Kempainen, Pal Sjulstad, and Jon Zedechlik finished with a time of 1:05.45, five and one half minutes ahead of second place St. Lawrence.

UVM's 338.5 total points easily out-distanced Dartmouth (272), Middlebury (261.5), St. Lawrence (251), New Hampshire (194.5), Williams (154.5), New England (128), Maine (108), Bates (74.5), and Harvard (48).

Catamounts Dunk Middlebury

By Art Cunningham

With Middlebury leading 68-67 going into the 200 yard freestyle relay, Tracy Stewart, Robin Lux, Liz Levens, and Patsy Demarcken of UVM edged the Panther quartet by an incredibly close .09 seconds. This victory gave the Cats the points it needed, and Vermont swam away with a 74-68 win and a record of 9-4.

Demarcken sent a charge through the whole gym when she touched out the anchorwoman of the Middlebury relay team in a finish as close as Sandra Farrel, coach of the UVM women, can remember seeing in recent years.

Demarcken, a sophomore from Holden, Mass., also swam to first place finishes in the 500 freestyle and the 200 backstroke, and finished second in the 100 individual medley.

Tracy Stewart, a junior from Anchorage, Alaska and captain of the squad, also swam to two first place finishes, in the 50 yard freestyle and the 50 yard butterfly events.

Liz Levens, a sophomore from Syosset, NY, set a school mark in the 100 yard freestyle, cruising in with a time of 58.60.

The divers of Coach Cathy Layman had a field day, with Sarah Moore collecting top scores in both compulsories and freestyles, and Robin Campbell securing a second place and a third place finish. Moore, one of the top divers in New England, set a school mark in compulsory diving. Both dives were from a one meter board, as Middlebury has no 3 meter board.

Ann Metzger also had a fine day, winning in the 100 butterfly, while Robin Lux collected two second place finishes in addition to her role in the crucial 200 freestyle relay.

Coach Farrel was pleased with the win, and was looking forward to yesterday's tri-meet with Keene and St. Michaels at the Ross Sports Center.

Super Sunday?

has told us that the most successful teams of the past decade, the Dallas Cowboys, the Pittsburg Steelers, and the Miami Dolphins, have been coached by patient, panic-free, phlegmatic men such as Tom Laundry, Chock Knoll, and Don Shula. Vermeil did inspire his team, but he had his players so worked up that they ended up making mistakes throughout the playoffs and committing unforgiveable blunders in Sunday's game.

Against the Minnesota Vikings, Philadelphia allowed themselves to fall fourteen points behind a team which comes from the worst division in the NFL, and which entered the playoffs only after a Hail Mary pass was blessed by Ahmad Rashad's hands in the end zone. It was shown in the Viking-Eagle game that the Philadelphia team was not executing the basics such as catching the football when it lands in the receiver's hands, or kicking a field goal from the ten yard line. Philadelphia won the ball game, but the fact that the Eagles had to struggle with the Vikes may have been an omen of what was to come.

Philadelphia was expecting to play the mighty Atlanta Falcons in the championship game for the NFC title, but Danny White threw two touchdowns in the final few minutes to lead the Dallas Cowboys to an upset over the Falcons. With the Cowboys as their opponents, the Eagles had the home field advantage and seemingly the game advantage too, as they were playing against a mediocre team which happened to find a miracle in Atlanta. Surely, the mighty Eagles would blow Dallas away.

Wrong. Although their 20-7 margin of victory didn't indicate the Philadelphia team dropped passes all day long and continued to give Danny White a chance to produce a repeat of the Atlanta contest. The Eagles were not a very opportunistic team, as they could not clinch a victory until the final minute of play despite several fumbles by the Cowboy backfield.

Oakland, however, was in the driver's seat as Super Bowl XV began. To begin with, the Raiders had eleven players who participated in the NFL championship contest of 1977, and who knew what to expect in the game against the Eagles. Secondly, Oakland had improved as the season progressed, while Philadelphia seemed to deteriorate. The Raiders lost three of their first five games, and with newly acquired Dan Pastorini injured, simply put, things looked bleak. But then along came the man who had the dubious honor of playing with the chronic losing teams of New England during the 1970s, Jim Plunkett.

After two idle years, during which his career seemed on the verge of ending, the former star from Stanford got a last breath of air and carried the team toward glory. Plunkett is a surprise quarterback. He may not be an offensive terror like Dan Fouts or Brian Sipes, but his unexpected bombs can catch any team off guard, including the Eagles, a team which employs a three-four defensive alignment – a set-up that isn't very successful against first down passers.

But there are two more important factors which helped Oakland tremendously. First of all, the Raiders were playing with eleven players, who had helped the team win Super Bowl XI in 1977. Only one team has ever followed a Super Bowl win with a Super Bowl loss, and that was the Dallas Cowboys, which lost to the defending World Champion Pittsburg Steelers in 1976. So while the Eagles were screaming and yelling about their team, the quiet but aggressive Raiders simply "got down to business."

Finally, the Raiders won with adversity. As if to take out their frustrations and feuds on their opponents, the Raiders became a stronger unit on the field. The adversity stems from the attempt by owner Al Davis to move the club to Los Angeles. With belligerent fans screaming at the players, Oakland became more determined to win.

Yes, Al Davis wants to move to L.A., despite Commissioner Pete Rozele's protest. But when those two men met on NBC's locker room interview, Pete had nothing but praise for the man who represented the team which did what it had to do – win in the clutch. No team had ever won four straight NFL playoff games, but if you are anything of a sports connoisseur, you should have known that the Eagles were not going to stop Oakland from achieving this feat on Sunday.

Disaster

started to point out a few of these not-so-subtle misdemeanors, and like the short-sighted zebra he would later prove himself to be, McCabe slapped the All-American with a 10 minute misconduct, much to the displeasure of the Gutterson faithful and Coach Cross in particular.

Kirk McCaskill gave the Gutterson faithful something to cheer about, however, when he opened the second period with a shot past the confused Moffet to put the Cats up by one. Then the roof caved in for our heroes, as Andy Brickley's backhander found its way through Sylvain Turcotte's legs to tie the score at two apiece. Then New Hampshire's captain and point man Sean Coady blasted one into the net to put the Wildcats up by one. Four minutes later, with time running out in the second frame, Andy Brickley scored again to put the Wildcats up by two going into the lockerroom and thereby cast a pall over the 4,000 plus fans who packed the fieldhouse to see this ancient rivalry.

A defensive snag gave New Hampshire a 5-2 lead early in the third period. Vermont managed to score two more goals in the losing cause with Brousseau getting one and Kirk McCaskill getting his second but by then the outcome had already been decided and the Cats had nothing left to do but swallow their pride once more and look forward to this Friday's game with Colgate at Gutterson Fieldhouse at 7:30 p.m.

Women Ski To Victory

By Maryanne Omalley

The UVM women did a spectacular job at the UNH carnival beating Middlebury at Waterville Valley, NH. The top six-team totals were UVM with 310, Middlebury 281, Dartmouth with 209.5, UNH with 227.5, Williams with 190, and St. Lawrence with 196.

A first place finish in the 4x5 cross-country relay as well as a second place in the giant slalom, contributed to the team's victory.

The relay team consisted of Betsy Haines, a freshman who won the St. Lawrence Carnival; Senior Liz Carey, the captain of the team who was second at St. Lawrence; Abby Bronson, a sophomore; and Leslie Bancroft, a freshman in her first intercollegiate meet. Their time was 58.45 seconds.

Ready For Carnival

It will be a rebuilding year for Coach Edward Kusiak's women's indoor track team. Gone is the talent and depth of the 1979-80 team, which led to an impressive 8-0 season. Gone also is Janet Terp, who was Vermont's number one sprinter, and the record holder in the long jump, high jump and pentathlon. According to fellow runner Judi St. Hilaire, Terp was "half the team." Another sorely missed sprinter is Winsome Jackson, whose failure to return to the team has left a void in the dash events.

Compensating for these losses will be a number of very talented freshmen including Vermont State Champion Tammy Rugo and Melissa Moran. Coach Kusiak will be counting on one of these freshmen to pull the team together in time for their first collective point meet at Dartmouth on January 31.

Here are the key events and main UVM competitors:

Rugo will be the lone sprinter for the Cats competing in the 50 meter, 55 meter, and 200 meter dash. Moran will take over the hurdles events from injured Junior Grace Emmert. Running in the distance events will be the trio of Junior Anne Schiavone, nationally ranked Senior Judi St. Hilaire, and Erika Thuro. Sophomore standout Katrina Geurkink and Senior Barb Luneau will be the major point obtainers in the weight department. Coach Kusiak will be relying on the combined efforts of Freshman Karen Burke and Sophomore Liz Dudley in the pentathlon as well as their expertise in the long jump and high jump.

Overall, the strength of the team seems to be in the distance and weight events while its weakness lies in the long jump and high jump. "I can't make a prediction," says Coach Kusiak, "as to the success of the team. The Dartmouth meet will be the test."

Fans Root For Cats

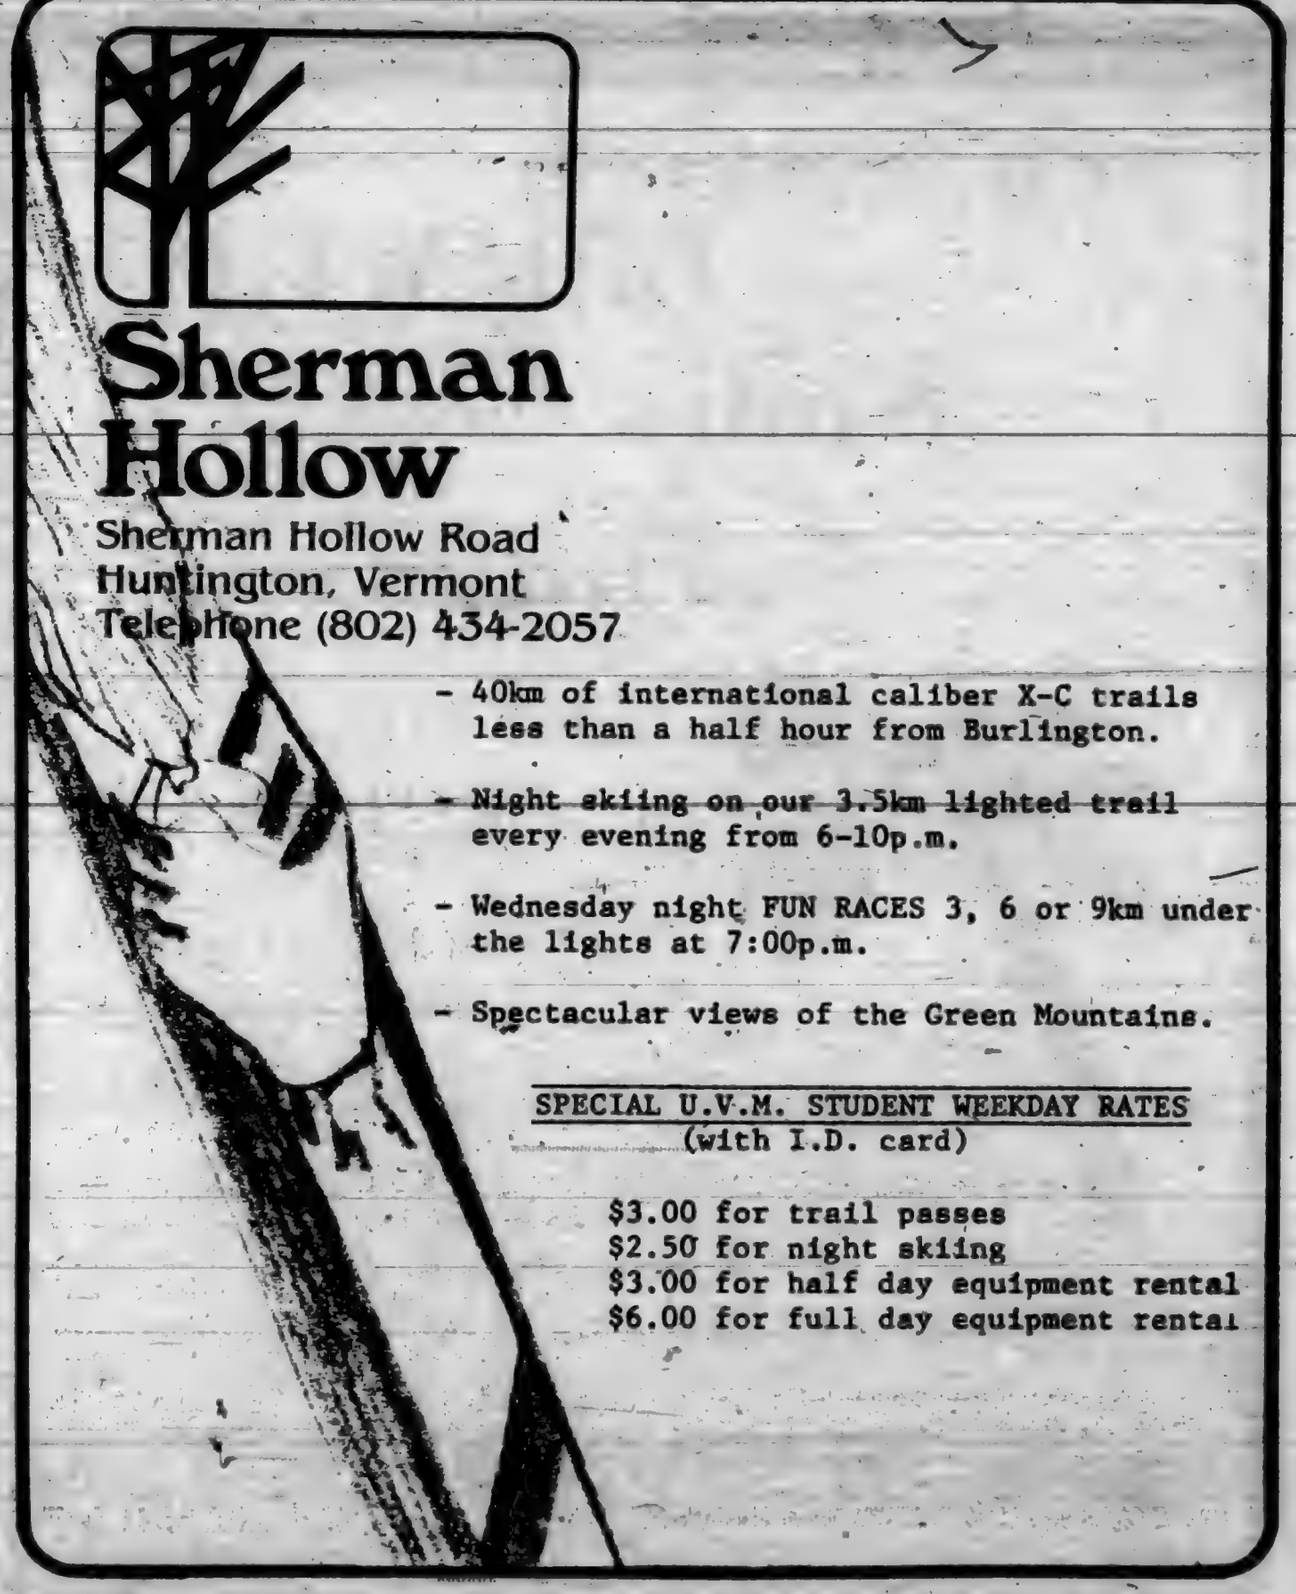
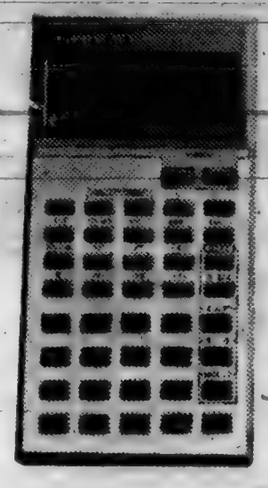
Vermont started off the season successfully with a win over (SUNY) Albany 106.35 to 85.20. Maureen Conger placed first all-around, with a score of 26.25, while Ginger Ross placed third with an all-around score of 25.10. Co-captain Denise D'Orsi placed second on floor with a routine that scored a 6.75.



Nancy Hurwitz placed first with a score of 7.75 on the beam. Tracy Gibbons helped out with a 7.75 on vault, placing second.

The team's first home meet this season was against UMaine on January 17. There was also a fine audience, considering that the meet was scheduled at the same time as a hockey game. The audience was not disappointed, as Vermont came up with a winning score of 102.35 over UMaine's 94.05. Lisa Reitzas placed first all-around with a 26.60. Joan McDermott placed third on vault with a 7.75, while Amy Stark dazzled the audience with her first place handspring which scored an 8.1. Peg Grittith and Nancy Kane increased their beam scores by a total of 2.95 points.



The team did exceedingly well against Northeastern and raised their final team score by 9 points from the last meet to a 111.10. They lost, however, to Northeastern by 13 points. Thus the team's record is 2-1. UVM expects to beat Keene State and Holyoke this weekend and are preparing for hosting Dartmouth at Patrick Gymnasium on February 3 at 7:30 p.m.

Bossy Does It!

By Greg Weimer

Mike Bossy, the 24-year-old scoring sensation for the NY Islanders, was within reach of Maurice Richard's record of 50 goals in 50 games for a week. But he waited until the waning moments of the Islanders 50th NHL game on Saturday night before rifling shots past Quebec netminder Ron Grahame to tie Richard's record, which has stood since Montreal's 1944-45 season. In the Islanders 47th game, Bossy scored three goals to bring his total to 48 goals. It was his eighth game of the season with at least three goals, which set an NHL mark. While playing against Calgary last Tuesday night, he was held scoreless by the close checking of Eric Vail. In Detroit on Thursday night he missed two shots at an open net and had other good chances, but he failed to score.

Then, in Quebec, Bossy was held scoreless for the first 55 minutes of the game. With 4:10 left in the game and the Islanders on a power play Bossy slaped a backhander past Graham for number 49.

Again at 18:31, with just under a minute and a half left in the game, Bossy took a pass from center Brain Trottier and fired a shot from the top of the left face-off circle, which slipped through Grahame's legs. Bossy had number 50. The jubilant Bossy was swamped by fellow teammates in a moment of celebration.

Bossy did have some close competition in the race to 50 in 50. The L.A. Kings' Charlie Simmer scored three times against Boston on Saturday afternoon, which gave him 49 goals in 50 games; however his attempt fell short by one important game.

A Chorus For Us

By Pablo Conrad

After six years of national acclaim, the Broadway musical A Chorus Line couldn't help but provide a fit opening to the Lane Series' spring season. Not that time hasn't dulled this gem. But the Burlington appearance of A Chorus Line, two Monday nights ago, wasn't as flawed by familiarity as by weak points in its national tour cast. Luckily, the company as a whole was great. Glamour is still glamour.

The musical is based on the less-than-glamourous, anyway. It's a singing and dancing look at the people who back up the stars on Broadway. Lined up in leotards and casual dress, twenty-four hopefuls provide "Zach," a Broadway director, with enough sung and spoken confession for him to choose eight chorus line dancers.

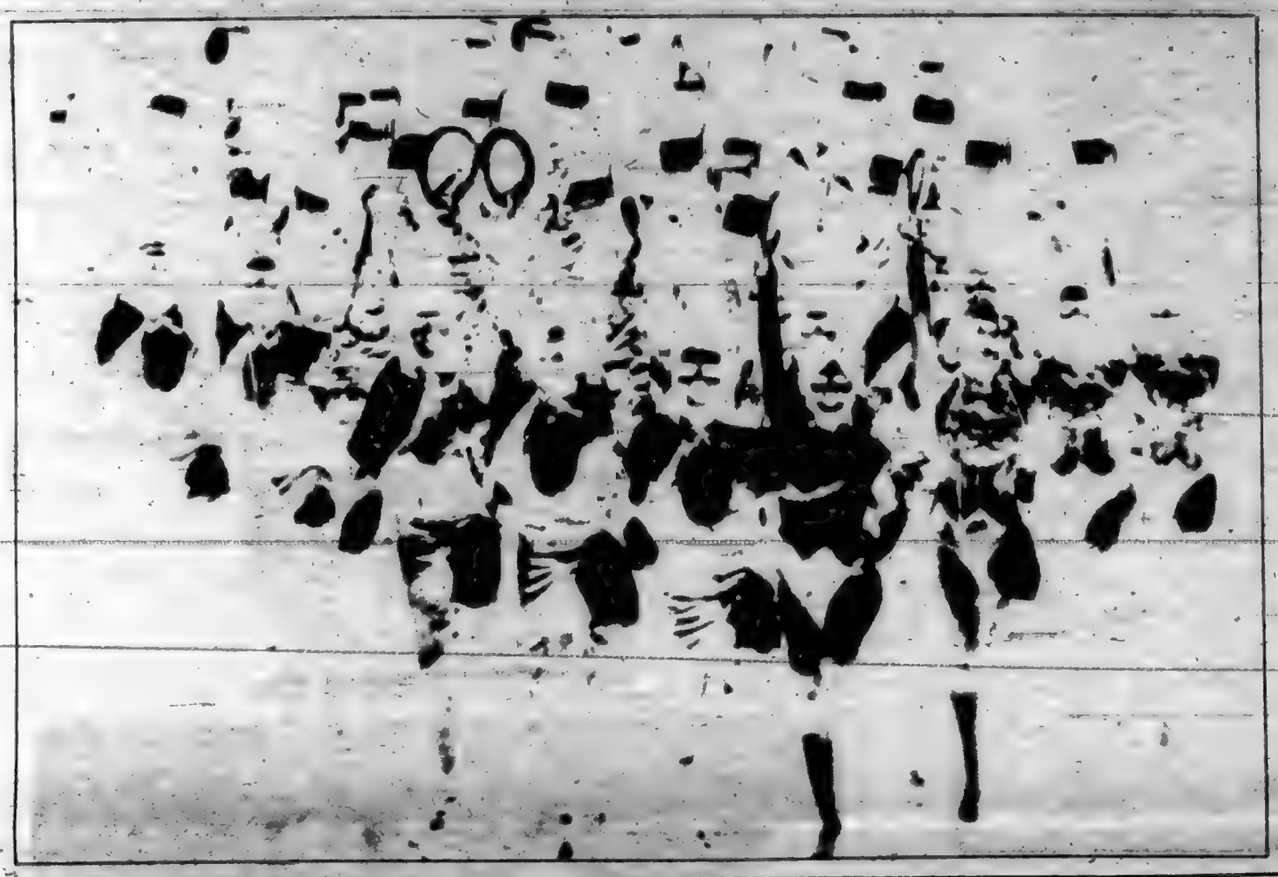
A similar situation provided choreographer-director Michael Bennett (Follies, Promises, Promises, Company) with the concept and material for his salute to musical show-business, and dancers in particular. The results in A Chorus Line are performances both strong and silly, but mostly entertaining.

An immediate problem with the cast on Monday night was the understudy appearing in place of Eivind Harum, as Zach. Harum was no newcomer, having played on Broadway and in the original touring companies. The stand-in, however, succeeded only in those intervals when his voice issued from the darkened orchestra — that is, off-stage. Onstage, the young man stood stiffly, a wooden version of the nearly omnipotent director.

Sadly enough, Zach is to appear opposite the dancer Cassie, his ex-lover, in a scene that articulates A Chorus Line's message. Zach balks at Cassie's return to dancing, telling her she is "too special for the chorus line." Her reply is that they are all special. Everyone wants to be a star, out in front of the line.

In the New York cast Donna McKechnie, as Cassie, was one of the names that turned to gold following the show's opening at the off-Broadway Public Theatre. At Memorial Auditorium, Thia Fadel loomed a head taller than Zach. Her dance solo in "The Music and The Mirror" approached a gymnastic exercise.

To be fair, "The Music and The Mirror" is a punishingly fast number; the dancer is alone, at the mercy of staccato horn lines and pounding rhythms. Certainly, a better-suited woman than Fadel might have been chosen from the line-up.



As might be expected, numbers featuring the full company were a consistent pleasure, particularly the theme "One" and "Hello Twelve, Hello Thirteen, Hello Love." The latter, a boisterous paean to adolescent discovery, seemed to stir up the Memorial Auditorium crowd.

A Chorus Line, Broadway's milestone that it is, stands out in that it lacks a leading star, or pair. Also, as it capitalizes on the uncertainty and striving of young artists in an audition, the show might be especially suited for the second and third string performers who bring it on a national tour, years after its opening.

At Memorial Auditorium that quality worked both ways. Some of the spoken "resumes" were unconvincing; others, like Paul's, a gay Puerto Rican whose story parallels that of co-writer Nicholas Dante, drew astonished applause from the packed Burlington house.

No Lane Series show would be complete without some critical grousing about the old Memorial Auditorium facilities. On that Monday night, the exposed steel beams reflected in set designer Robin Wagner's mirror backdrop evoked the sort of rehearsal hall or dance studio such an "audition" might occur in. Moreover, the thick snow outside muted any bothersome traffic noise.

A Chorus Line continues to pass the audition, as all twenty-four dancers carried the play to its spangled closing piece. No one who was there will be able to get Marvin Hamlisch's theme out of their head for another year.

Return of The Insects

By Beth Rosenberg

Are insects worthy of acclaim? Last weekend's performances of The Insect Comedy at Royall Tyler Theatre proved that the production is indeed deserving of recognition, namely this weekend at the 1980 American College Theatre Festival hosted by Brandeis University. The Insect Comedy is one of six productions selected from 47 New England entries to participate in the ACTF Festival. Winners this weekend will be invited to a national three-week spring festival at the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C.

The Insect Comedy, by Josef and Karel Capek, is an expressionistic play which compares the idiosyncracies of the insect kingdom with the vices of man. The action is perceived as part of the stoned fantasy world of a tramp (Scott Parker), who watches as the insects' lighthearted antics gradually take on an almost nightmarish quality.

Act I satires man driven by lust as male butterflies swoon over the charms of "unapproachable" Iris (Amy London). The materialistic desires of man and the extent of his greed are personified in Act II as a pair of beetles (Cynthia Gould and David Stern) beam with pride over a pile of dung and a fly (Greg Lesch) mercilessly kills crickets for food. Act III is the most frightening in its depiction of two ant armies at war over the road between two blades of grass.

Reaffirmation of life is expressed powerfully through the spectacle of The Insect Comedy. Indeed, what the eye sees is nothing short of an enticing visual treat. Costumes captivate with their imaginative design (Diana Greenwood) and brilliant colors. Sharp contrasts between the red and yellow ants lend credibility to the arch rivalry between them, an overt reference to human racial wars. The overwhelming black garb of the Ichneumon Fly is particularly threatening, especially the fatal sting of its long fingers. Most appealing are the monochromatic outfits of the butterflies and moths, with their blend of attractive colors and gracefully flowing wings.

Music and dance are used in alliance with costume to further enhance the spectacle of insects. Background music suits the character of each creature. A methodic regimental rhythm keeps the army of ants in line. The sophisticated choreography (Jennifer O'Rourke) demonstrates the handling of a complicated but significant part of the production with a remarkable ease. Butterflies flutter and dance, complimenting and accompanying their speech. The choreography climaxes with the dance of the chrysalis (Jennifer O'Rourke), bringing forth an exciting burst of newborn energy, abruptly terminated by death.

The players use several languages to distinguish their insect individualities. The French butterflies preoccupied with illusions of love, the German beetles who have worked all their lives for their pile of dung, the Italian fly who goes to any length for his family, the southern crickets who only want a house all fit our common stereotypes. Here again, the mechanical speech of the Russian red ants is halted when they are defeated by the Chinese yellow ants, who proclaim their victory with an oriental melody.

The Insect Comedy had to be restaged in last weekend's performances in order to suit the Spingold Theatre at Brandeis University. Therefore, the usual Royall Tyler thrust stage was reblocked for the proscenium theatre at which the performance will be held this Saturday at 8:00 p.m.

Cynthia Gould (Mrs. Beetle/Snail) has been chosen to participate at the Irene Ryan Performing Competition at the ACTF Festival. She will compete with 40 regional actors for the finalist or alternate role that could take her to the Kennedy Center. Michael Lucey of St. Michael's College's production of Story Theatre has also been selected for this segment of the festival. St. Michael's is the only small private college of the six New England entrants.

In addition to performing this weekend, the cast and crew will participate in a series of theatre workshops in such areas as acting, directing, lighting and make-up. They will also attend other performances and develop professional critiques.

If the caliber of last weekend's performance is repeated (as I suspect it will be), we should be hearing more about The Insect Comedy — in reference to the national Kennedy Center Festival this spring.

Music With a Message

By Mark J. Cadigan

When I first walked into Memorial Auditorium on January 17th to hear Pete Seeger and Bright Morning Star, I knew that it was going to be much more than a concert. The lobby was full of tables with pamphlets and petitions from VPIRG and other groups, as well as a variety of "No Nukes" bumper stickers. The Auditorium was packed with babies, children, students, workers, parents, etc. – definitely the most diverse crowd I've seen at a concert in a long time.

Joan Keller and Eric Kilburn from VPIRG came onstage and spoke about the causes that would benefit from the show: The Nicaraguan Film Industry, The Burlington Peace Coalition, The Vermont Yankee Decommissioning Alliance, The Central Vermont Peace Coalition, The New England Coalition Against Nuclear Energy Pollution, and The American Friends Service Committee. With that in mind, the audience watched Bright Morning Star take the stage.

Bright Morning Star is a six-member group (two women, four men) whose songs are politically oriented and range from slow and sad ("Acceptable Risk") to raucous and very funny ("Serious Men"). They play a variety of instruments: acoustic guitars, string bass, electric bass, viola, flute, recorder, trombone, bongo drum, maracas, and electric piano. Their singing is pleasant to listen to and blends together well.

Their set concentrated on songs about nuclear power, feminism, and working together to make the world a better place. All topics were appropriate to the tone and purpose of the concert. Nukes were compared to "giant hanging trees" in one song, and the Army's experimental nuclear explosions were handled well in "Acceptable Risk," easily one of the most poignant tunes of the night. It concerned a man who was dying from leukemia because of his involvement in such an experiment. "The risks are all acceptable – acceptable to whom?" was sung with power and sensitivity by Charlie King, accurately conveying the victim's miserable regret of that moment in time when the ground became unbearably hot and he could see right into his hands.

Feminism was the theme of two songs, "Sealevel" and "Truck Drivin' Women." The former revealed Marsha Taylor's adept phrasings and poetic imagery within a tale about a woman trying to find meaning in her life. Sparse instrumentation (acoustic guitar, string bass) and soft blue and pink lighting helped create mood for the piece. "Truck Drivin' Women" was dedicated to three women working on sound and lights for the show and included the memorable description "Ninety pounds of fire in a five-foot frame."

Humor was also evident in "Serious Men," which showcased Court Dorsey on electric piano and vocals. Circus-like keyboard melodies framed such witticisms as "They say the President always thinks before he speaks/ It's no wonder that sometimes he doesn't say a thing for weeks." The audience roared its approval as Dorsey took a humble bow.

Working together was emphasized in "Going Down the Valley" and "Simple Givings," the latter of which contained a beautiful recorder introduction. A narrative-type song about Harriet Tubman's famous underground railroad employed the cooperation motif and featured a strong chorus of "C'mon up, I've got a lifeline." As the band pointed out, Tubman's efforts can be an inspiration to us all.

Bright Morning Star received a standing ovation at the conclusion of their set, and it was a nice touch to see the band members applaud the audience as they left the stage. At intermission, two new speakers told the crowd about The Nicaraguan Literacy Crusade and the Nicaraguans' struggle for autonomy, as well as the fact that Seeger came "for gas money and dinner."

several books, enjoys performing music and it's easy to tell. He plays with gusto and tact, as well as a fine sense of timing, and communicates naturally and good-naturedly with the audience. Years of experience have helped him to perfect his art.

Banjo strumming accompanied two old Vermont songs, "Danger in the Hills" and an Indian chant. After breezing through "Turn, Turn, Turn" on acoustic guitar, he seemed caught up with the song's timelessness and his own mortality: "I get older and balder and greyer, and you all stay the same age."

As old as he is, Seeger related quite well to the youngsters on hand, giving comical renditions of "She'll Be Comin' Round the Mountain" and "Abiyoyo." At one point in the latter tune, he skipped around the stage, looking childlike himself. The most revealing moment came at the end of three consecutive flute songs (from Ireland, China, and Japan). The audience was very quiet until one baby began crying; Seeger stopped playing and stared in the direction of the infant. Puzzled, he resumed the song at a noticeably lower volume, as if he were trying to lullaby the baby to sleep. The move worked – the baby had ceased crying by the end of the song.

Much of Seeger's set was comprised of singalongs, and after a snappy Spanish-style guitar instrumental, he introduced a native Nicaraguan song which turned into the biggest singalong of the evening. A banner with the Spanish words to the chorus was lowered from the back of the stage, and the audience harmonized, with the patient assistance of Seeger. He also had some good advice about (metaphorically) singing along: "Musicians can teach the politicians that not everybody has to sing the melody."

Melody was prominently displayed when Bright Morning Star returned and joined Seeger for six songs. Particularly relevant to the anti-nuclear aspect of the night were "Swing Low, Sweet Paddywagon" (a Seabrook chant), and "Solar Power – Inexpensive Energy" (sung to the tune of "Gloria – In Excelsis Deo"), both of which were received with applause and laughter by the crowd.

The concert would not have been complete without "Guantanamera," undoubtedly the singer's best-known composition, which accented the worldwide aspect of the music. Approximately $10,000.00 was raised for the worthy causes previously mentioned, proving that music with a message is of prime importance for all of us today.

WRUV's Spoken Word

At 6 p.m. on Monday, February 2nd, WRUV's Spoken Word program will present Allen Shepherd reading two of his short stories. Mr. Shepherd is a published writer and teacher in the UVM English Dept., and those who have heard him read before have been impressed and moved by his serious stories and reduced to hysterics by his comic ones. Don't miss him.

We welcome anyone who writes, talks, acts or reads to contact us about appearing on Spoken Word at WRUV, 489 Main Street, Burlington. Please call Tim Brookes at the UVM English Dept. (656-3056) or WRUV's Public Relations Officer, Elise Brown at 656-2247 (WRUV office).

Reviewing America

By Max Lesselbaum

"American Scene" painting is the term given to the suburban art of Molly Luce. In the 1920's and 30's, the burgeoning of small town USA in literature and art paralleled the beginning of American Scene and Regionalist painting. The tone of this new American aesthetic can be found in the words of Sinclair Lewis, namely, that "Main Street is the climax of civilization."

The retrospective of Molly Luce's work at the Fleming Museum shows the life of America through eight decades (1917-1980). Luce's development as a Regionalist painter is concomitant with the changing rural landscape — from a bucolic urban view to the later industrial darkening of the landscape.

A feeling of unattached gregariousness is seen in Luce's characters. They remain isolated within a social setting: together, yet alone. A mutual distance is evident in Art Students 1917-1918 as two painters work side-by-side, but remain apart in their convictions and interpretation of the subject. On a larger scale, alienation has its foundation in the ever-changing industrial landscape. Industry, with its ominous towers and exhaust, poses a greater unknown. The New American anxiety is characterized in Pennsylvania Coal Country 1937 where a small town is completely overshadowed by the coal heap of a mining factory. Molly Luce's America in the late 20's is portent of perpetual technological advance. The bite of this realization is consummated in an apocalyptic vision of factory gloom in Pouring a Gun 1935, where accurately captured on canvas are the ugly sprouts of early rural mechanization.

Outside of America, Luce did some painting in Europe in the early 1920's. Her feelings about Italy are expressed in the Madonna 1922. A voluptuous and delicate portrait, Madonna is placed in the foreground of flora and villas. In the same tone, but inspired from a trip to France, is Meditation on the Old Testament, 1922-23. With swirling brushstrokes similar to those of Van Gogh, Meditation is a vision for the voyeur.

In her prime, Self Portrait, 1930, shows Miss Luce young and vigorous, painting a landscape within the painting. The next ten years or so were to be the highlight of her career as the premiere American Scene painter. Allegorical Life of the Artist, 1932 is a whimsical reversed view of Molly Luce, fully clothed, painting in the woods as several nudes watch her. Reflecting back on her childhood is the phantasmagoric vision of Stories My Father Told Me, 1941.

Luce's naturalistic interpretation of wildlife ranges from the cubist animism in the Zoological Gardens, 1927 to the surreal suspension in Cat Off Red Fence, 1954. Her paintings convey an intimate rapport with the work of nature. Molly Luce spent the greater part of her life in Little Compton, Rhode Island. The quiet communal life and landscape is contrary to its precipitous seascape, and the Atlantic is brought into the canvas with all its crash and colour. In Fringe of Phragmites, a muave rockiness is seen through Queen Ann's Lace flowers, lending depth to the bitter grey sky and the sea of vitreolic green. Beach 1975 is one of the best recent works; the pastel blue-green of spring is revived in subtle tones which a lifetime of painting evolved her to create.

The later work, mostly landscapes, lose much of the "American" character of the earlier work. The Regional movement in painting lasted into the 1950's, until it was overcome by abstract and newer art forms. Molly Luce's later work shows a more "colorful" view of the landscape, without the musty charm so characteristic of her brilliant original paintings of the American Scene.

CONCERT

Liv Sparks At Hunt's

By Jennifer Weiss

Livingston Taylor, with the accompaniment of Michael Walsh (bass guitar), John Curtis (lead guitar), and Jean-Do Sifantus (drums), gave a powerful concert last Monday evening. The group poured all their energy into the music, staging a dynamite performance at Hunt's in downtown Burlington. A local guitarist, Nancy Bevins, opened the show. She entertained the audience for half an hour with seven songs, including "On the Roof" and "Bluebird." Most of the tunes were fairly mellow and smoothly sung.

At 8:45 p.m. Livingston and his entourage came on stage. The crowd immediately erupted, springing to life as the band jumped into an instrumental version of Orleans' "Dance with Me." This song's performance and reception foreshadowed an excellent show.

Seventeen songs were packed into the hour-long concert. Livingston explained this brevity by saying, "I don't like fade-outs." This method allows him to cover plenty of material in a short span of time. Among the many songs performed were "On Broadway," which was recently featured in the movie All That Jazz, and "First Time Love," a hit from last summer.

"Over in the Soviet Union," written by guitarist John Curtis, elicited laughter in the audience with its joking about life in the U.S.S.R. Livingston chose to play this one by himself. Other arrangements performed included "Rainbow Connection," the classic "Somewhere Over the Rainbow," "Carolina Day," and "I Got My Pajamas On," a comical children's tale.

Halfway through the concert, Livingston switched from acoustic guitar to electric piano. He played only a few numbers on the piano, but he seemed to have a great time doing it. After a brief return to his guitar, he and John Curtis picked up banjos and delivered a hot rendition of "Midnight Bus" as their final song.

As the band headed toward their dressing room, the fans enticed them back to the stage with their cheering. The first encore, "Jail House Rock," nearly shook the entire building as everyone clapped and stomped their feet. "I Wish I Had a Brain" from The Wizard of Oz followed, featuring John Curtis' interesting percussion: two spoons banged rhythmically against his thighs.

By watching the band members, it was easy to see how much they enjoyed playing together. Throughout the show, they joked with each other and the audience. Apparently, Livingston chose his band not only on the basis of their ability to play, but on their attitudes and personalities as well. He commented that a drummer plays an important role in a band and he would "rather wash dishes than play with a bad drummer."

In 1968, Taylor began his musical career in the "coffee houses" of Boston. He has since progressed to recording albums and touring nationally. Songwriting in the group is handled mainly by Livingston, although John Curtis contributes some arrangements. With the addition of this new band, Livingston Taylor has grown. His music has a new spark, which was very evident in Monday night's concert. Let's hope that the vitality of that performance will be reflected in the band's upcoming album, which is expected to be released this summer.

Wordless Wonder!

By Christopher Scott

Professional mime Trent Arterberry treated a surprisingly large and enthusiastic audience to an exquisitely performed series of skits Monday night in Ira Allen Chapel. As promised, his repertoire covered a broad range of themes, some comical, others touchingly serious.

Arterberry, a ten-year veteran of mime who has toured with various rock 'n roll groups as an opening act, began the evening with an exhibition of some classic sketches, combining the unforgettable talents of mentors Emmett Kelly and Marcelle Marceau with his own perfection of this rare and difficult art. His mastery of movement and facial expression quickly entranced a delighted crowd of all ages.

However, Arterberry's multiple talents were most clearly displayed during innovative skits incorporating music, modern dance, and audience participation. In one scene, he demonstrated the tricky art of seducing a bass fiddle (with some success, I might add). In a special sketch personally designed to pacify rowdy rock fans, the mime demonstrated the finer points of smoking marijuana. He sprung out into the audience and offered "hits" to a select few. By this point, the audience was already addicted and thoroughly enjoying every moment. Arterberry clearly displayed a brilliant comic manner and ease as he continued with several more clever skits involving the audience.

Finally, Arterberry finished the evening with his interpretation of the myth of Icarus, who flew too close to the sun, causing the wax on his wings to melt. This graceful and moving piece was a superb conclusion of a beautiful performance, and the crowd responded with a well-deserved standing ovation. In a word, Trent Arterberry left me "speechless."

ALBUM

The Hunter Thompson of Rock

By Mark Cahill

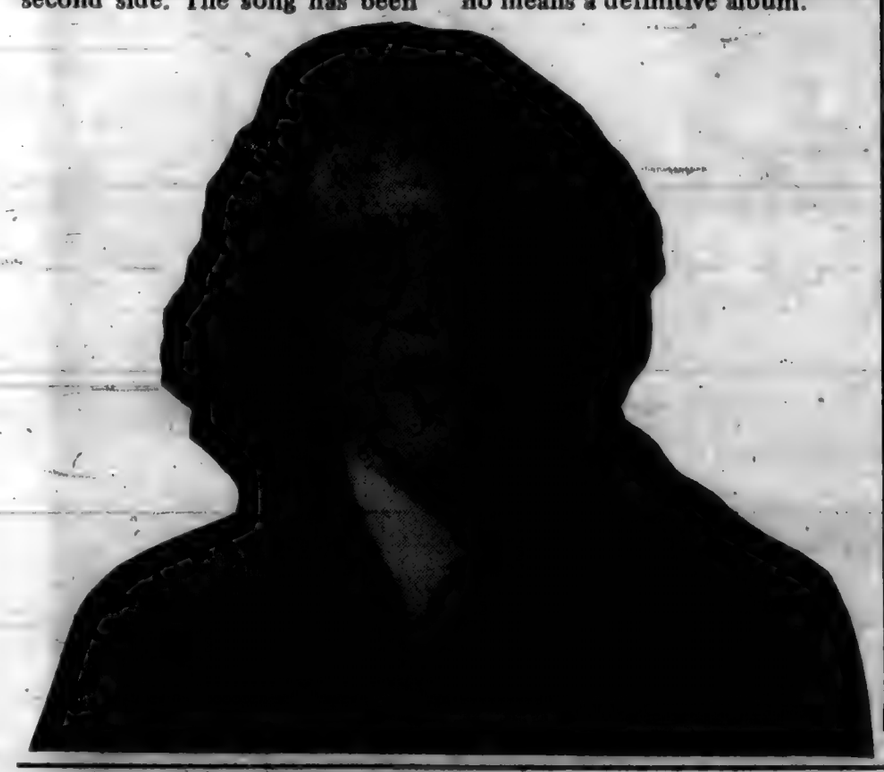
The new Warren Zevon album, Stand in the Fire, provides an interesting overview of the artist's career. The listener is presented with songs from Warren's early days writing for Jackson Browne, right up to his more recent life on the road. However, since the album is live and focuses on older songs, avid Zevon fans have missed out on long-awaited new material.

Side one starts out with the title song, which concerns live performances: "Our lead guitar player's scalding hot/ Zeke's goin' at it/ Givin' it everything he's got/ As anything goes/ What ever it's worth/ I might catch a fit/ But I won't put on my brakes/ Stand in the fire." The song is quite appealing musically, with its heavy drumbeat and crisp, calculated guitar riffs. Unfortunately, Zevon seems to have departed from the lyrical sadism that has given him the reputation of being the Hunter Thompson of the recording industry.

The second song is credited to both Warren Zevon and Bruce Springsteen. Springsteen had an idea which Zevon worked into "Jeannie Needs a Shooter." Beginning with an instrumental introduction that sounds too much like "Lawyers, Guns and Money," Zevon establishes a link between sex and violence: "Her father was a Lawman/ Who swore he'd shoot me dead/ Cause he knew I wanted Jeannie/ And I'd have her like I said."

The last three songs on side one are highly polished versions of "Excitable Boy," "Mohammed's Radio," and "Werewolves of London." I find the latter two songs to be characteristic of the album: both were written about ten years ago and have been sung by a variety of people, including Jackson Browne and Linda Ronstadt. Although I enjoy listening to these altered versions, I still find myself wanting more new material.

I must commend both Zevon and his new band, formerly known as Boulder, for their use of artistic license. Many bands in the past have fallen into a sort of monotony in recording live albums. Zevon and the band have avoided this by changing the songs around, both musically and lyrically.



"Lawyers, Guns and Money," which appeared on the Excitable Boy album, opens the second side. The song has been well honed, and really benefits from the power of the live concert. Again, we find the bizarre connection made between sex and violence: "He raped her and killed her/ Then he took her home/ Excitable boy, they all said."

"The Sin," a new tune, begins with a pounding drumbeat and chopping guitar riffs accented with lots of reverb. Zevon runs through the lyrics at a brisk pace, blurting them in a manner characteristic to new wave rock: "I'm not saying/ You should give a sucker an even break/ I'm talking about the time/ you were cruel for cruelty's sake/ How you gonna pay for the sin?" The song represents a true departure from Zevon's early days, when lyrics provided the framework for his songs. It's dominated by the harsh guitar leads of David Landau juxtaposed to the melodic structure of Bob Harris' electric piano. The success of Zevon's past albums generally hinged upon his ax-murderer approach to lyrics. Here he has proven that he can make his point without becoming absurd.

"Poor, Poor Pitiful Me," and "I'll Sleep When I'm Dead" are both stock renditions which have been given the same cosmetic surgery that each of the other older songs has received. You can tell how months on the road have helped the band to fine tune these numbers.

One of the other benefits of Zevon's touring is that he has had a chance to work in a Bo Diddley remake as the last song, "Bo Diddley Was a Gunslinger/ Bo Diddley." It starts out with a Marty Stinger drumbeat reminiscent of "Not Fade Away," with Zeke Zerngiebel joining in to provide rhythm. The rest of the band builds on their steady foundation. They run through one verse and upon the last word, Roberto Pinon cuts in with an incredible bass line, leading into a short but intense instrumental interlude. Yet, as appealing as I find this song musically, it lacks the lyrical zeal of a Zevon original.

All things considered, I would recommend this album to anyone who does not yet possess any Warren Zevon albums. Due to its "greatest hits" type selection, it provides the uninitiated with a fine cross section of his music. Unfortunately for the die-hard Zevon fan, it is by no means a definitive album.

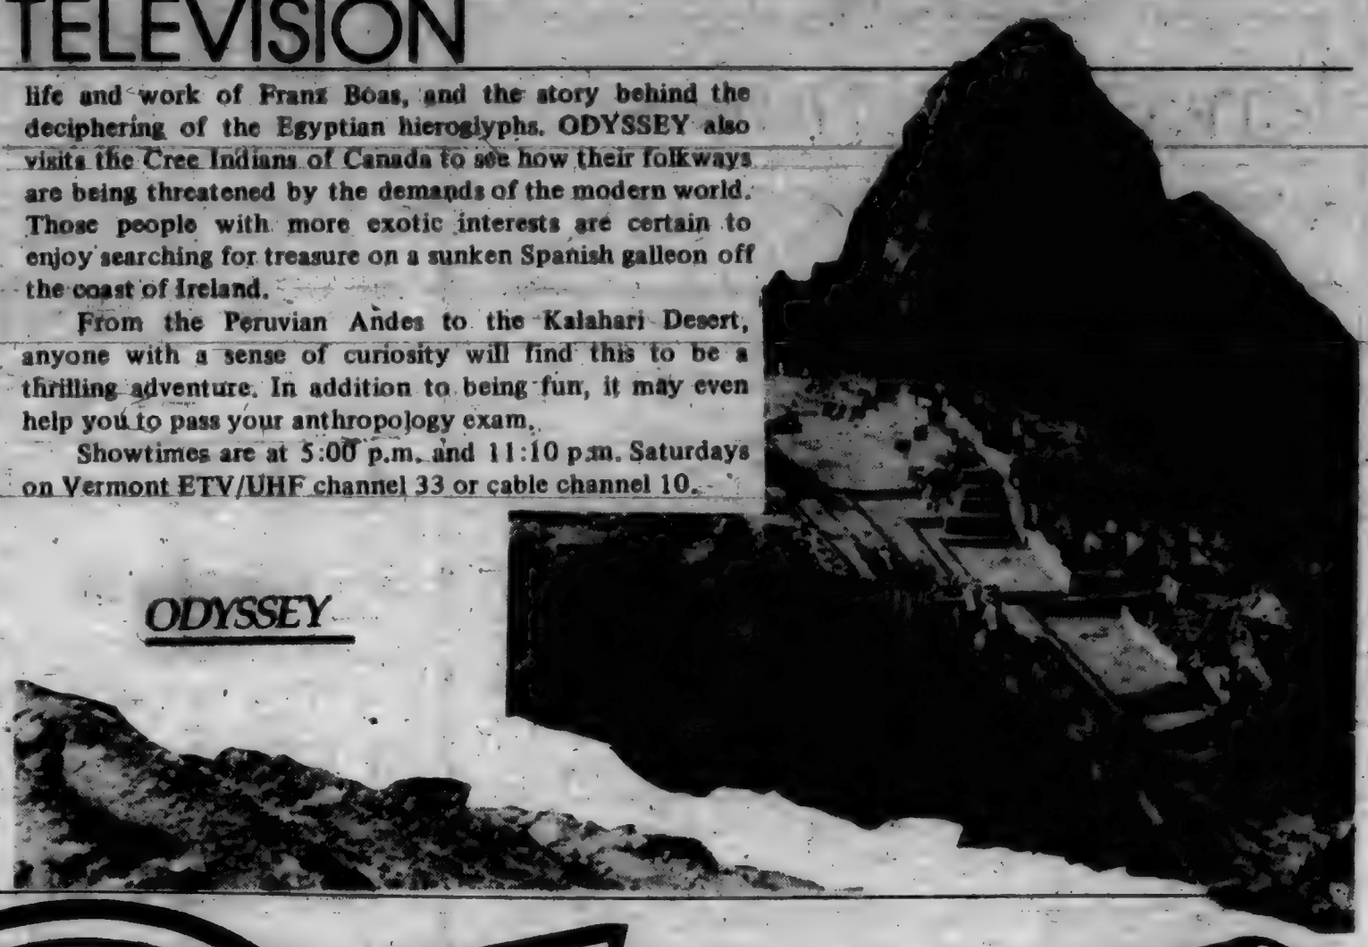
Have you ever wondered what you might be eating for dinner if you had lived in America 12,000 years ago? Just what was the typical American eating before the Big Mac set out to conquer our better instincts? Bison burgers, of course! Although in those days the hardest part was catching the bison not eating the burger.



How the earliest Americans hunted bison with nothing more than stone tools is only one of the fascinating subjects covered in a twelve part series known as ODYSSEY, which begins Saturday, January 31 on Vermont ETV.

ODYSSEY was produced by Michael Ambrosino, creator of the highly acclaimed science series NOVA. He invites the viewer to experience a voyage around the globe, in search of answers to some of the most interesting questions facing anthropologists and archaeologists today. ODYSSEY uses the same documentary format developed by Ambrosino for NOVA in 1974.

Specific programs in the series focus on such topics as the earliest evidence of human life in the New World, the life and work of Franz Boas, and the story behind the deciphering of the Egyptian hieroglyphs. ODYSSEY also visits the Cree Indians of Canada to see how their folkways are being threatened by the demands of the modern world. Those people with more exotic interests are certain to enjoy searching for treasure on a sunken Spanish galleon off the coast of Ireland.

From the Peruvian Andes to the Kalahari Desert, anyone with a sense of curiosity will find this to be a thrilling adventure. In addition to being fun, it may even help you to pass your anthropology exam.

Showtimes are at 5:00 p.m. and 11:10 p.m. Saturdays on Vermont ETV/UHF channel 33 or cable channel 10.

Fletcher Free Library Odyssey

After years of planning and building, the Fletcher Free Library is moving back to its rightful place in December. This brings to an end a six-year odyssey that saw the Fletcher Library's books first removed in 1974, when the old Carnegie Building began to crumble and tilt. Leaking ceilings and cracks in the wall forced the evacuation of staff and books into city hall, where a make-shift public library was set up. A year later the Fletcher Library found refuge on the ground floor of Memorial Auditorium. A $2.4 million bond issue for the restoration of the Carnegie Building (built in 1904) and the addition of a new wing was approved by city voters in 1978. Under the direction of the architectural firm, Anderson, Notter, Finegold, construction started September, 1979.

The new library, nearly 40,000 square feet, is double the size of the former library, and can house a collection with a capacity for over 100,000 volumes. The main reading room in the new wing provides comfortable seating (color scheme is burgundy and gray) where newspapers and magazines can be read. Reference collection, records, tapes and microforms are part of the reading room that looks out on College Street through a huge, three-story-high window. Two tiers of book stacks and study areas are also part of the new addition and can be reached by elevator and two stair ways.

The transition from new to old is successfully bridged through a gradual integration of the Carnegie's architecture with that of the new wing. The vaulted ceiling of the old building has been restored and color schemes were developed according to prevailing colors of the Beaux Arts period. The original stain glass window, made of Belgian glass in 1904, has been cleaned, is energy efficient, and has been reinstalled.

Children's and young teenager's collections are located on the first floor of the Carnegie Building. A local history room with some of the original book stacks, glass floor and brass railing, a community room that seats 120, meeting space for groups and organizations are all part of the updated new Fletcher Free Library, as are security alarms, a sprinkler system, modern lighting and new equipment. Two parking spaces in front of the new library are being changed to 30 minute spots, while six parking meters on the east side of the Library will allow 1 hour parking. Handicapped parking is available in front of the main entrance on College Street. To allow for a smooth transition, the Library was closed from December 1, reopening for business in the middle of December.

Dedication of the new Library was on Sunday, January 4 at 2 p.m. A week-long celebration of the public library and the Burlington community followed.

Enjoy a Wild Experience

Have you ever spent a cozy night in a snow shelter at sub-zero temperatures or watched the winter sun come up from the top of Camel's Hump? Would you like to learn more about snowshoeing, wilderness ski touring, winter camping or bicycle touring? Then the UVM Wilderness Experience Program is something you will want to participate in.

W.E. is offering the following activities this semester: Feb. 22, Winter Shelter Workshop; Feb. 28--March 1, Snowshoe Overnight on Camel's Hump; March 8, Wilderness Ski Touring Trip; March 14-15, Snowshoe Overnight in the Bristol Cliffs Wilderness Area; March 21-22, Snowshoe Overnight on Mt. Abraham; and April 18-19, Easter Lily Bike Tour.

On the overnights no experience is necessary. The ski touring trip is for those folks who feel comfortable on X-C skis but would like to sharpen their backcountry techniques.

A minimum tuition fee is charged to cover the cost of food, transportation, equipment and instruction. All Instructors are UVM students who have had special training in the activities encountered on these trips.

To sign up for these activities, come to Wilderness Experience in the Student Activities Office in Billings Monday --Friday, 8:30 - 11:30 a.m. For more information, call W.E. weekdays at 656-2060. Sign up soon, limited spaces are available.

Capitalize In the Capitol

Information and application materials are now available for the 1981 Federal Summer Intern Program. These summer internships are located primarily in Washington, DC and are open to UVM undergraduate and graduate students. Workshops are being held at the Center for Career Development, 322 So. Prospect Street to explain the program and application process. For more information, contact Lesley Wendell at the Center, 656-3450. The application deadline is March 1, 1981.

New Officers In F.M.A.

The annual meeting of the House of Delegates of Fraternity Managers' Association, Inc. (FMA) was held Tuesday, October 28th in Marsh Lounge. Deborah Field (Pi Beta Phi) and Charles Liamos (Kappa Sigma) were re-elected to the Board of Trustees of the Association. The following were elected for a one year term: Amy Aronoff -- Alpha Chi Omega; Stan Faryniarz -- Theta Chi; Anthony Kvedar -- Phi Mu Delta (Alumnus); Katherine Boll -- Delta Delta Delta (Alumnus).

Serving the second half of 2 year terms are Hugh Mattison (SAE Alumnus) and George Cunavelis (Kappa Sigma Alumnus).

Besides the election of officers, refund checks of over $5300 were distributed to member sororities and fraternities which represented half of the refund for Fiscal Year 80. Officers elected at the first meeting of the Board of Trustees are as follows: Hugh Mattison -- President; Charles Liamos -- V. President; George Cunavelis -- Treasurer; Amy Aronoff -- Clerk.

FMA is a non-profit financial management organization representing most of the Greek houses on campus. It was founded in 1965 and works to assist its members in financial advice, accounts payable, accounts receivable, billing, purchasing and budgeting. Their office is located on the second floor of Billings Center.

For Women Who Like Softball Only

Any women interested in trying out for the softball team who were not at the organizational meeting on December 10th must report in person to Room 210 on or before Monday, February 2, 1981, for informational and eligibility processing.

'Comfortably Numb'

Aside from a popular but docile nationwide anti-nuke movement on American college campuses— which has spent most of its time and resources sponsoring pop-rock concerts, having managed little comprehensive analysis of the nuclear energy dilemma other than pointing to the perils of waste disposal—all's passive, almost numb, on the campus front in 1981.

A recent New York Times commentary clued in on a growing American "amnesia," and our less than sensitive, intelligent scrutiny of the complex environmental, economic and political issues we face. Instead, hawkishness and impulsive outcry has become politically convenient for Americans, the commentary said.

Perhaps the conservative tide which Mr. Reagan rode to the Presidency has taken a much stronger hold on students' political attitudes than we'd like to think. Fewer job opportunities and a bleak economic picture may now have us rather impervious to everything but our resumes.

Hawkishness? National polls last year showed a near majority of American college students willing to fight a war in the Middle East— serious, intelligent analysis or not.

Maybe it was the use of American troops and exploding dum-dum bullets against student demonstrators eleven years ago that has effectively reduced campus political action to a whimper. Dum-dum bullets can do that. Or perhaps we're all afraid that a strong stand on any issue today will mirror the often naive, shortsighted, and more often hypocrtical campus protest of the past. The trashing of administration buildings and the empty rhetoric of affluent white students and misguided liberals changed relatively little in America. Perceptions, maybe. But the harsh political realities of life in America, particularly for minorities, are as pervasive today as they were then.

In Poland, college students have joined Lech Walesa and Solidarity in their fight for a five day, 40-hour work week and a liberalization of the Polish Communist Party line. The students are now on strike, the third such daring move in eleven years. In 1970 and again in 1976, Polish university student and professors struck in protest of the Polish leadership's hard-line cencorship of the intelligentsia,as well as its attempts to politically manhandle the popular and highly influencial Catholic Church.

On all three occassions the striking students felt a tight political pinch, one much more serious in consequence than any student protestor in the United States would face, though the more radical members of Students for a Democratic Society in the 1960's were offered no picnic after their Society died a factional death and it was time to face the courts.

The Polish students have put themselves on the line, in many cases carrying through their protest despite threats of imprisonment and a halt to their potential careers. A Communist Party directive and investigation is all it takes to end the future of a blacklisted student in Poland.

Here in the U.S. we now sit "comfortably numb," as the song goes. "Activism" is nothing more than a boring catchphrase on campuses today.

Letters To The Editor

Common Sense vs. Exploitation

To the Editor:

In today's politics there's one big issue: common sense vs. exploitation. The puppets of the political machine are deaf to public opinion; citizens' organizations are losing for lack of clout.

We've scattered our efforts among too many causes. Can't we get together to create a grassroots alternative to government by the military-industrial establishment? Popular movements have ignored political realities, while 1980's independent parties don't come from the people or arouse much interest. Can't we channel our frustrations into one great movement, big enough for all our causes — a movement for clean government?

The Democratic-Republican machine is not invulnerable; it's just smarter than we are. It gets a head start by filling up our ballots with ambitious yes-men, supports their campaigns, and keeps them in line throughout their terms by its power to end their careers if they don't conform.

Nomination is the key to challenging this racket. What the people need, desperately, is their own independent party, nationwide, for one purpose: to put candidates on ballots. We need hundreds of unbought officials to represent our needs, and we must nominate them ourselves. A big order? See what we give now — effort, money, dedication — but scattered and ineffective.

Party power could help us win on many issues. Independent majorities in Congress could reject the self-serving schemes of the Pentagon, the international bankers, the giant corporations. Where are the leaders with exciting new ideas to focus people power where it counts? It's none too soon to start for 1982.

In Support of VPIRG

To the Editor:

I read with great disappointment a note in the recent UVM alumni magazine to the effect that the University would no longer act as a collection agent for fees donated to the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG) due to student non-participation. I was both a sophomore at UVM and a VPIRG volunteer when the University graciously agreed and the student body voted overwhelmingly to support this worthwhile consumer protection and civic affairs organization.

It is always uncomfortable to have to admit that not only times have changed, but with them, the values that one once felt were so important and progressive as to be self-evident. Nevertheless, it is difficult to believe that more than 50% of UVM's student body doesn't deem it important enough to donate 75 cents per month per semester to underwrite the efforts of an organization whose accomplishments redound directly to the benefit of those very students.

Perhaps the enthusiasm of the average UVMer to participate actively in VPIRG has diminished, but one cannot conceive that those students don't support the need to fight for better autos, safer toys for infants, more comprehensive testing of potentially hazardous substances, greater responsiveness by public utilities and the like. VPIRG and the PIRGs in other states and on other campuses have done this and more.

I hope that some of the spirit and activism of the late 60's and early 70's can be rekindled at UVM, and that the student body will reconsider its support and participation with a genuine and valuable "public interest" group.

Sincerely,
Edward S. Hochman, '74

Crime's Being Ignored

To the Editor:

Crime has gotten out of control in our society. It has become so prevalent, that I believe most of our generation ignores it. We ignore it when the most creative members of our society are assassinated. We ignore it when we hear news about a peer being killed, raped or victimized in a less violent way. We also ignore it when our peers vandalize and hurt other people. What has become of our world? Some of the fault may be in our judicial system. Potential criminals know that their chances of getting away unpunished are good. The concept of being innocent until proven guilty contributes to this. What has become of the punishment of a guilty conscience? What has become of the punishment of ostracization by peers when one individual behaves in an inappropriate way, or in a way that harms society? I believe where the "punishment" for asocial behavior cannot be escaped, because morality is an integrated part of every individual's self-conscience. Imagine a world with no crime, because nobody wants to hurt another person. The people who live in that world will know that behavior which hurts a person or the society will be punished in this life with a punishment that fits the crime. Let's be responsible for our own behavior — and enforce one idea that everybody be responsible for their own behavior.

Not Tickled With Trent

To the Editor:

Trent Artenberry may be skilled in mime, but he didn't impress me. The machoness and sexism in his performance angered and disgusted me. Besides his preoccupation with lots of guns/overkill, (who needs to glorify that image in this country today?) the desperado sketch in which he raped a woman against her will, molesting her as she struggled, until she finally "gave in and enjoyed" the sexual assault. This myth — that women actually enjoy forced sex — rape — is a very commonly held myth: on TV, movies, literature, the police, many men. It's not true. Ask a woman who has been raped (one out of every three women in the U.S. is raped at least once in her life) if she liked it.

Trent had better get the sexist rape mentality and racist jokes (cowboys and indians) out of his performance.

Women who have been raped or assaulted can call the Women's Rape Crisis Center, 863-1236, for help.

. . . To Provide for the Common Defense

By Mike Hambly

In case of defense 'tis best to weigh
The enemy more mighty than he seems,
So the proportions of defense are fill'd
–Shakespeare's Henry V (II. iv. 43-45)

Modern weapons of offense are vastly stronger than modern weapons of defense.
–F.D.R. in 1933

The splitting of the atom changed everything, save man's thinking.
–Albert Einstein

Feb. 1986 – The early warning system at SAC headquarters near Omaha, Nebraska has signaled incoming missiles 13 minutes ago. Since then a check has been run to ensure that it's not a false alarm caused by a computer malfunction (as has happened from time to time). Due to technological advances, the time it takes for ICBM's to go from Russia to the U.S. mainland has been reduced from 30 minutes in the 70's down to 14 minutes. It turns out it wasn't a computer glitch. Our MX missiles and land-based ICBM's are prepared to launch. Seven seconds later, 94 percent of them are destroyed by the Soviet surgical first strike; what was once Utah and Nevada is now a crater. Three minutes later Warsaw Pact tanks begin to roll into West Germany. Simultaneously an ultimatum is given to the President: Do not contest the Soviet occupation of Europe or you will lose your cities in a second wave of missiles. The choice is between suicide and surrender.

The above is one of dozens of scenarios that America may be confronted with in the future if it fails to develop a coherent strategy to bolster its defenses. This should be our no. 1 priority. After all, we could have the most equitable social welfare policy in the world, adequate health care for everyone regardless of income, and a total absence of all forms of discrimination (all worthwhile goals); yet what good would all this be to a populace lying dead amid radioactive rubble? But we should not throw money indiscriminately to the boys in the Pentagon. A more cost-effective approach is needed. Herewith is a brief look at America's nuclear arsenal.

The biggest boondoggle of them all is the proposed MX missile system. The plan is to shuttle around 200 missiles among 4,600 underground shelters in Utah and Nevada so that the Russians will never know just where they are. This $50 billion shell game was concocted under the assumptions that (1) the Salt II Treaty would be ratified and that (2) the Soviets would comply with the pact; thus they'd have a limited supply of warheads and wouldn't waste any in a necessarily token effort to zap some MX's. Assumption 1 proved incorrect and Assumption 2 appeals to those who believe in the Easter Rabbit and Tooth Fairy. Hitler's Mutual Non-Aggression Pact with the Soviets was an object lesson to them that treaties are made to be broken. Moscow could have a stockpile of 10,000 warheads by 1985; 17,000 by 1990 – which would be enough to wipe out the MX system twice over. Ex-Secretary of Defense Harold Brown estimated that an additional $30 billion would have to be spent to counteract that threat.

The MX is said to be necessary because of the vulnerability of our 1,053 stationary ICBM's housed in silos throughout the Plains states. Improvements in the Kremlin's missile-guidance systems have created a "window of vulnerability" for this base leg of the U.S. strategic triad. A second leg is composed of the senescent B-52 bombers that date back to the early 50's. They've been revamped to facilitate low-altitude forays into enemy territory and appear to be holding up for now (though they may soon need some Geritol in their fuel mixture). The massive B-1 bomber that was slated to replace the B-52's was KO'd by the Carter administration for being a budget-buster.

Another controversial weapon scrapped by Jimmy was the neutron bomb or "enhanced radiation device." In the early days of atomic weapon development such bombs were considered duds since they failed to explode but instead just seeped radiation. The goal now is to get them to do just that. Some refer to the neutron bomb as the "ultimate capitalist weapon" since it kills people while leaving property intact. The bombs would have limited use as anti-tank weapons against Warsaw Pact forces invading Germany, to lessen the devastation from such a conflict. There's one catch though. After being exposed to a neutron bomb, a tank driver wouldn't necessarily die for several hours. Can you imagine the fanatic fury of a Soviet tank army that knows it's going to die in a few hours anyway?

The third leg of the triad, nuclear submarines, is considered our ace in the hole. The new Trident missiles will have a range of 4,000 miles, allowing the subs carrying them to hit Soviet targets from ten times as many possible undersea locations as they can now. Our anti-sub technology is considered superior to the Soviets'. Both sides are working to discover a breakthrough method of tracking the subs (a la The Spy Who Loved Me). Until that time, neither nation should delude itself into thinking it can make a first strike, no matter how devastating, without incurring "unacceptable" retribution from enemy subs.

I feel that a crucial mistake in nuclear policy was made in May 1972 when the U.S. signed a treaty curtailing Anti-Ballistic Missile development. What better allocation of defense funds than for a defensive weapon that intercepts incoming missiles. Some radiation would result no matter how well ABM's were perfected, but fallout and mass physical destruction could be obviated. They could be used to protect our stationary ICBM's, thus eliminating the need for any monstrous MX subterranean racetracks. What was the logic behind the decision to stop ABM development? Supposedly they would escalate the arms race. Well, nuclear one-upmanship is alive and well despite the ABM restraints and our costly warheads, not to mention 225 million people, remain sitting ducks.

The Russians are working feverishly to develop lasers or particle beam weapons for application in space warfare. Their goal is a "killer satellite" capable of rendering American reconnaissance and early warning satellites useless. This is an area where the U.S. should be devoting much more time and money than it is now. As it is, we're said to be two years behind them.

What about America's overall strategy? For much too long our policymakers have put blind faith in the concept of MAD (Mutually Assured Destruction) which assumes the threat of the destruction of their cities by a U.S. retaliatory strike would act as a restraint on any Soviet button-pushing. When the Kremlin was totally dominated by veterans of WWII who remembered vividly the 20 million casualties suffered by their country, MAD may have had some basis in reality. But to an increasing segment of the party hierarchy, WWII is just dry history. These Dr. Strangeloves have been trying to convince the old-timers that a nuclear war is "winnable," in the sense that during the first 24 hours after a full nuclear exchange, the U.S. would lose 100 million people while "only" 30 million Russians would be killed (according to civil defense experts on both sides). This is truly a unique concept of "winning" since, according to many scientists, within a few years the highest forms of land-dwelling life would be cockroaches, flies, and mosquitoes. If just 10 percent of all nuclear weapons were exploded, according to one study, 80 percent of the Earth's protective ozone layer would be destroyed. Yet just a 20 percent reduction would result in intensified ultraviolet radiation that would badly burn and blind surface animals. The intense heat could very well melt the polar ice caps, submerging much of the world's land surface. Much plant life would die, significantly reducing the amount of oxygen in the air. Some say the Earth might shift on its axis, forever changing the world climate. Every link in the food chain would be radioactive.

All of this is, of course, mere speculation, but it's getting harder to ignore the ever-increasing litany of scientists that there is no silver lining for anyone in the dark cloud of atomic Armageddon.

Preparing for Exams...

Got, Got No Time

By Grove Potter

By failing to schedule several days of study time before exams last semester, the UVM administration in effect said that what we students do here is unimportant. And they are doing it again this semester.

Rushing exams the week immediately following classes quells any opportunity to organize, mull over, and generate new and perhaps creative ideas about our chosen studies. The quality of education at UVM drops.

Recall the ridiculous cramming that went on just before exams last term and ask yourself if you couldn't have done a more thorough job if given just a few more days. A quick read through your notes and maybe a scan of some missed reading assignments and... splat... there you are with the rest of the innocent bystanders in this irresponsible money saving ploy, trying to scrawl out something logical from the tidbits garnered over the mad weekend.

Perhaps some of the very organized students among us can bring together a semester's work in one weekend. But most of us have enough trouble just finishing papers, projects, and labs before scampering into exam rooms, like bambis trotting up to meet Godzilla.

The University Calendar Committee, in 1978, framed a document outlining the terms to be considered when preparing the school calendar. It states that the total number of teaching days for an academic year must at least equal 139 days. According to these guidelines, this should be accomplished with the most even distribution between fall and spring terms possible. Ideally that would be 69 days in the fall term and 70 days in the spring. Registration should take place on the Tuesday following Labor Day, and classes should begin on Wednesday. This avoids conflicts with summer jobs. The last fall term exam should be scheduled no later than December 22. The document also states that Saturdays and Sundays may be considered reading days (how generous).

When during the seven year cycle extra days are available during the fall term, the committee proposes the following usage priority: (a) one reading day, (b) one reading day and fall recess, (c) two reading days and fall recess, (d) two reading days, fall recess, last exam scheduled prior to December 22.

Having made it through three fall terms without "recess," it seems that an extra study day before exams is more valuable than a mid-term pause. Clearly, the administration should reappraise its opinion on the relative value of "recess."

For the spring term, the committee proposes that "a two day Town Meeting recess (Monday and Tuesday) will coincide with the first Tuesday in March." The administration has had no difficulty in squeezing this recommendation in the past two years, so that Monday and Tuesday has become just Tuesday. If this proposal can be ignored with such apparent ease, why can't extra study days be slipped into the calendar? After all, what's good for the goose is good for the gander.

The UVM administration should bend over backwards to institute a formal reading period before final exams. Cancelling classes on the Tuesday or Wednesday before exam week, leaving the rest of the week and weekend to study, would be sufficient to instill the proper awe of, and allow adequate preparation for, the semester's gala summation.

It is painfully clear that the administration relishes the opportunity to reduce the time of student occupation of UVM. Unfortunately, what they fail to realize is that the extra effort expended in offering a study period would be repaid many times with greater cerebral development among its students, and correspondingly, an enriched reputation as an academic institution geared to the fulfillment of the intellectual quest.

Drugs: The Freedom to Choose

By Evans-Raymond Pierre

Few would deny a man or woman the use of tobacco or alcohol if they desired it. To deprive them of their self-indulging pleasure would violate their freedom to choose.

Why then are marijuana and other illegal drug users denied their freedom to smoke, shoot, or sniff, whatever they please? Anti-narcotic laws violate drug takers' fundamental freedom to choose what they will do with, and to, their own bodies.

In the last decade more than $5.5 billion have been wasted by the federal and state guardian angels attempting to prevent people from buying, selling, making, taking, or growing drugs. In 1978 an estimated $35-45 billion worth of drugs were bought and sold. These huge figures rivaled the revenues of Exxon and General Motors. But at the same time our almighty federal and state benefactors seized only $2.5 billion worth of drugs.

If your first reaction is to get down on your knees and praise Big Brother for saving us from the drug menace, consider that drugs are easily acquired and are available on street corners of any large city. In New York City, marijuana is sold and used in the open day and night. Drugs are available in bars, on college campuses, in ghettoes, in the suburbs. Drugs are available in the military, and unfortunately in primary and secondary schools. People who want drugs can and will get them, despite Big Brother.

But even more ironic is the fact that the illegal status of drugs, and its threat of arrest for possession, creates a risk factor for sellers that sends the price of drugs sky high. For the wealthy user, price is no object. But for the poor user, financing a drug habit means robbery, larceny, and often murder.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, heroin addicts commit 19 percent of all property crimes to support their $100 to $300 per day habit. These addicts are responsible for 100,000 robberies, larcenies and auto thefts each day. These crimes amount to $10 million in human and property damages a day.

Organized crime has the biggest stake in the illegal drug traffic. The risk factor allows these criminals large profits, and so, drugs have replaced alcohol as their major source of revenue.

Thousands of drug users die annually from drugs that were "not what they were supposed to be," since illegal status of drugs denies the user protection from con artists selling tea, baby powder, or poison. If your illegal heroin is "no good," you can't complain to your local Better Business Bureau.

The problem is not illegal drugs, but self-righteous citizens and politicians who take it upon themselves to dictate what stimulants men and women will and will not take. All drugs, legal or illegal, can be dangerous to its users and society if the latter misuse them.

Nine to 10 million of the 100 million alcohol users in the U.S. suffer from alcoholism. In 1971, $10 billion was spent making up for lost work time of alcoholic employees. Alcohol is responsible for 800,000 traffic accidents a year in which 2 million people are seriously injured and 28,000 killed. Drunk driving will kill more Americans in the next 18 months than the number killed in the Vietnam conflict. Alcohol is related to 40 percent of all admissions to mental hospitals, and alcoholics have a suicide rate 58 times greater than non-alcoholics. Alcohol is implicated in more than half of the fights or assaults resulting in injuries, and about 30 percent of violent (non-traffic) deaths. Almost 2.5 million individuals are arrested annually for public intoxication. Alcohol-related deaths may be as high as 200,000 a year. Cost estimates for property damage, medical expenses, law enforcement, courts, divorce, and treatment programs associated with alcohol and alcoholism range from 20 to 50 billion dollars.

There are 60 million tobacco users in the U.S. More than 30 percent of the males between 35 and 59 years of age who die, die from tobacco-related deaths. Tobacco is responsible for 85 percent of the deaths from bronchitis or emphysema, 30 percent of the deaths from arteriosclerosis, 30 percent of the deaths from heart disease, 90 percent of the deaths from lung and trachea cancer, and 50 percent of the deaths from cancer of the bladder. Almost 300,000 people die prematurely from smoking.

But alcohol and tobacco are legal because our society recognizes the right of the individual to voluntarily take into his body these stimulants. Yet we do not recognize that this right should be applicable to all drugs because one's freedom to do what he chooses with his life and body is sometimes repugnant to some of us, and therefore blinds us from the fact that we let our morality stand in the way of others' freedom. At one time or another, certain voluntary acts between consenting people have been illegal (homosexual relationships, inter-racial marriages, alcohol drinking, certain sexual acts) not really to protect anyone's person or property, but to satisfy what some believed should be the "proper" behavior of others. This is now the case with "illegal" narcotics. We pass judgment on whether the voluntary drug taker is to be allowed to choose his own life-style.

If drugs were legalized, the risk factor would disappear. So would the price of drugs and the incidence of drug-related crime. Low income drug users would no longer have to prey on innocent citizens to pay for their habits so that the money and manpower now spent to suppress the drug traffic could be better spent on fighting real crimes. Organized crime would let go of the no longer profitable drug market. Drugs would be safer, drug users would have recourse to the law and would be able to sue fraudulent drug manufacturers and sellers.

The legalization of all drugs would not bring about an increase in drug use, for as it was pointed out earlier, all drug users can in a matter of hours, at the most, acquire any drugs they choose to. Legalization of drugs should not be taken for approval of drugs in any form or manner. It would merely be the recognition of the right of each individual to choose whether or not to indulge in drugs.

The sale of drugs, like the sale of alcohol and tobacco, could be taxed and regulated by each state. Most states would probably set an age limit ranging from 18 to 21 as the legal age when one could use drugs.

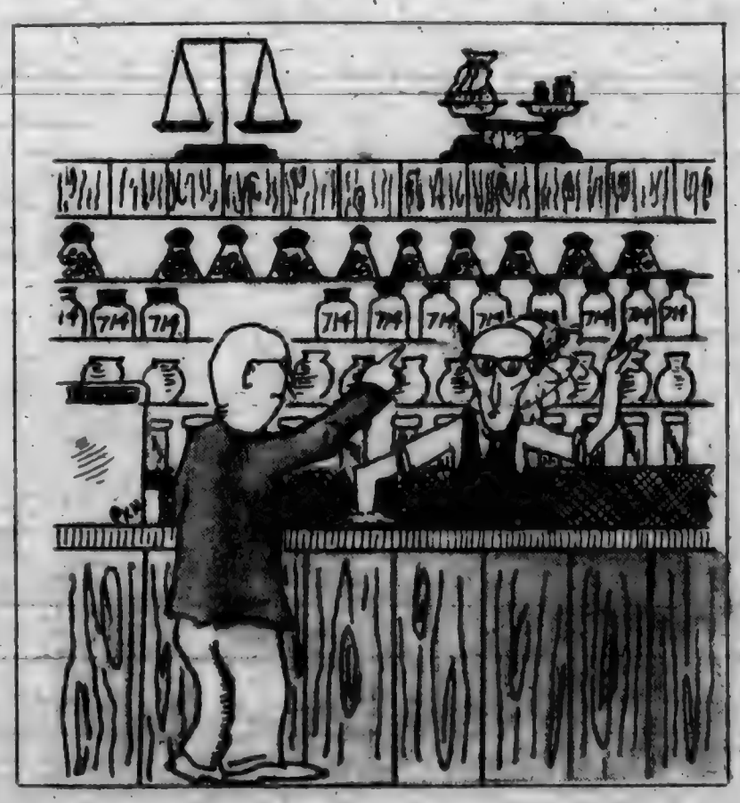
Drugs like alcohol are intoxicants, and should by law be restricted to use in non-public areas (i.e. bars, homes, etc.). Driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs is putting innocent people's lives in danger, and under no circumstances should be tolerated. Extremely harsh penalties must be enacted to punish intoxicated drivers.

Alcohol, drugs, and cigarettes are of no real use to any one. In the end all of its users would be better off by choosing not to indulge in these habits. Children depend on their elders to set positive examples, provide information, and support when it comes to dealing with drugs, alcohol and tobacco.

Freedom does not mean that we will be presented with easy choices. On the contrary, the more freedom we have to choose, the more problems, conflicts, and questions we face, and the more seriously we have to reflect on the choices that are presented to us, not an easy task.

Drug users, like all, must decide what is best for themselves and should not permit others to decide for their lives. That is what is meant by freedom to choose.

Hey. No Problem...



By Scott Greb

It's comforting to know that one never has to worry about anything. Echoing throughout the meeting places of America, I forever hear that familiar, "Don't worry about it. Everything will work out." I took a scuba course this summer. When the instructor explained what the procedure would be when one ran out of air, "Hey, no problem. Think before ascending: 'Everything will work out in the end';" I still wasn't convinced.

But this article concerns other more timely matters. I think it would be interesting if the University kept an on-going tab of students' attitudes and ambitions during the four or more, or sometimes less, years of academic enrollment. Those interested in such a follow-up could easily mail to each student a questionnaire to be answered before each school year.

As an incoming Freshman at the University of Vermont, describe briefly just a few of your goals and interests you plan to meet during this most questionable period of your life...

Well to start out I have always been a person of low goals with very little outside interests. You see, I have always been a follower. While at the University, however, I plan to become an honest to goodness leader. Through attainment of leadership skills I will teach others those traits which I myself have developed. Because I feel if one can lead, he no longer has to follow. I plan to educate and yet become educated myself. I will be a full human being which I have been advised by my advised high school advisor can only be accomplished after one attends college. I realize the time to find out what you want to become later on in life can only happen while at college. I have only four years to decide what I want to be for the next fifty or more years. Four years you can see then is very little time. I must therefore use each second to its utmost potential. While brushing my teeth I will be thinking about that life-time career. Before dozing off to sleep during classes I will devote a few contemplations towards my life-time career. This way, after my college years, I will be ready to start my life-time career.

...This is now the start of your sophomore year. What new ambitions and interests do you plan to meet for the next nine months?

The first year was a bit disappointing. All those movies I watched on television about college life while I was in high school were very misleading. All students talk about is partying and sex all the time. I find it difficult finding differences between college life and my high school experiences. I still have no idea as to what I want to become later on in life. I am upset and will not answer any more of this question.

...Two more years to go. Your junior year. What are your thoughts now as to interests and desires?

Thank God only two more years. I still don't know what I want to do later on in life. I have come to realize I enjoy doing everything. There is not one activity I do not enjoy doing. Gee. Maybe I could become a master of all trades. But do I need college for that? No real plans for this year. I plan to take things as they come. When you aren't looking for something, you end up finding it. So why plan for it in the first place.

...You have almost made it, graduating senior. This being your last year of college, just how do you plan to spend the remaining months?

Firstly what sort of question is this? Is this part of a follow-up questionnaire? To be frank, it would have been far more effective if I had answered this question before my other three years at this college. Nevertheless, I plan to no longer be a follower. I plan to become an honest to goodness leader. Through attainment of leadership skills I will...

Aldermen OK Bond Issues For March 4th

By Wendy Goodrich

In a race against time the Burlington Board of Aldermen met on Tuesday, January 20 to make final decisions on which bond issues would be included on this year's March 4 ballot.

Superintendent of Schools Luther Gutknecht and Jim Gilson, Chairman of the School Board, acted as spokesmen for the School Department Capital Improvements Bond. The $1.8 million bond would cover costs to make all Burlington school buildings more energy efficient, structural revisions to fit safety codes for children and the handicapped, and update Burlington High School to satisfy new health and safety regulations.

Although the school department currently receives 56% of Burlington tax dollars, this amount does not cover unpredictable gas and oil price increases or recent changes in health and safety codes governing state school buildings.

"We are responsible to the people of Burlington and to the health and safety of children and the handicapped," said Gutknecht.

The aldermen agreed. "We should take advantage of this," said William Blanchard, Alderman Ward 5.

"If anymore cuts are made it will greatly affect police and fire services."

The bond issue "is needed and should have everyone's support," added Bob Sweeney, Alderman Ward 4. This was the general consensus among the aldermen, and the bond issue was adopted on to the March 4 ballot for voter approval.

Energy conservation was also a key issue in the "Let's Kill-A-Watt" campaign. This was a two-part presentation given by representatives of General Electric intended to sway passage of the Energy Conservation Bond. According to G.E., the $2 million bond proposal would provide Burlingtonians with a cost efficient energy conservation system through a hook-up to a General Electric load balance generator, enabling consumers to save on their gas and electric bills, especially during peak hours of the day.

The bond would allow each citizen to purchase the hook-up for $142. Even if the individual did not wish to invest in the system, they would still have to pay for the bond.

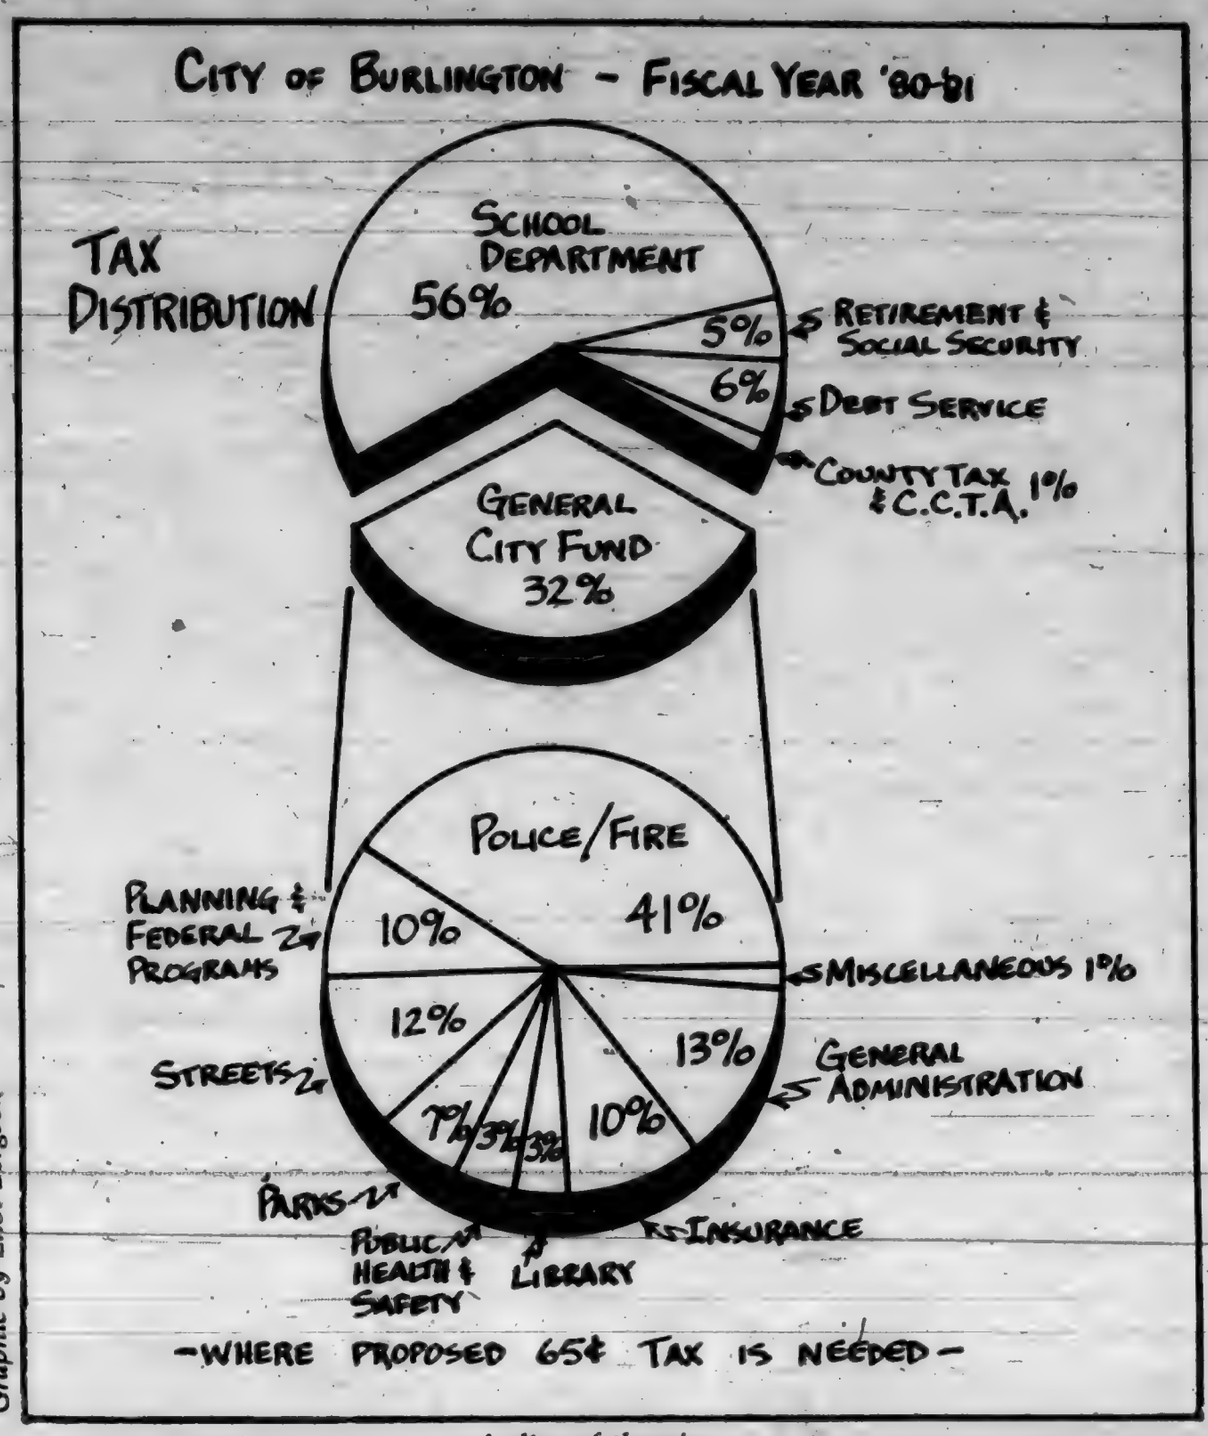
Alan Kieslich, Alderman Ward 4, dissented. "Many people have already purchased a system through the private sector; it seems unfair to those who conserve and have conserved by having to pay for two systems."

Kieslich cited other difficulties with the bond. "Because of technological changes, a system such as this may be obsolete in ten years and the consumer will be stuck with paying for it." He also felt it should be left to each individual to decide what kind of system is best suited to their needs, and when they could best benefit from having one installed.

Joseph McNeil and Bob Collins, representing General Electric, explained that it would not be mandatory for citizens to purchase the hook-up, and if they did they could disconnect it at any time. Those that did purchase the system would lessen demands on power, thus citizens would not need to buy more power at higher prices, they said. In this way, fairness would be achieved through conservation, and savings could be as much as $150,000 per year over an extended period of time. There would be "long run significant savings," according to Collins. Burlington Mayor Gordon Paquette added that "it would be a service Burlingtonians would take advantage of."

A majority of the aldermen sided with these arguments and approved the bond for the March 4 ballot.

The next item on the agenda was the Tax for City Purposes. The 65 cents is not a "catch-up" over past defeated taxes, according to Mayor Paquette. He said that because of inflation and higher capital costs, the city budget has increased markedly over the past years.



Presently, citizen tax dollars are divided between the School Department, which receives 56 percent, a General City Fund of 32 percent, the Debt Service 6 percent, Retirement and Social Security 5 percent, and a county tax and CCTA 1 percent. The 65 cents tax, however, would be used solely for the General City Fund. Thirty-five cents is needed for improved services and operating expenditures, 16 cents goes for capital expenditures, and 14 cents would be designated to cover inflationary costs.

Chip Wadhams, Alderman Ward 6, questioned the amount of the tax. "Sixty-five cents seems more to me than I thought. The voters may turn it down and then we are left with nothing rather than a compromise."

The mayor responded that "it is an honest evaluation of the whole budget, and we are asking for only the bare necessities." Earlier he said that cuts had already been made to bring the tax down to the 65-cent mark.

City Treasurer F. Lee Austin later confirmed the urgency of the tax. "Costs have gone up.

Goddard College Fights Back

(CPS) – Goddard College, an experimental Vermont school, has been denied accreditation in the wake of what Goddard officials call "conservative backlash," but they're vowing to fight this force that they say could cause the demise of other "progressive" institutions like their own.

Citing financial problems of "an extreme nature," the New England Association of Schools and Colleges revoked Goddard's status on December 23rd. A special commission that had been reviewing the books of a number of New England schools concluded that Goddard was unable to carry out its own programs and objectives in light of its severe shortage of funds.

But Goddard's assistant to the president, Will Hamlin, flatly says, "They are dead wrong." While he acknowledges the college's financial difficulties, he says they are no more severe than many other schools.

Hamlin instead blames conservative pressure from traditional schools for the decision.

"Many educators say there are too many colleges around to sustain the high quality of education and to sustain enrollments," he explains. "There is a kind of move to phase out progressive schools like ours because people think they are outmoded."

"We were the victims of that conservative thought. We're the whipping boys," he adds.

Millicent Calaf of the New England accrediting association concedes that such pressure exists, but denies that it in any way affects the findings of the association.

"There may be some public criticism about the number of schools, but there is absolutely no correlation between a progressive nature of a school and its accreditation," she says. "Progressive schools feel themselves in the minority, and they feel persecuted, but Goddard's case was extreme for any school."

Indeed, David Warren, vice president for academic affairs at

"There is a kind of move to phase out progressive schools."

Antioch College, echoes Hamlin's feeling that experimental schools are getting especially rough handling from accrediting bodies.

He says that non-traditional schools are increasingly being reviewed by traditional standards, which is a departure from the accrediting processes of the last decade.

"The issue raised is one we are going to see as a recurring problem in the next three to five years," he warns. "It's the kind of thing we feel one has to be constantly vigilant on."

Antioch's accreditation is currently in no danger, due in part to the more liberal nature of the north central accrediting association, but Warren says Antioch draws fire from other regions because of its unique organizational structure.

Antioch maintains campuses in several states, all of which are operated through a national office in New York.

State schools have charged Antioch with "turf invasion," Warren says, which is more technically termed "acting in constraint of trade."

"Schools are complaining that institutions like ours are stealing their students by operating a campus in their state. What they officially charge is that we cannot monitor 'quality control' on each campus when our administration is located in New York," he says.

"I can imagine that this issue of 'quality control' will soon be as big an issue as financing to the creditors. It's only a matter of time until even our north central association will be hit by this kind of thinking," he figures.

Both Hamlin and Warren agree that all a school can do is continue to prove its competency. Goddard is in the midst of preparing an appeal to the New England association which will point out the school's budget is indeed balanced, and that its cash flow problems should be solved by the end of the academic year.

Until that appeal is heard, Hamlin says that there has been no panic at Goddard.

Cannibus and Chemotherapy

By Jonathan Goodspeed

The use of marijuana, says Dr. Irwin Krakoff, Director of the Vermont Regional Cancer Center, is not necessary to battle the side effects of cancer chemotherapy. THC, a derivative of marijuana and currently administered to cancer patients, is sufficient, he said.

The cancer center, located in the De Goesbriand Unit on South Prospect Street, received THC from the federal government for the first time six weeks ago. Some 15 patients have been treated with THC since then.

But Dr. Joseph Dickerman, a member of the Pediatric Department at the UVM Health Science Complex, is backing a bill in the Vermont Legislature calling for the use of marijuana, the leaf and stems of the hemp plant, as a therapeutic drug. The bill was approved by the Vermont House Tuesday, and now goes to the Senate for consideration.

"This bill is not necessary," says Krakoff, explaining that the gelatin tablets he uses, which contain the THC, work with adequate quickness. "These tablets are administered an hour before chemotherapy, in order that the patient avoid the nauseating effect."

Dickerman, on the other hand, claims that the gelatin tablets take up to four or five hours before their influence is felt. He would prefer to have cancer patients use marijuana because the effect is immediate, especially if smoked.

THC is the primary ingredient in both the capsules and marijuana, yet there have been only a few studies on THC, and the results of these have been inconclusive. Many other anti-nauseous drugs, such as Compazine, have been regularly used in the past.

But "it appears likely that THC is more effective," says Krakoff. However, not even THC can alleviate severe side effects of chemotherapy, he said.

THC's therapeutic effect only occurs during the "high."

Two studies were conducted recently, one in Boston and the other at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota. In Boston, young adults were given the tablets to prevent nausea, yet they were not told what the tablets contained. The same procedure was repeated at the Mayo Clinic, but older patients were used. The older patients affirmed its usefulness in relieving nausea, but they didn't like its "dizzying high." The younger patients, who probably had previous experience with THC (in the form of marijuana), thought it was useful, and they liked it.

Researchers have attempted to separate the "high" from the therapeutic effect, but the two appear to be closely associated.

Asked if the "high" of THC could scare people away from its use, Krakoff says most cancer patients will not turn down a drug which will alleviate the nausea.

THC is a controlled substance. In the past it was strictly regulated by the Drug Enforcement Administration, so that doctors could not prescribe it as they could morphine and codeine.

But because of the evidence pointing to its therapeutic usefulness, the National Cancer Institute, the Food and Drug Administration, and the Drug Enforcement Administration agreed that THC would be made available to Cancer Center/Teaching Hospital complexes, Krakoff said.

The National Cancer Institute now supplies the De Goesbriand Unit pharmacy. Any Vermont doctor who wants to use the THC pills for treatment can apply directly to the De Goesbriand pharmacy and obtain it there.

Under the new Vermont bill, the Commissioner of Health, Lloyd Novick will administer the program through which physicians can obtain marijuana. Physicians must prove that patients who are to receive the drug are "involved in a life-threatening or sense-threatening situation, and who are not responding to conventional drugs, or where these drugs are causing severe side effects."

The Health Department would be in control of the stock of marijuana; it would not be at the hospital.

Another stipulation in the bill states that if the Commissioner of Health cannot obtain marijuana from the Federal Government, he may obtain it from "other available sources." These include the Vermont State Police, the attorney general, and local law enforcement officials. This marijuana must be "tested for impurities or poisons," because most of what is confiscated is "street marijuana" of unknown quality.

"When analyzing pot, you can only detect what you are looking for," said Krakoff, commenting on the hazards of analyzing street marijuana. "If you are looking for angel dust, you analyze the specimen for angel dust. But if you don't know what you are searching for, it's difficult to make sure the pot is absolutely safe." He said physicians should never use analyzed street pot, but only that which is obtained from the federal farm in Mississippi.

Although marijuana can be ground up and placed in food, it will predominantly be smoked in the treatment. "That is a very unpredictable way to administer a drug," Krakoff says. Krakoff said that with a pill, the physician has much more control. He pointed to marijuana's potential for lung damage when smoked.

Major S.A. Assembly Tonight

All students are urged to attend a special Student Association forum tonight concerning the adequacy of Billings in meeting student needs, at 7 p.m. in the North Lounge of the Billings Center.

The governing board of the Student Association will present a proposal for a new student center, and it is essential that students attend and voice their opinions on the matter.

Twice in the past fifteen years, similar proposals have been made, but they have failed due to a variety of factors. The Student Association wants a lot of student input on this measure to insure a proper consideration of the matter at this time.

Both the University administration and the governing body of the Student Association is seeking ways to ease the pressure on Billings, a registered National Landmark completed in 1885. More people travel through this building each year than reside in the rest of the state of Vermont.

The building was designed and built under the supervision of world-renown architect Henry Hobson Richardson and named after Fred Billings, a railroad tycoon born in Woodstock, Vt., who wanted to give the University a "beautiful library." The building was converted into a student center in 1962.

Since then, enrollment increases have put a tremendous strain on the building. A discussion of these growing problems, and a possible solution will be discussed at the meeting.

Hooker Official Claims Innocence For Love Canal

By Maggie Hayes & Eliot Bergson

Donald Baeder, former President of Hooker Chemical and Plastics Corporation, defended Monday that company's controversial involvement in the Love Canal tragedy by disputing the accuracy of medical reports and associated media coverage.

Baeder blamed the Niagara Falls, N.Y. School Board for the seepage of the toxic chemicals into neighboring residential homes.

Hooker Chemical has been charged with irresponsible handling of poisonous chemical wastes at their Love Canal disposal site near Niagara Falls, N.Y. Discovered in 1976, seepage of that toxic waste, which had been buried during the 1940's and 50's, has been blamed for miscarraiges of pregnant women, malformations in infants, and chromosomal damage in area residents.

Suits stemming from these allegations totalling $14 billion are still pending in New York State courts.

In opposition to various authorities, most notably the Environmental Protection Agency, which laid the blame on Hooker for the spillage of hazardous wastes, Baeder told a packed audience in Carpenter that "perceptions of Love Canal deviate widely from the facts"

Baeder said that no concrete medical evidence exists for the contention that Hooker's wastes were the direct cause of the adverse health effects. He disagreed with the findings of the much-publicized report prepared by Dr. Beverly Paigen, a consultant for the Love Canal Homeowners Association. The report substantiated Love Canal area residents' belief that the poisonous wastes caused the health problems.

Baeder also disputed the conclusions of the New York Health Department and the State University of New York, Buffalo, citing instead the findings of a special panel appointed by New York Governor Hugh Carey in June, 1980.

"As a result of this review, the Panel has concluded that there has been no demonstration of acute health effects linked to exposure to hazardous wastes at the Love Canal site," Baeder read from the report.

The report continues, saying that"...chronic effects of hazardous wasted exposure at Love Canal have neither been established or ruled out yet, in a scientifically rigorous manner."

The former Hooker executive acknowledged the existence of psychological damage to area residents, but claimed that this was due to biased reporting of

Mayoral candidate Richard Bove

Bove Challenges Paquette

By Richard Hyland

Despite losing the Democratic mayoral nomination to incumbent Gordon Paquette by an overwhelming margin, Richard Bove, a 43-year-old restaurateur, announced plans last week to run for mayor on the ticket of the Taxpayer's Party.

Bove, who was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention last summer and presently serves as a Fire Commissioner, stated that the main incentive for forming an independent candidacy is his objections to the proposed 65 cent tax increase requested by the Paquette administration for this year.

The additional revenues from the tax increase are earmarked for expansion and improvement of many city services, including the addition of eight new positions for both the police and fire departments. Bove argued however, that the proposed tax increase is just too big a bite out of citizens' budgets for one year. The increase should have come in piecemeal fashion – gradual increases spread out over the last few years.

"People spend or put more money away when taxes haven't been increased in the last few years," Bove said. "Now that they get hit with this 10 percent increase in property taxes in one year, where are they supposed to get this money?"

Bove agreed that improvements such as the police radio system, and the repair of the Lakeside Ave. underpass justify a tax increase, but were long overdue.

"These police radios didn't break down yesterday," he said, "and Commissioner Pomerleau proposed their repair way back when. City Hall just didn't listen."

Other proposed reasons behind the tax increase, such as the hiring of additional firemen, did not meet his approval. "I think we could live without the eight new firemen," said Bove, "and it wasn't until the Fire Department asked for eight new positions that Commissioner Pomerleau requested eight new policemen. We could tighten our belts there."

Another problem on which Bove expressed concern was the housing crunch in Burlington. A former landlord of several properties himself, Bove perceives that there has been a great de-personalization in landlord-tenant relations over the past several years.

He observed that the typical Burlington landlord is no longer the man who lived downstairs. He is more of a tycoon who hires a manager to be the middle-man, someone to make the necessary repairs and collect the rents. With this lack of personal contact between landlords and tenants, Bove believes that many, though not all landlords, are prone to take advantage of the housing crunch.

He stated that he knew of many landlords who purposely leave their apartments vacant during the summer just so they can take in groups of students who will be able to pay higher rents.

"We are freezing out middle-income and lower-income people in the housing market," Bove said, "and this causes many families to go on welfare or to be stuck in sub-standard housing."

Bove stated that, if elected, he would support the creation of a Fair Housing Commission as outlined by the mayor's Task Force, but he also expressed reservations about financing this Commission through a registration fee levied on each of the city's rental units.

Bove believes that such a fee would just be passed on to the tenants in the form of higher rents charged by landlords.

He also stated that he would support the continuation of the business inventory tax as a source of revenue for Burlington. Bove vehemently denies the validity of the Lake Champlain Chamber of Commerce argument that the elimination of this tax would attract more businesses to the Queen City.

"If the elimination of this tax would attract new businesses to the area, where would you put them?" Bove responded.

"There's no room for these additional businesses unless there is the elimination of more housing. And would a big store like Woolworth's reduce its prices to the consumer as a result of an elimination of the inventory tax? Of course not! It seems as if Burlington has always had to cater to the wishes of big business and live under threats of 'do this or else'," he said.

Bove also believes that this deference to the interests of big business is responsible for the controversy surrounding the Southern Connector, the proposed four-lane highway designed to connect the central business district with the interstate junction on Route 7 in South Burlington.

"City Hall has not listened to the complaints of the South End citizens that this highway will carve their neighborhood in two," said Bove, "and by connecting the construction of this highway with the construction of the more popular Northern Connector, City Hall is ramming this project down the throats of the citizens."

Bove recalled a similar situation during the urban renewal period of the early Sixties when citizens were told that Jordan Marsh would not locate a store in Burlington unless St. Paul and Champlain Streets were closed off. "Well, we closed off those streets," he said, "and Jordan Marsh has still not arrived here."

At the conclusion of this interview, Bove revealed that he has received several political "backlashes from City Hall" since declaring his independent candidacy. One such incident Bove cited was the confusion concerning the number of signatures that were required on his petitions to place his name on the ballot. According to Bove, he was instructed by City Clerk Frank Wagner to obtain 150 signatures. But after doing so, Bove learned in subsequent phone calls to City Attorney Joseph McNeil and the Vermont Secretary of State, that only 30 signatures were actually needed.

In addition, Bove disclosed the context of a phone conversation he had with Alderman Maurice Mahoney (D – Ward 1) in which the alderman attempted to discourage Bove from continuing his campaign. Bove charged that Mahoney's call, made at the request of Mayor Gordon Paquette, consisted of "threatening hints and innuendoes" that Bove would be removed from his position as Fire Commissioner and that his standing in the city Democratic party would be jeopardized if he continued as an independent candidate.

"I don't like the idea of being intimidated in this election," said Bove. "I've got the pulse of the people of Burlington. I know what they want and I know what City Hall could deliver to them."

The CIA Then

(CPS) – Over 300 cases of documents that tell the story of the Central Intelligence Agency's involvement in the student movement from 1946 to 1967 have turned up on the library shelves of Stanford's conservative think tank, the Hoover Institute on War, Revolution & Peace.

The documents apparently contain the same information that various student groups have been unsuccessfully trying to pry loose from the CIA under the Freedom of Information Act.

The documents, recently discovered by a freelance researcher, tell the story of how the CIA helped fund the old National Student Association (NSA) to insure that U.S. students had the funding and organizational support to travel to foreign countries to oppose the International Union of Students, a group with close ties to the Soviet Union.

Knowledge of the CIA-NSA connection became public in 1967 when the now-defunct Ramparts magazine exposed the relationship, causing an international scandal and organizational chaos in NSA, where only top leaders knew of the agency's support.

Partly because of the organizational chaos, subsequent NSA administrations were unaware that the Hoover Institute had purchased the files directly from NSA in the aftershock of the revelations.

"The files went all the way back (to the beginning of the CIA-NSA relationship) and were quite extensive," recalls Rick Stearns, a former NSA vice president for international affairs who handled the transfer of the files.

"We knew they were irreplacable original documents, so we began looking for a library interested in receiving them. The only library that replied to our inquiries was the Hoover Institute."

The Institute, which has since become well-known itself as a conservative recruiting ground for the Reagan administration, examined the files in the attic of NSA's Washington, D.C. headquarters, which were also owned by the CIA. The Institute, with Stearns' permission, then shipped the files back to its library in California.

But NSA's organizational memory – clouded by defensiveness over the CIA connection and several splits and mergers – was short. Now called the U.S. Student Association (USSA), the group has been trying to convince the CIA to release similar historical documents about the government's manipulation of college student affairs.

"We've been struggling to

Now

(CPS) – After an eight-year hibernation, student opposition to on-campus recruitment by the Central Intelligence Agency has resurfaced at several institutions. In scenes reminiscent of the late sixties and early seventies, demonstrators have told the CIA to get off campus, criticizing their covert operations and recruitment efforts.

The demonstrators, spearheaded by the Washington-based Campaign for Political Rights, have not yet caused much concern among CIA officials. An agency spokeswoman says signs of opposition "are just isolated incidents that don't reflect the generally-warm receptions we receive at most campuses."

Isolated or not, the bitterness and anger at several schools are very real. At the University of Massachusetts, for example, about 200 students marched on the campus placement service office several weeks ago, holding signs such as, "Don't interview with murderers and torturers." The rally's organizer, Judy Weiss, was quoted by the campus newspaper as saying that "the university is legitimizing the CIA and condoning what it does by having them here (recruiting on campus)."

At the University of Illinois, the scene was similar in October when a few hundred students gathered on the Quad to protest different types of covert CIA activities. On the eve of a recruitment drive by the agency on that campus, Neal Fox, a university employee, criticized the CIA's aid to right-wing dictatorships in the Third World, and called upon other students to dissuade friends from applying to the agency.

"Obviously, the CIA is going to continue recruiting"

And at Yale University in New Haven, the crowd was not as large but the message was the same. A group of protesters held up a sign saying, "Stop murdering our Latino brothers and sisters."

While the CIA said those protests are unrepresentative of the majority of student sentiment toward the agency, a spokeswoman at the Campaign for Political Rights calls them the stirrings of a larger movement against the CIA, sparked somewhat by the Reagan landslide victory in November.

"The CIA issue will be a hotter issue all over the campuses," predicts Susan Benda, the campaign's college coordinator. "Many more universities have organized to raise the issue of covert recruitment, and with Reagan in there, things will get even more active."

The campaign's main priorities, Benda says, are to raise the awareness of students about the past activities of the CIA, and to the facts by the media.

Baeder specifically referred to a company press conference that went virtually unnoticed, and a CBS 60 Minutes segment he said was "a violation of professional ethics in reporting." He said the show's producers used only seven minutes of a two-hour interview, to make his firm look "bad."

This type of prejudiced reporting, Baeder said, caused crucial facts concerning the Love Canal site to be overlooked, facts that point to the innocence of Hooker Corporation in the matter.

Baeder explained that his firm was forced to sell the land to the town's School Board in 1952, rather than face condemnation of the land through the city of Niagara Falls' legal exercise of "eminent domain."

Although he did not deny that the poisonous wastes originated at the firm's waste site, Baeder claimed that his firm did not have management control and responsibility over the land for 27 years. The Niagara Falls School Board did, he said.

When asked at an earlier press conference if the School Board had knowledge of the specific toxic wastes at the site, Baeder replied at length that the board did in fact know the dangers.

He went on to say that the deed of transfer to the School Board specified that the Board leave the site unaltered. It was subsequent development of the land by the Board seven years later that caused the rupture of the wastes containment vault, and the ensuing damage, he said.

Baeder explained that the firm had tried to discourage the School Board from changing the land's use from a children's play area to the site of a public school building. Hooker suspects that the disruption of the land cover caused the release of the poisonous substances.

When the situation was first brought to the chemical company's attention, Baeder said it had been willing to pay one-third of an estimated $800,000 clean-up cost, with the School Board and the State of New York paying the rest. The School Board decided against the proposal.

On March 15, 1979, the State agreed to relocate the families and purchase their homes, at $40,000 apiece. This pushed estimated clean-up costs to $45 million, and Hooker refused to help, because Baeder said, this move was "totally unwarranted and unnecessary."

The high cost of this move and the subsequent relocation of 710 additional families in May, 1980, by President Carter caused the State of New York and the Federal Government to bring suit against Hooker. Area residents had done so earlier.

"The Federal government is an interloper," he said. "The states are doing a first-rate job in this area." In both the lecture, and the press conference held earlier, Baeder said he was "vehemently" opposed to the Superfund legislation passed in the twilight hours of the 96th Congress. That legislation provided $1.6 billion to help locate and clean up dangerous chemical waste sites.

Baeder said this would impose an unfair burden on the chemical industry when dealing on the foreign market, and that these higher costs would eventually be passed on to the consumer.

When asked if it was proper for federal intervention in serious cases, such as the explosion of a chemical dump in New Jersey last year, Baeder held to his belief that the states are doing a good job regulating the industry.

Baeder also disagreed with the position that the Federal government should be involved in possible international incidents of contamination. According to a December 3rd Associated Press report, TCDD, the most deadly dioxin, has been found in herring gull eggs on the Canadian side of Lake Ontario. A Canadian study said that the only two possible sources of the poison were Hooker Chemical's plant in Niagara Falls or Dow Chemical's plant in Midland, Michigan. Baeder dismissed the reports, saying "I don't know of any relationship between human fatality and TCDD."

During a question and answer session at the end of the lecture, Baeder outlined his underlying philosophy about his firm's work.

In answer to a question regarding "acceptable risks," Baeder replied that "a risk free environment is nothing. Not being willing to take certain risks, I don't see how we can prosper... you're proposing a risk free environment and I don't buy that. I don't think the American public will buy that."

"If the American public wanted a risk free environment, we wouldn't allow the driving of cars... or the smoking of cigarettes. I don't believe we want to move in that direction. We make mistakes but we make progress," he added.

Without a tax increase we will have to cut manpower, which can only result in less services to the public." Austin also explained that in the upcoming fiscal year "the city cannot maintain services anymore" unless the tax gains voter approval.

"We need to convince the taxpayers of the need for services; if anymore cuts are made, it will greatly affect police and fire services in particular," the mayor said.

The aldermen supported the mayor by voting favorably for the tax and including it on the ballot.

The Creation of a Fair Housing Commission was not as popular among the aldermen as the other bond issues. At midnight, when the issue came up for debate, the aldermen limited themselves to a five minute statement. In between yawns and irritability the proposal to put the Fair Housing Commission on the ballot was defeated.

Although the aldermen make the preliminary decisions as to what bond issues will be included on the March 4 ballot, Burlington voters control the final outcome of the School Department Capital Improvements bond, the Energy Conservation bond, and the Tax for City Purposes. The Creation of a Fair Housing Commission will now depend on petitions for support, and Housing Task Force spokesmen have promised they will pursue their effort in a special election.

Coor Charts UVM Future

By Eric Frothingham

What will the University of Vermont look like five years from now? What will be the principles and priorities guiding UVM in the first half of the 1980's? These questions are discussed in a report by UVM President Lattie Coor, called The University of Vermont: A Five Year Plan.

"Our task at the University of Vermont is to anticipate those changes in the external forces that will influence higher education in the decade – enrollment patterns, program demand, financial support – and to make the appropriate internal changes necessary to respond to the environment," Dr. Coor said in the report. The report outlines "a proposed five year plan for the selected initiatives we (UVM) must take, and to invite campus participation in perfecting the plan."

Although designed to generate campus participation, the plan was put together very late last semester, at the beginning of final exams, and has not been publicized to the general student body.

Asked if the time that was chosen for publication might not decrease the likelihood of campus participation, Dr. Coor replied that the time of publication was chosen for two reasons. First, publication coincided with a meeting of UVM's Board of Trustees. Also, Dr. Coor said he made a conscious decision to move the plan out to the campus in a "low-key fashion." He said the fact that the plan had not been made available to the general student body earlier was part of that "conscious style" of presentation.

However, the Five Year Plan does offer opportunity for increased student involvement in the administrative decision-making process, at least in theory. It may open the way for student expression of support for University programs, as well as disapproval of programs that students feel are not meeting their needs, and for ways to improve those programs.

In a recent interview, Dr. Coor outlined channels for student participation in the formulation of priorities regarding resource allocation and educational objectives.

First of all, Dr. Coor said, students should contact Michael Deutsch, S.A. President, Rick Green, S.A. Vice President, or Ken Jaffe, editor of the Vermont Cynic. These students are all on an advisory committee to Dr. Coor, which meets regularly. Second, students are encouraged to write Dr. Coor directly about an issue they feel strongly about. He said he would arrange to have those students heard by members of the administration.

Dr. Coor expressed great interest in having an open forum this semester to publicly discuss the plan.

The Five Year Plan is a response to some longer term UVM objectives framed by the Trustees through an ad hoc Committee on Financial Planning. These objectives theoretically commit the University to maintaining the quality of its student body, faculty, and facilities, despite a potential decrease in enrollment and financial resources. Demographic trends indicate that there will be a 40% decline in college age students in the northeastern United States (the area from which UVM draws the majority of its students) by the year 1994. In response, the University has decided that it may decrease enrollment accordingly in order to maintain current quality standards for admission.

Despite restrictions, the Five Year Plan charts a number of University objectives. One of them is the "centrality" of the student. The school must maintain a strong commitment to anticipating and meeting changes in student needs, the Report says. Ways in which this could be done are increasing student-faculty contact outside the classroom, decreasing class size where feasible and appropriate, and developing an improved program of advising, Coor said. Dr. Coor also expressed the need for an improved system of student evaluation of the University programs.

Another major goal cited in the Plan is to emphasize the "distinctive features" of the University.

The Plan also notes the importance of "enhanced oppor-

Approaches To an Old Disease

The UVM Church Street Center will be offering a series of four workshops on diabetes, entitled "Diabetes in Children: Hopeful New Directions," "Diabesity: Prevention and Rehabilitation," "Focus on Feelings: Diabetes and Work, Family, Friends, and Recreation," and "Resources: Local and National."

All persons concerned with bodily functions in relation to food and exercise and lifestyles, as well as those with a family history of diabetes and obesity, are invited.

Emphasis will be given to most recent advances in prevention of non-insulin-dependent diabetes, "Diabesity," on avoiding the long-term complications of diabetes and on achieving a quality of life way beyond mere survival.

The workshops will be held February 24th, 27th, and March 3rd and 10th at the Church Street Center, 135 Church St., Burlington, at 7:30 p.m.

P.A.C.T. Seels Interns

P.A.C.T.

If you are concerned with Burlington's housing problems, or a variety of other social issues, you can put your energies and talents to good use by becoming a volunteer intern for People Acting for Change Together (P.A.C.T.).

This grass-roots community organization, located at 161 Elmwood Avenue, deals with problems facing low-, middle-, and fixed-income people, as well as counseling welfare recipients and the unemployed.

P.A.C.T. is also active in women's issues, draft counseling, counseling and fundraising for the Abinaki people, and they have been instrumental in establishing the Citizens for Rent Control in Burlington.

According to Ginni Stern, a VISTA worker and housing advocate, P.A.C.T. is seeking interns who are "concerned with the way things are these days, and who want to learn how to deal with people and their problems." She added that nobody would be turned away.

"There's so much to be done," Stern said. "If twenty people walked through that door, I could put them to work immediately."

Because P.A.C.T. is a non-profit organization, they cannot offer pay to the interns, but credit can be arranged through Service Learning Internship Program of the Center for Service Learning, located in the Mansfield House on Colchester Avenue.

College of Education Seeks Advisors

The College of Education and Social Services is interviewing for Fall, 1981 Academic Fellows. The responsibility of an Academic Fellow is to be a student advisor to a small number of freshmen in CESS. Fellows help freshmen arrange their schedules during pre-registration, as well as volunteer to help during course registration. The Fellows also serve as a link to the University system.

As many as eight credits can be obtained through this program. In addition, this valuable experience of working with people can be a positive addition to a future resume.

All CESS sophomores interested in becoming AFs should contact Nancy Burgess in Room 307 Waterman, for an application. These short forms must be picked up by Friday, February 6th, and returned by the following Friday, February 13th.

Hey Seniors!

In an attempt to make "Senior Week '81" the best ever, the Senior Class Council is planning activities that will raise funds for the May festivities.

Included in their plans is a raffle with many prizes donated by local merchants, and a $100 grand prize. Tickets will be on sale in February, and seniors are urged to purchase as many as possible to insure the success of other events.

One of those planned events is a party, sponsored by Heineken. Negotiations are currently underway, and the chances look good.

Specific plans for Senior Week, although only tentative, include a "Booze Cruise" on the Lake Champlain Transportation ferry, a beach party, a volleyball and/or softball tournament, "Senior Nights" at downtown bars with discounts for Seniors, and a concert. The Council welcomes any and all suggestions you may have to offer.

The Council also announced that Graduation Announcements are on sale at the University Store, for sixty cents each. Mr. Hosmer Graham, the Store's manager, has pledged all profits from the sale of these announcements to the Senior Council, to help pay for events and the Senior Class Gift. The more announcements purchased, the more money the Council will have.

Although the Senior Class Council has no office, students who have ideas can reach Council members at the phone numbers below. The Council wishes all Seniors good luck, and asks that everyone pays attention to announcements to insure good feedback, and a great Senior Week.

Speak up For Residential Life

The Department of Residential Life is seeking people interested in becoming interviewers for the Resident Assistant and Hall Advisor Selection process.

Experience in interviewing is not necessary. Residential Life will train all students who apply. Energy, enthusiasm, and a desire to meet new people are the only requirements.

A participating student will learn to be an effective interviewer, get an inside look at Resident Assistant and Hall Advisor jobs, and improve communication skills.

For information concerning time commitment and responsibilities, see Gloria Thompson at the Office of Residential Life no later than February 6, 1981.

"The Campus Board" welcomes short, University-related news clips. Feel free to call or drop by The Cynic with suggestions.

tunities for professional growth and development and for the quality of life of the University's faculty and staff," such as salary maintenance and other efforts to make the University attractive to faculty.

Dr. Coor emphasized the importance of strengthening and adapting "existing academic programs to new needs and opportunities." This includes program development in new and existing areas and responding to shifts in enrollment.

Other points emphasized in the Five Year Plan were the importance of efforts to strengthen ties to Vermont and to the community, maintaining and increasing the quality of facilities and the campus environment, and of improving the financial base of the University wherever possible. Through efforts aimed at these general areas, Dr. Coor said he hopes to strengthen the University for the potentially difficult times ahead.

Coor emphasized that it is the responsibility of the student to learn about the University in order to contribute effectively to the decision-making process. However, it is the administration's responsibility to provide channels for student input into the decision-making process, and then to be receptive to student needs, he said.

persuade universities to impose guidelines on the agency's use of professors and students on campus. So far, several schools have adopted guidelines, but Benda admits they hardly restrict the amount of recruitment on those campuses.

"Obviously, the CIA is going to continue recruiting no matter what guidelines are set," she says. "But at least with some of the new rules, professors are required to admit cooperation, and in some cases are even restricted from working with the agency."

Then

get information from the CIA for several years," says Doug Tuthill, USSA's current chairman. "We desperately want it."

Tuthill, who was surprised to hear of the cache of documents in California, recalls, "We have been given the run-around by the CIA, and we think they are stalling the release of information while waiting for the Freedom of Information Act law to change."

Now Tuthill will send a USSA representative to the Hoover Institute to review the documents there, and to "find out what's there, and what is useful for historians and researchers."

What's there, according to Stearns — one of the few non-CIA people to have viewed the files — is a gold mine of information about a wide variety of people.

"If someone went through the files today, they would find material regarding the early political involvement of a lot of people who are in the headlines of the New York Times," Stearns says.

The files also reveal the outline of the CIA's involvement in the NSA's International Program, in which the agency allegedly wanted to keep tabs on the viewpoints of foreign student leaders as well as to help U.S. leaders to carry the American line to international student gatherings.

The files at the Hoover Institute, according to researcher Angus McKenzie, who rediscovered the materials, do contain hundreds of letters and reports from foreign student leaders from scores of countries.

Many of those students from non-aligned nations would, the CIA reportedly figured, assume important governmental positions in their nations after their education.

Only NSA's top leaders knew of the CIA connection. Newly-elected NSA officials would be informed of the CIA's role in the International Program, and then warned that, if they released news of the connection, they would be prosecuted under national security laws.

Plagiarizing Prof

Denver, CO (CPS) — The controversial president of a college struggling to stay open has been accused of plagiarizing part of the inaugural address she delivered when she took office at the school two years ago.

A 189-word section of President Sherry Manning's October, 1978 speech to the students and faculty at Colorado Women's College was allegedly lifted from the book Twilight of Authority by sociologist Robert Nisbet.

Manning herself would not comment immediately on the charge, but CWC Public Relations Director Don Weber said "some kind of response will be forthcoming" in the near future.

Another CWC administrator, who asked to remain anonymous, noted that "there are a lot of charges and bad feelings floating around." He observed that Manning has been the center of controversy since she proposed solving CWC's financial crisis by firing 25 of the school's 35 faculty members.

"The tension leads to many a politically-motivated statement," he added vaguely, pointing out that "no one knows who told the media about the (content of the speech)." He thought it "curious" that the incident should surface now "of all times."

The plagiarism story first appeared in the local Rocky Mountain News. Reporter Jane Hulse says rumors of the alleged plagiarism had "been kicking around some time," and came to her attention "as sort of an accident, while I was talking to some people. It just sort of popped out."

She thinks it unlikely the charge was purposely leaked to her to damage Manning's campaign to make her promised cuts, or to drive her from the campus.

In the News' account, James Polt, a CWC professor, called the alleged plagiarism "inexcusable. It's clearly unethical."

Outing Club: More Than A Lending Company

By Grove Potter

Since 1976, when S.A. support of the Outing Club (OC) increased from $1500 to $12,000 a year, the club has evolved into more of an equipment lending operation than an organization where active outdoors-oriented people meet, plan trips, and swap stories. While no one regrets this change in emphasis, there is a general hope among OC members that the club aspect of the group will come back into prominence.

Admissions office questionaires have noted that a considerable number of UVM students are drawn to the school by the Vermont environment. While this is no surprise to anyone, it is interesting to note that the OC now has over 350 members. Many members are not active in the club, but the house managers report that almost all of the club equipment is lent out every weekend.

The OC, located in the green house behind John Dewey hall, can totally outfit thirty people for weekend camping. Because most campers have some of their own equipment, the club can actually accommodate many more. Borrowers work in the OC house in exchange for use of the equipment.

In addition to lending equipment, OC organizes camping trips every weekend. The structure of these trips depends on the leader. Max Connolly, co-director of the club's Leadership Development Program, states that some trips are very loose and unstructured and others are learning experiences, "if the leader has a particular skill he enjoys teaching." These weekend trips leave early Saturday morning and return Sunday evening. Day trips are also scheduled intermittently.

The Leadership Development Program runs one weekend trip a semester designed to "teach people how to be camping leaders." Max and co-director Digger Faesy take 15-20 people on these outings. Skills taught include first aid, the use of crampons, and trip planning. The instructors are experienced outdoorsmen with formal training and much camping experience.

Over Christmas vacation, the OC sponsored a trip to Mount Katadin, Maine. In the planning stages for twelve days, the nine voyagers skied 16 miles to make base camp two and a half miles from the summit. Each person carried ninety pounds. From base camp, they enjoyed ice climbing, snow shoeing, and climbed several nearby peaks. Before entering the Mt. Katadin area, they notified the local rescue team of their location.

The club also sponsors slide shows and movies designed to inform and whet the appetites of enthusiasts. Jeff Kuller, advisor to the OC and director of Wilderness Experience, recommends two upcoming movies about camping in China to everyone. The first movie's story was featured in last month's National Geographic. It documents the skiing trip of two Vermonters, Ned Gillet and Janet Renolds (a UVM grad) in China. The second movie covers a mountaineering trip in the Himalayas by Jed Williamson. Williamson will be on campus, lecturing at certain classes when the movie is shown. Check with the club for dates.

Wilderness Experience (WE) grew out of the OC and is now a separate organization. WE offers an educational situation for people interested in learning wilderness living and travel skills. WE instructors have formal training and conduct weekend workshops as well as overnight outings. An emphasis is placed on learning about Vermont and its natural heritage on these trips. On WE trips, everything is provided. The trips offer a chance to learn and meet new people. A $22 fee covers all expenses. WE also runs the Orientation Trek which many entering students find both beneficial and enjoyable.

In the long range outlook, Jeff Kuller envisions more coordination between all of the outing organizations at UVM, resulting in the sharing of resources and mutual support, helping to promote outing activities at UVM. With this projected increase in the outing activities a "better Leadership Development Program will be needed," Kuller predicts.

Membership in the OC is free to all full-time students during the school year. Over the summer a $5 fee is required. Part-time students, faculty, and staff must pay a $5 membership fee.

For those drawn to the outdoors, the OC offers a friendly atmosphere in which to learn and share experiences. Individualists by nature, outdoorpeople at the OC welcome other individuals who desire to join the club. The club holds its meetings on Tuesdays at 5:30 p.m. at their house.

Taking Arms Against Viruses

By Nancy Ridolfo, B.S.V.
(Nancy is a staff nurse at the University Health Services.)

"Flu" season is here again.

There have been major influenza outbreaks every winter but two since 1957. Influenza is a virus that spreads rapidly through direct contact and may also become airborne in crowded environments. Hence, it may quickly reach epidemic proportions.

When epidemics do occur, the disease is easily diagnosed. However, sporadic cases are only identified by laboratory procedures. Symptoms of the flu appear 24-48 hours after exposure to the virus. These symptoms include fever, weakness, headache, cough, runny nose, muscle aches, sore throat as well as gastrointestinal disturbances (nausea, loss of appetite, diarrhea). Recovery generally takes two to seven days. Symptoms such as weakness and fatigue, though, may continue longer.

The viruses responsible for influenza include Type A and its subtypes, Type B and its subtypes, and Type C. Type A and B are responsible for major epidemics. Research of the viruses enables epidemiologists to make predictions about what types of flu will be prevalent in a given year. Vaccines are then prepared to combat the virus.

Type A virus occurs the most frequently. Its many subtypes are now being classified according to characteristics such as geographic origin and year of isolation. Examples are A/Texas/78 and B/Hong Kong/72. Type B occurs less frequently – only every four to six years. Type C is responsible for isolated cases and, as of yet, has not developed any subtypes.

Prediction of flu types can enable vaccines to be developed. Since influenza can have serious complications, it is recommended that people with high risk be vaccinated yearly. Such people include the elderly, pregnant women, and persons with diseases of the pulmonary, cardiovascular, renal, or metabolic systems.

Flu vaccines will be available through the Health Department for those who wish to be immunized. The time, date, and place for immunization clinics will be announced on radio, T.V., and in the local newspapers. To decrease your risk, care should be taken to avoid contact with someone who has the flu. During local epidemics, one should avoid crowded places. The practice of good hygiene, i.e. proper disposal of contaminated tissues, frequent handwashing, and getting adequate rest, will increase the body's resistance.

In cooperation with the Department of Epidemiology, the UHS staff is participating in a program to identify as soon as possible the flu virus present on campus. Early identification of an influenza virus in our university community can be made. When the flu type is identified, the Department of Epidemiology will initiate a program to test the efficacy of drug preparations used against the flu virus.

UVM Steams Arabs With New Heating Plant

By Jim Neuman

As predicted, President Reagan's decontrol of the oil industry was followed by an average three cent a gallon rise in gasoline prices and a five cent jump in retail heating fuel costs. While many consumers in the northeast respond to high energy costs with a turn to alternatives such as wood or natural gas for home and commercial heating, UVM has invested in a more efficient method of heating buildings and dorms on campus. By doing so, it expects to save up to $200,000 a year.

The Central Heating Plant has been completely redone inside. All the old boilers have been ripped out, and a firewall has been knocked out to make room for the new High Temperature Water (HTW) heating system.

This new system, which heats East campus, Redstone and the Gym, combines with the old steam system, which heats Main campus, to meet all of UVM's heating needs.

The new system utilizes dry saturated steam that is raised to 397 degrees F in five new 40,000 lb./hr. boilers. Much of this steam is sent out to the old high pressure steam system, while the remainder is used in heating the rest of the campus. This steam is converted to high temperature water in a cascade heater, and then sent to South campus at a temperature of 393 degrees F. The actual heat exchange that takes place in the buildings occurs at temperatures around 390 degrees F. The modern heat exchangers in the buildings already connected replace the antiquated steam boilers and direct fire hot water heaters that were used in the old heating systems. The actual internal heating systems of the buildings have remained unchanged. When the water finally returns to the Central Heating Plant, its temperature is about 250 degrees F. The water is reheated and sent back out again.

The actual path of the water pipes spans most of the South campus. The system starts by sending the 393 degree F water out through insulated pipes from the Central Heating Plant. From there it travels west in back of the library and out toward the Life Science building. The pipes turn south and progress out to 622 Main Street, near the crossing to the Living/Learning Center. Here is one heat exchange, and the system continues to M.A.T. and the Harris-Millis complex. After making the people on East campus nice and toasty, the pipes carry the water over to the Gym and the Field House. When finished helping maintain a comfortable environment for athletic endeavors, the pipes go to Redstone campus. The Music building is the first stop, and from there they go to Simpson, to Christie, and then to Wright. Eventually, after a pleasant stay on Redstone, the system returns to the Central Heating plant, where more water is heated to make the trip again.

The advantage of this system is two fold. From an upkeep point of view, this system will be easily maintained as most of the problems that can occur will be centrally located in the Heating Plant. With the old system, maintenance had to be done at many individual dorms and buildings. Creating heat from a given amount of energy in a single unit is a more efficient method than using two or more units. Also, the water which transports the heat is more expedient than steam. Less energy is lost in the process. What remains to be seen, if the testing period brings success, is how well the system is built and if the pipes and other equipment will last for a long time. But now, amid unpredictable oil supplies, UVM has taken a giant step toward lessening our dependence on oil.

Search and Rescue Looks for Able Bodies

By Amy Reyelt

It's an unusually bright and sunny Vermont day and you and four friends decide to climb Mt. Mansfield. As you hike along the ridge, one of your fellow hikers decides to bushwack along a shortcut and meet you in an hour or so. When you arrive at the intended spot, the friend is not there.

After an hour wait, it is clear he has gotten lost. What do you do? If this had taken place in the White Mountains or in the Adirondacks, there is a skilled rescue squad you could call for help. In Plattsburgh, N.Y., an army base helicopter team would conduct the search.

Here in the Green Mountains, however, no similar team exists, so four concerned UVM students have solved this problem by creating the Vermont Search and Rescue (V.S.R.) team. The task before them is extremely large, involving a lot of organizing, planning, and recruiting. What is needed most right now are interested volunteers willing to learn basic tracking and climbing skills.

Ned Rimer, the team's medical advisor, says V.S.R. is looking for "people capable of taking care of themselves outside in various conditions." The group's coordinator, Sue Lippmann, adds, "obviously a rescue squad needs to be able to concentrate on rescuing the victim, not the rescuers. We don't need experts, but we need people we can count on."

V.S.R. is planning one training week-end tentatively set for February 28. That morning all will meet at the Living/Learning Center for a first aid session, going over such topics as bandag-

This is the second piece in a continuing action series featuring our hero, Barry Cutlass, as he continues his cosmic adventures, fighting evil and oppression while having a good time.

Contracted by an unnamed capitalist to investigate the presence of Cuban and Soviet troops in Angola, on the south west coast of Africa, Barry Cutlass walks through the tall dry grass of the veldt, discussing the anti-communist defense efforts with Jonas Savimbi, the leader of the UNITA guerrilla force.

"You say you have shot down many Soviet transport planes and won numerous land battles with the invaders. How many Cuban and Russian soldiers are in Angola now?" Cutlass asks.

The successful commander replies "they constantly replace the troops with more and more men each time. We stay ahead of them because we know the country and the people support us. The Russians want to colonize us. We do not want that."

...Cutlass freezes like a statue when he hears a deep chested, guttural snarl near him in the darkness.

Savimbi suddenly stops speaking and listens carefully. Cutlass hears only the wind, yet his host whispers: "More planes are coming. I can hear them in the distance. My gunners will get them. They will wait until the planes are visible and then they will shoot."

Cutlass, knowing a little about anti-aircraft guns, inquires: "Can't you get them on radar and shoot before you see them? They may be flying too high."

"We have a saying in this region Mr. Cutlass," the warrior starts, "that says 'don't shoot at the cat's meow.' It comes from the herdsmen who sometimes surprise sleeping lions in the grass. By shooting at the lion's growl, you anger him and give away your location. It is best to wait to see your enemy before you shoot."

Cutlass ponders these words for a moment but is distracted by the increasing sound of approaching planes. The planes quickly come into view in the north. With the planes heading on a course just wide of the guerilla's camp, Savimbi snaps orders into his walkie-talkie.

"These planes will soon be ours," the confident leader states. "We have never missed when they come this close."

A deafening cannon blast roars from a thicket of bushes nearby and the plane bursts into flames seconds after. The wounded aircraft manages a rugged landing in a field near the camp. Several Land Cruisers race to the scene to collect survivors and supplies from the plane.

Later that evening Cutlass discusses the day's activity with Savimbi. "What have you learned from the two Russian pilots captured today?" the American adventurer questions.

"They refuse to speak now. They will speak later," assures Savimbi.

After much conversation, Cutlass gets up from the fire and announces: "I'm going to take a stroll in the dark. The stars are clear tonight."

"Do not wander far. The night is very busy," cautions Savimbi.

Ten yards away from the fire Cutlass is enveloped in darkness. The moon has not yet risen. As he walks, Cutlass reflects on the gallant fight Savimbi and his men are staging.

"With no help from our country, this brave force is holding the Soviet-backed Cuban forces at bay. My sponsor will be very interested in this. Savimbi is indirectly fighting for others' interests here as well as his own."

In mid-thought, Cutlass freezes like a statue when he hears a deep chested, guttural snarl near him in the darkness. Cold beads of sweat form on his body and his pulse beats like a sledge hammer on a steel door in his ears. Carefully he reaches for his pistol. The seconds creep. Tempted to shoot in the direction of the sound, Cutlass recalls Savimbi's words 'don't shoot at the cat's meow.' With his gun pointed in the direction of the sound, Cutlass reaches into his pocket and draws out his pipe lighter. He bends down silently and lights the grass between the growl and him on fire. The flames spread quickly. Moments later a confused panther leaps away from the approaching flames and darts off into the night.

Shouts ring out from the camp as the fire gets brighter. One hundred men race to surround the blaze. They yank out grass in a three foot swath around the flames. Unable to jump this fire trench, the fire dies out in minutes.

When Savimbi hears the details of the incident from Cutlass, he says: "You are a very brave man. Most people would have shot into the dark and probably have been mauled. I am glad to have such a man carry our message to your people."

"I'll carry your message to my people all right," the shaken Cutlass confirms. "You can be sure they will hear about the cat's meow."

Jonas Savimbi is truly the leader of UNITA, which is engaged in a "struggle against Soviet-Cuban imperialism" in Angola.

ing, splinting, and carrying a Stokes litter, (a stretcher-like device used to bring casualties down from a mountain). The group will then travel to Underhill State Park for the rest of the weekend.

After setting up camp and continuing exercises with the Stokes litter, volunteers will be taught basic tracking skills. On Sunday, the group will wake to a mock rescue. The weekend is as experimental for the trainers as for the trainees. "We're testing ourselves and the possible potentials of the group," says Rimer.

The Vermont Search and Rescue team will be composed of three divisions. The first will be a large search group. A second medical group will be the Emergency Medical Technicians, composed mainly of UVM Rescue Squad members. The third group will be a rock and ice climbing team trained to lower a litter off a rock face.

The possibilities for Vermont Search and Rescue are extensive. The absence of such a search and rescue team in this area is serious. V.S.R.'s four member committee realizes the importance of the task in front of them and the effort that is going to be needed for success.

Anyone who partakes in outdoor activities should feel a responsibility towards a program like V.S.R. Interested persons are advised to call Ned Rimer or Digger Faesy at 656-4258 and leave a name and phone number.

Student Remembers
Dirty Side of Subic Bay

By Richard Bateman

From surfing, diving in turquoise waters, and eating coconuts from the trees to taking high school basketball trips to Japan and 'going out on the town' in a wild port city, Jerry Griffin has exciting stories to share with his peers at UVM. Griffin is a freshman living in Wing hall who just moved to the U.S. last September after living in the Philippines for the past four years.

Subic Bay Naval Base, Griffin's abode during his overseas stay, borders the notorious city, Olongapo. Sailors from all over the world are familiar with this port city, mostly because of its vibrant nightlife, Griffin says. "Olongapo looks much like the Combat Zone in Boston, only much larger. The city is filthy in every sense of the word; not only the streets, but the people too."

Griffin has some good memories of Olongapo because of the "wild nightlife and fun."

"The city is fun to cruise around in, but it is a corrupt place. The city exists to cater to sailors. It has everything a sailor could want after spending months out on the sea. One particular street, Magsaysay Avenue, is lined with bars, strip joints, and merchant shops. The merchants sell the most ridiculous junk imaginable, but sailors buy it up."

As an American living on an American base, Griffin knows what it's like to be regarded by the locals as "a fast buck."

"The locals, as we call them, treat Americans with respect only because of their money. The economy is very poor in Olongapo, much poorer than in Burlington. Merchants know Americans have money, so they try to rip you off any way they can. They're a den of thieves."

If the city is such a corrupt place, why go there? "A bunch of us guys used to go there for a good time. Among the guys in our school, it was a sign of prestige to sneak out the gate and go into the city. It's similar to young kids who drink illegally; we do it to conform with a group."

Subic Naval Base, on the other hand, is the opposite of Olongapo. Griffin talks enthusiastically about the base and says he'd like to go back there during vacation. "The base is a totally different place, both in scenery and in lifestyle, and is similar to Burlington in structure. There are four movie theaters, five swimming pools and many restaurants. There are also three sandy beaches, and coconut palms, banana and mango trees everywhere throughout the base."

Thick jungle surrounds the remaining part of the base not bordered by Olongapo or the sea. This area, covered with heavy vegetation, hides various types of snakes, such as Cobras, and many wild animals, including wild boars and fruit bats. And it is additionally dangerous due to a group of thieves who dwell within. "We never went into the jungle because of the constant threat of danger," Griffin recalls.

These armed thieves raid the base after dark and vandalize homes and property. "The intruders are a band of filthy looking Filipinos that come out of the jungle and raid the houses on the base. They'll rip off anything they can and then flee back into the jungle because they know the inhabitants of the base will not follow," Griffin relates.

"The U.S. Marine Corps sentries patrol the perimeter of the jungle at all hours of the day with M-16 rifles to keep things pretty much under control. This way danger is kept at a minimum. Occasionally intruders sneak in, but they don't pose a great threat while in the base."

When asked if he would like to live there again after college, he paused before answering. "I enjoyed the time I spent there and I would love to visit there again, but as far as moving back to the Philippines, I don't think so. It's time for a change. Maybe I'll settle down somewhere in California, like Oceanside. I hear the surfing is good there."

Job Prospects For '81 Grads Improving, Liberal Arts Has Value

By Michael Arkush

(CPS) — Three recently-released studies of government and corporate hiring plans have forecasted that this year's graduates can anticipate an easier time of getting jobs than last year's grads. The studies, however, disagree about how much hiring will increase.

Two employment surveys — one by the College Placement Council and the other by former Northwestern University placement director Frank Endicott — found that employers in both the public and private sectors expect to hire more graduates this year. They say employers are willing to stretch current tight budgets to prepare for expected growth in productivity in the years ahead.

While the Placement Council and Endicott foresee hiring increases between eight and 15 percent over last year, Michigan State University has released a study of employers who plan only two percent hiring increases, with attendant salaries that don't match the inflation rate.

All of the surveys, completed before the post-election skyrocketing of lending rates, agreed that companies are not likely to change their hiring plans this year even if a bad recession intervenes.

"A lot of companies don't want to make the mistake they made during the last recession," says Judith Kayser, communications director at the College Placement Council (CPC). "At that time, they cut back on college recruitment, stopped the stream of new blood into their companies, and took a few years to re-acquire that new talent."

The CPC study collected responses from 565 employing organizations in various fields, which listed how many graduates they expected to hire next year. As has been the case for the past few years, graduates in technical fields have the most opportunities. Kayser says the demand for new technicians far exceeds the supply of graduating specialists.

"There is an incredible demand for technical graduates," she says. "It's phenomenal the amount of recruiting and emphasis on specialization there is in these companies."

"...one's options are as narrow as one's training."

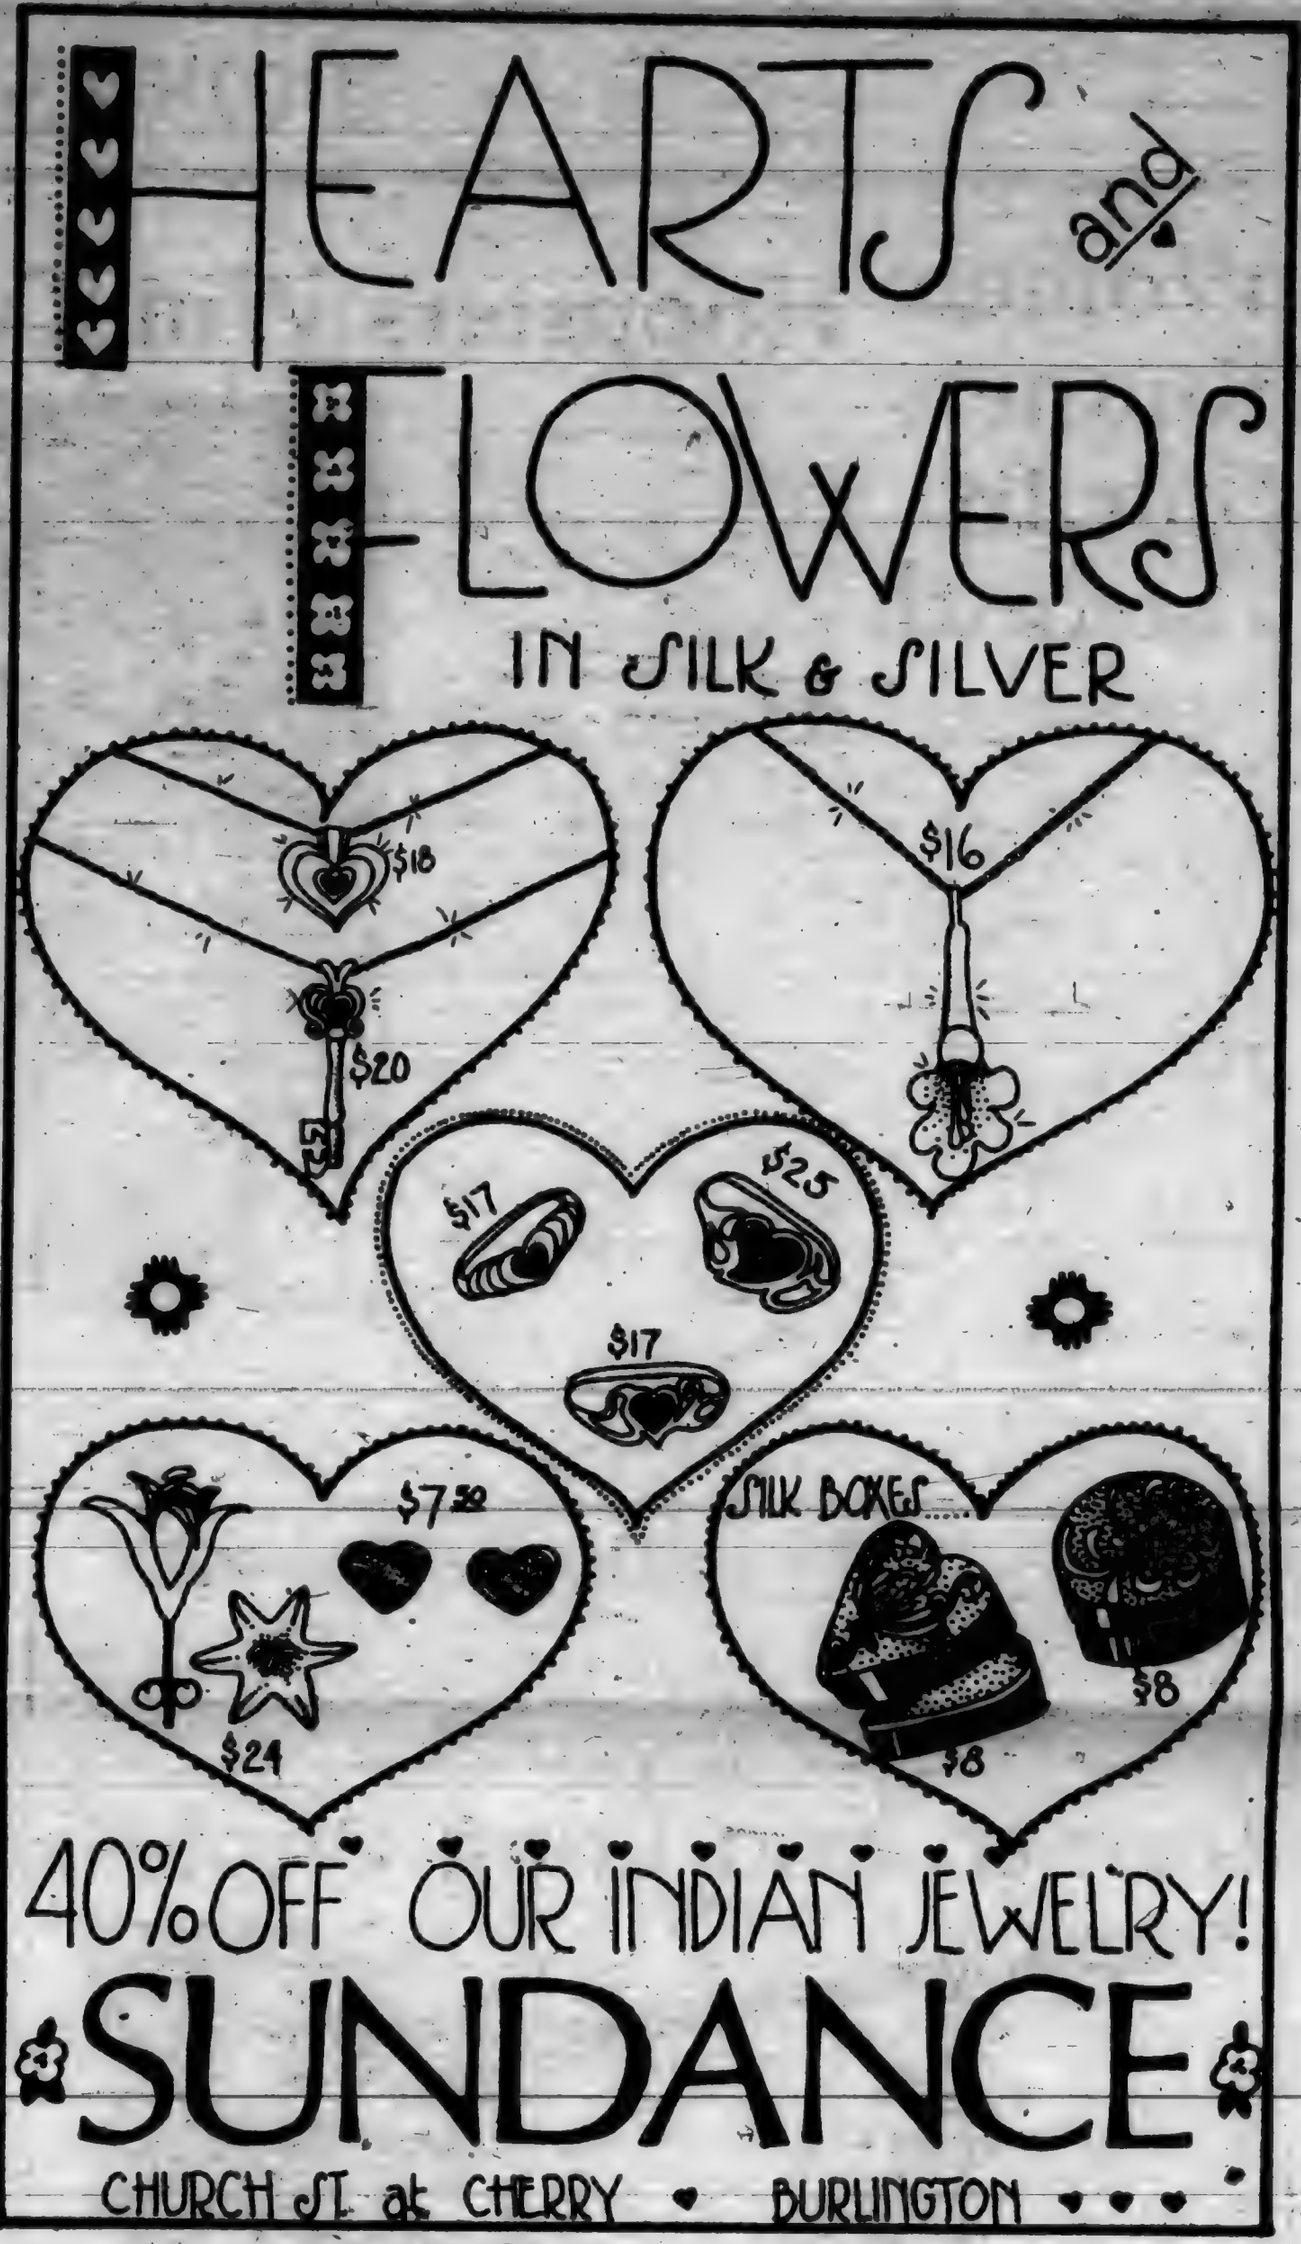
Endicott, whose study covered employment expectations at 142 corporations, says he had thought that "maybe the companies would slow down their recruiting, but since they see a better future very soon, they want these new kids badly."

Both studies forecast that those graduating with degrees in computer science would be overwhelmed by job offers, while students with degrees in business management and economics could also look forward to a high number of offers. The CPC study, for example, says that in business-related disciplines, companies are expected to hire eight percent more graduates than last year.

For students with liberal arts degrees, however, the outlook is not as rosy.

"Those with humanities and social sciences degrees are going to have to scratch for jobs again," says Kayser. "What these students are going to have to learn is they need to specialize, and begin thinking more seriously of their careers when they're in college if they expect to find something when they get out."

However, Dr. John Jewett, Dean of Arts and Sciences at the University of Vermont, has different opinions on this matter. Trained as a chemist, Dr. Jewett steadfastly supports pursuing a liberal arts program. Statistics show that success in landing one's first job is lower for students with liberal arts degrees, but "the average person changes jobs four times in a lifetime," Dr. Jewett said. "Surveys taken three to five years after graduation show people holding liberal arts degrees doing very well... It is strongly appropriate for young people to elect liberal arts and degree programs because one looks forward to not one job, but to a likely succession of jobs," Dr. Jewett said.



Disciplines in the Arts and Sciences, by and large, do not prepare students for a career in the particular discipline. Very few history majors, for example, go on to become professional historians, Dr. Jewett noted. Many of these students go on to jobs in public service, professional school, and other graduate schools.

The debate over liberal arts education and technical training has been waged for several decades. While present economic conditions may scare some students away from liberal arts opportunities, Dr. Jewett maintains that a liberal arts education will serve students for the balance of their lives. For it is true that "one's options are as narrow as one's training."

Neither the CPC nor the Endicott studies analyzed the estimated salary levels for the new graduates. The Michigan State University Placement Center's study, though, says the average salary increases will be by about six percent for the 1981 graduates. This figure, Placement Director Jack Shingleton points out, is well below the increase in the consumer price index, meaning the real value of the new salaries will not be as high as this year's group.

"There will be jobs out there for the new graduates," Shingleton says. "In fact, 90 percent will have jobs by graduation time, with most of the remaining graduates finding employment within three or four months. But the amount of money they make will not make up for the increase in inflation."

Shingleton also says he can't understand where CPC and Endicott came up with their optimistic forecasts. He says hiring of students with bachelor degrees will be up by only two percent over last year's levels.

Women Runners Star In Dartm'th

By Vicki Johnson

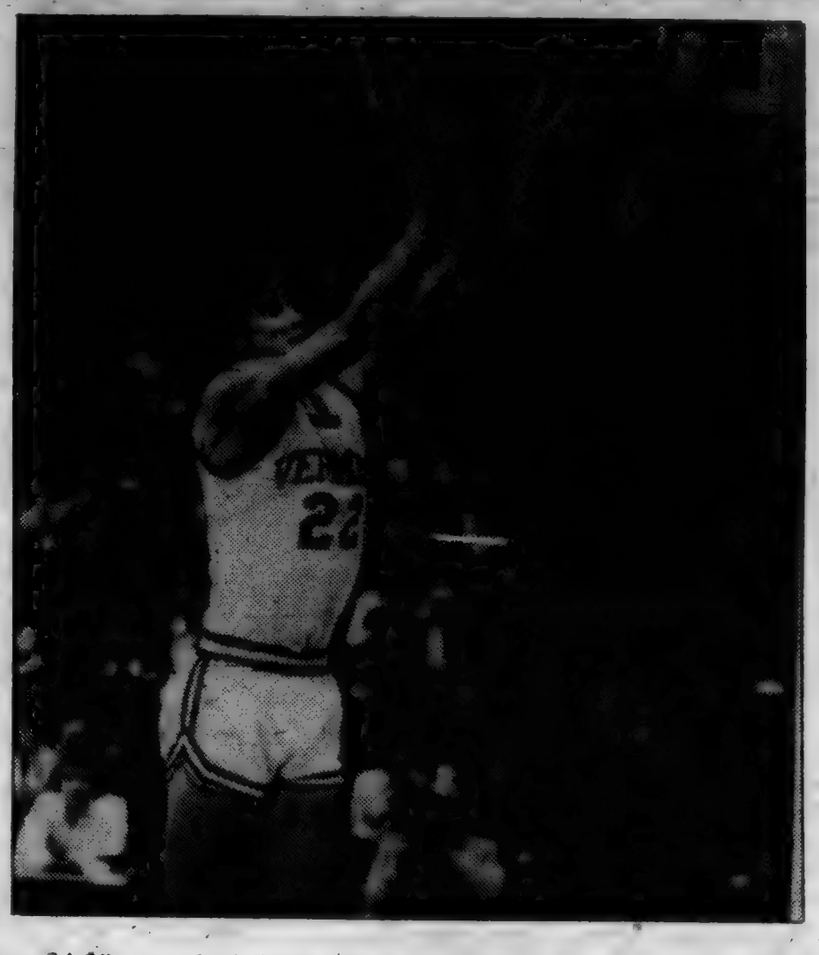
Hanover, N.H. — The UVM women's track team came out on top in a hard-fought battle last Saturday at the Dartmouth field house. As predicted by Coach Kusiak, it was the weight event and distance runs that pulled in the needed points, giving UVM its 65 point victory followed closely by a tough Dartmouth squad with 61 points, UNH with 45, and Plattsburgh State finishing with 16.

It was all smiles as the Cats completely dominated the shot put competition with Katrina Geurkink throwing the put 12.87m for a first place finish, a new school record. Barb Luneau finished second, Marcia Phillips took fourth, and Chris Manazir took fifth.

It was a sweep for UVM in the 800m with Judi St. Hilaire winning with a time of 2:16.28. She was followed by Karen Bucke and Pam Moulton.

Lynn Muller ran the 55m hurdles in 9.4, good enough for a third place finish against some stiff UNH competition. Tammy Rugo excelled in the shorter distances, finishing fourth in the 55m dash (7.7) and fifth in the 200m run (28.3).

Hoopsters Win Two Nailbiters



By Cristina Fiorini

Last Sunday, the UVM basketball team travelled to Pittsburgh, where the Catamounts put up a fierce struggle against Robert Morris, coming up on top with a 52-51 victory. Jeff Brown led the scoring for Vermont with 18 points. He was followed by Mike Evelti, who had 11 points and 10 rebounds. Vermont now faces the rest of the season with a 9-8 record.

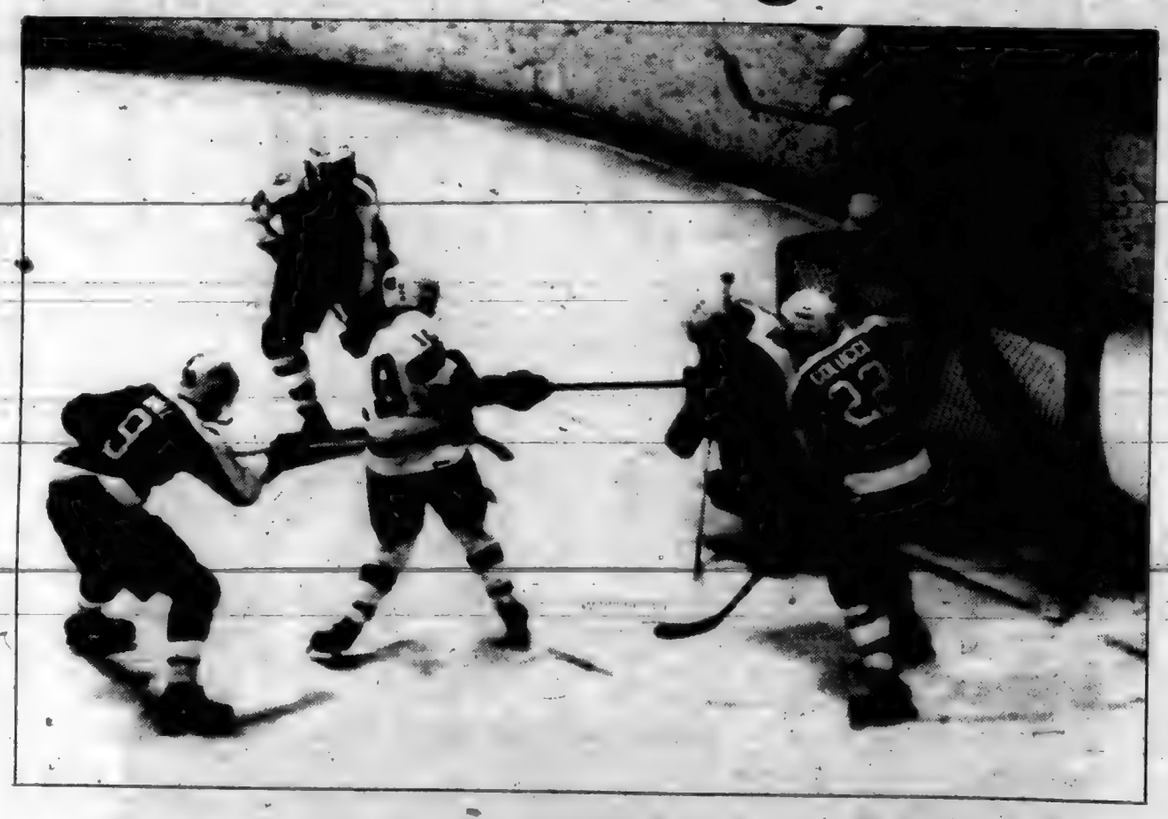
Earlier in the week, there was enough action to feed a roaring UVM crowd, as numerous turnovers dominated a 65-64 win over UNH. The Catamounts leaped into action as Mike Evelti completed a three-point play, which was followed by Jim Nocera's 17-foot hit from the right of the lane. At 13:35, UNH held the lead 15-7, after Vermont's ninth turnover.

"We tried to take shortcuts on offense," Coach Peter Salzberg said, "and that's when you get turnovers. They were aggressive on defense."

With 6:50 left in the half, Jeff Brown drove the ball in to score, and after being fouled by UNH's Burns, completed a foul shot bringing the score to 22-27. Then Dane Correll picked up the pace and scored, initiating a ten-point Catamount streak. Evelti followed, completing two foul shots and a lay-up. Tim Woodlee got the ball, shot it from the right corner and scored, giving the Cats the lead. Cory Wielgus hit off the backboard and Mike Evelti made both ends of a 1-1, the score now 34-29. Two foul shots and a basket for both teams ended the half, 38-33.

New Hampshire Coach Gerry Friel, was upset. "It was a poorly coached half, as far as organization. Nothing was executed as I wanted it to be, from the point of passing or ball handling."

Opening the second half, Beyonne scored with a powerful lay-up. The Wildcats, however, picked themselves up, but only to gain one basket before UVM continued its lead with an Evelti score and a Jeff Brown jumper from the right of the key, pushing the score to 44-37, Vermont.



UNH, determined to close the gap, retaliated with a two minute succession of points by Dixon and McClain, bringing the game to a tie, 46-46. With 14:04 and New Hampshire unable to obtain a lead, Vermont stalked ahead. Brown stole the ball and handed it to Correll, who laid it in. Correll scored once again, this time from the right corner.

Points mounted once more as the Catamounts chipped away, with Evelti and Brown scoring, establishing a ten point lead for Vermont. Trailing, New Hampshire dug in their heels and applied pressure in a powerful comeback attempt. Rapid scoring, led by UNH's Dan Nolan, brought the game to a very narrow Catamount victory, 65-64.

"We've had many similar losses determined by two or three points," stated Friel, extremely disappointed with the outcome of the game. He continued, "We've lost five games by no more than five points: Harvard by one, Yale by two, American four, Brown three, and Connecticut three." Disgusted with the playing and turnovers, Friel said, "the plan was to beat Vermont's pressure. We wanted to reverse the ball and make them play defense. We were trying to play Evelti and Brown, who consistently play a solid game."

Rebounds were the one area which tipped the game in the Catamounts' favor, according to Salzberg. "We did a good job on defense. In the first half we were successful at defense reboundage and outletting the ball. It was the key determinant. On defense we wanted to try zone and man to man to see which would be more efficient. Man to man seemed like our best bet. Dane did a good job."

Icemen End Long Winless Slide

By Andy Cook

The long and frustrating winless streak for the University of Vermont's hockey team ended this past Saturday, as the Catamounts held off a late RPI surge and picked up a 5-4 victory. Scoring for UVM were Kirk McCaskill, Mark Litton, John Leavitt, Don Crowley, and Rob McConnell. Three of these goals were on Catamount power plays.

The game began aggressively, as Craig Homola had a severe collision with the RPI goaltender, who was so badly hurt that he was unable to return to the game. But Catamount coach Jim Cross noted that since the injury occurred in the very early stages of the game, the unfortunate accident probably didn't have an effect on the game's outcome. RPI uses two goalies to split the playing time, and in this particular case, the Engineers suffered no defensive lapse.

Cross was obviously happy that UVM was finally able to end up on the winning side of a contest. "We have played in many close games," said the Vermont mentor, "and the fact that we had to pull our goalie in then our experience should pay off."

Vermont will be testing many new faces in the future, and one of them will be freshman Tim Camisa from St. Albans, Vt. Casima is a goal tender who has improved tremendously during the team's practices, and in a game against Yale, he came off the bench to play flawless hockey for eight minutes. "As a reward for his efforts, he will start when we play Middlebury," Cross said.

Bue before that contest, the Cats will go on the road to face Cornell and Princeton. The goal-all but two of our games shows how competitive we've been."

What did the Cats do differently this time to come up on the positive end of a one goal decision? "Well," said Cross, "we played together as a team. In the past, we have played as a team in some aspects of our game, but unless we work together all the time, we aren't doing our best."

The coach added that on Saturday, the puck was simply sliding in the Cats' favor. In a loss to the University of New Hampshire, the UVM offense hit the post four times in the second

But in college sports, the number of returning lettermen often signals how well a team may do. For Vermont, the season has been particularly difficult because Cross is putting a very young squad on the ice. But since the Cats have played so competitively against many opponents, the coach feels there is a bright future in store for his Cats.

Late Surge Splashes UNH Swimmers

By L. E. Lassiler

The UVM male swimmers overcame a persistent challenge from the University of New Hampshire at Forbush Natatorium this past Saturday, and finished with a 66-47 victory.

The Cats clinched the victory with first and second place finishes in the 200-meter breaststroke. Coach Joe Fisher's squad also recorded first place finishes in the 1000-yard freestyle, the 200-yard individual medley, the 200-yard freestyle, and the one-meter and three-meter spring board diving events.

The Vermonters trailed after four events, 23-11, and briefly relinquished the lead late in the match after losing the 500-yard freestyle. But the Cats dominated the last three events, tallying 23 of a possible 25 points.

The next match for the UVM team is scheduled for Saturday, February 7 at the University of Massachusetts.

Will Women Accept New NCAA Rules?

By Susan Calhoun

(CPS) — The furor that greeted the National Collegiate Athletic Association's (NCAA) recent decision to try to take over women's athletics has settled into a guarded caution, as college athletic directors adopt a "wait and see" attitude about the NCAA's plan to sponsor national competitions for women.

Richard Perry, athletic director at University of Southern California, plans to operate his women's teams under AIAW rules, even if some of them compete in NCAA championships.

"The AIAW has a much more beneficial scholarship program," Perry notes, "but under the AIAW we cannot recruit.

Perry also speaks of the "excellent long-range possibilities for women's athletics" in the NCAA. With one organization sponsoring both men's and women's competitions, he dreams of merging the two.

For example, he foresees holding both the men's and women's national basketball championships in the same location during the same weekend within a few years. This would give women much broader television coverage.

Perry, a member of the NCAA committee exploring such possibilities, also envisions a single championship in individual sports, such as swimming, tennis, and gymnastics.

The Program Venders

Girls Who Just Do Their Jobs

By John Boitano

Have you ever noticed the program vendors at a UVM hockey game? It is easy to perceive that they have an easy job. We fans often become infuriated when a program girl or guy shocks us with a strong, vibrant voice or obstructs our view of a game-winning goal by waving a program in front of our eyes.

But while conversing with three program vendors, Heather Manaziv, Carolyn Dawson, and Kristi Watson, I quickly realized the difficulties and challenges of this hustling trade. Heather, a junior, is enrolled in the College of Arts and Sciences and plans to major in zoology. Heather's task as a vendor is to remain stationary behind the program stand while projecting a strong vibrant voice, which is bound to catch the innocent ear of the entering fan.

Carolyn Dawson, a junior who is enrolled in EMBA and plans to major in accounting, has a more active role than her co-worker. Carolyn's duty during the game is to roam through the mobs and masses of seated fans in the audience, while shouting out a convincing line to sell the programs. Carolyn enjoys her job, citing the fact that she "becomes recognized after a few home games and often runs into regular faces on my route." All vendors are paid by receiving free admission to all home games. Last year Carolyn enjoyed not having to spend a dime to witness exciting Catamount playoff action. However, she says, "It doesn't look like we are heading towards the playoffs this year."

When asked about hostility and frustration encountered in the vending trade, Carolyn responded, "There really isn't too much hostility among the home fans. Occasionally, a UNH or visitor fan may give you some lip, but they quickly realize that I'm only trying to do my job." The most frustrating thing for Carolyn occurs when a prospective customer signals her for two programs and she can't reach him because of a selfish, stubborn fan who won't move himself to get out of the way. When she finally reaches the would-be buyer, the sale is off because he or she was joking or doesn't have the money. "That really burns me up," Carolyn says.

After asking Carolyn if there were any "tricks of the trade" she said she always uses five cough drops, which she immediately extracted from her front pocket. Carolyn went on to say, "These babies are really life-savers when the going gets rough. Sometimes my throat gets so sore, I don't think I could go on without them. Your throat and voice are your main assets in the vending business."

Kristi Watson is also an active vendor. She is enrolled in the College of Arts and Sciences and plans to major in geography. Kristi had to miss the UNH home game this past Saturday because of an illness. But her fellow co-workers, Heather and Carolyn, stated that Kristi's determination should surely put her back on the job for the next home game.

The next time a program vendor blocks your view of the deciding goal of a championship game, have a little compassion for her. After all, these women are just trying to do a very difficult and somewhat frustrating job. Also, it should be mentioned that all proceeds from program sales go into the General Athletic Fund, which is most certainly a worthy charity.

Claudio and McClallen Lead Runners to Victory

By Harry Eastman

Coming off a hard week of practice, the University of Vermont men's indoor track team handily won a three-way meet with Colgate University and St. Lawrence University. The final score of the meet, held at St. Lawrence on January 31, was UVM (87), Colgate (70), and St. Lawrence (32).

The Cats, who took first place in eight events during the meet, were led by several individual stellar performances. Senior Joe McClallen won three events — the 55 meter dash (6.2 seconds), the 300 meter run (36.8 seconds), and the long jump (6.44 m.) The co-captain also finished third in the triple jump (12.79m.). Charlie Claudio finished first in the 35 lb. weight (16.26 m.), second in the high jump (6'2"), third in the shot/put (12.34 m.), third in the 55 meter hurdles (8.4 seconds), and fourth in the long jump (5.79 m.). Sophomore Steve Shea took the 400 meter run (52 seconds), and finished second in the 300 meter run (37.5 seconds). Erik Stabenau won the pole vault with a height of 13 feet. Outstanding performances by John Novak and Jeff Alitz led Vermont to a first place finish in the distance medley relay. The Catamounts won the mile relay with the help of great individual efforts by Lucas Peluffo and Bill Newberry.

Mike Evelti scored his 1000th point last Wednesday night against New Hampshire. He joins Warren Prehmus as the two men who scored the most points for soon-to-depart Coach Peter Salzberg. The Vermont mentor becomes a river of praise when talking about Evelti's contribution. While Salzberg leads the team as a coach, Evelti provides the ice as a "consumate team player," according to Salzberg.

Evelti stood out as a total force in Vermont basketball when he was in high school. He spent a year playing at Worcester Academy, from which he went on to score 28 points in his first college game. That, according to Salzberg, "is the story of Mike's ability as a scorer."

Salzberg has also been quick to praise Evelti's defense and his all-around game contribution. Evelti is proof that Vermont players can play any level of game. He, Bruce Beynnon, and Rob McKenzie have all made invaluable contributions to the program, and Mike is quick to praise the efforts of his teammates. He marches toward the scoring record without a care in the world for statistics.

"You can't back down," says Mike of the defensive maneuvers employed by bigger and more brutal men. In the end, the proof is in the pudding. Mike is going to be ready come playoff time, and that's bad news for ECAC North opponents.

The clutch wins over New Hampshire and Robert Morris improved UVM's record to 9-8. This puts UVM solidly in the running for fourth place in the conference and a home court playoff game against BU, Colgate, or Niagra.

If things go as expected, UVM, Maine, Northeastern and Holy Cross should be the final four. If UVM makes the final four, it should face Northeastern and then the winner of the expected Maine-Holy Cross matchup... Down the road, the champ and Rick Carlisle should shoot the net out of the basket; and Corey Wielgus, Jeff Brown, and Dane Correll will try to shut down the opponents.

Through all this, "Jammin" James Nocera is opening a bag full of jans and rejects, rebound dominations, and tenacious defense. The captain is in his final year, and won't go out without a fight.

Bruce Beynnon is beginning to take control of the game, and with him leading, many giants will fall. Steve Thode will get hot, and when he does, look out. He dominates the scene, and is every bit as unstoppable as Dr. J when he's playing well.

Master of Acoustic Blues

By Robert Keith Gayle

"Well, what's gonna happen now is anybody's guess."

—A Jorma fan

Can pub-blues exist in Burlington? Yes, fans. Jorma Kaukonen is playing at Ira Allen Chapel on February 27 at 7:30 and 10:30. Burlington is one of the east coast stops on Jorma's nationwide, small-date tour, which is currently on the west coast. He has enlisted the musical aid of the Stench brothers, Johnny and Hilary, who play drums and bass respectively. The addition of this duo, who were formerly with the now-defunct Pearl Harbor and The Explosions, gives some indication of Jorma's punk orientation at this point.

Kaukonen will play one acoustic set by himself and one set of electric tunes with the band at each show. The two-set approach will enable him to perform a few old, electric Hot Tuna numbers – in Double Dose fashion. However, fond as I am of the recycled electric blues, it is his acoustic finger pickin' that maintains my interest and Jorma's celebrity status.

Without a doubt, Kaukonen is the best right hand in the music business. In short, fast pickin'. Unfortunately, this does not translate into superior electric guitar ability. Some have called his electric guitar sound unclear, but I prefer to label it "lousy."

Historically, Jorma has had a slightly drug-oriented sound. During the 1960's, he polished his sound with The Jefferson Airplane, a group I hope needs no introduction. The wavering vibrato Jorma developed in the Airplane became the style of Hot Tuna when he and Airplane bassist Jack Casady formed that band.

In the summer of 1975, I saw Kaukonen for the first time, on the America's Choice tour. Tuna was billed with the Good Rats, but all you could hear before the show were shouts of "Hot Fuckin' Tuna!" and "Jorma!" I must admit that Jorma's electric guitar sounded pretty good during that show. In fact, up until and including the last Tuna album, Double Dose, Jorma's electric lines and riffs sounded quite good – repetitive, but good.

Right around the release of that album, Kaukonen punched Casady in the mouth, officially terminating Hot Tuna. Unfortunately, the resulting musical void will never be filled in quite the same way again, because Jorma will never find another musical complement like Jack Casady. (Brush away the tears, fans.)

Almost immediately, Jorma embarked on a solo career, using a variety of musicians as backups. New York's Palladium on 14th Street was host to several of his attempts and I was present at many of these concerts. The modus operandi never changed: the acoustic sets were flawless and the electric sets were miserable. Acoustically, Jorma's steel-covered fingers flashed away, creating blistering blues in his famous finger-pickin' style. The second sets were a letdown, to say the least. In fact, after enduring a few of these electric attempts, I never stayed for the second set again. Jorma simply lost himself in distortion, and I certainly couldn't tell what the hell he was playing.

Jorma's steel-covered fingers flashed away, creating blistering blues in his famous finger pickin' style.

Don't rip up those tickets yet, though, because rumor has it that Jorma is on a leash, so to speak. Since he's on tour promoting his new album, Barbeque King (RCA Records), he should be using some restraint. Hopefully, this means that the electric sets will be bearable.

As far as the music on the new album is concerned, saying it's familiar is an understatement. There are few melodies you haven't heard Jorma play before, but that's really nothing new. The acoustic songs are done in Hot Tuna style, with the band adding a blues format in the background. Jorma's voice is still the same, so if you like that, you're in luck. Some of the more notable tracks on the album include "Rockabilly Shuffle," and "Milk Cow Blues Boogie."

The new album, band, and tour seem to suggest that Jorma is in a renaissance of musical inspiration.

William Stafford: Quiet Observation

By Pablo Conrad

Poet William Stafford's reading at the University of Vermont last Monday evening was a reminder of how well our language reads aloud. Good poetry lends itself to this, but the line between a reading and a performance can be uncomfortably narrow and dangerous, especially when performance threatens the material itself.

Luckily, Stafford's work lends itself to being read aloud. It is like all that's best in the English language: the open telling of what surrounds the speaker, and the invitation to come and see. The written lines are almost conversational, but rarely trivial.

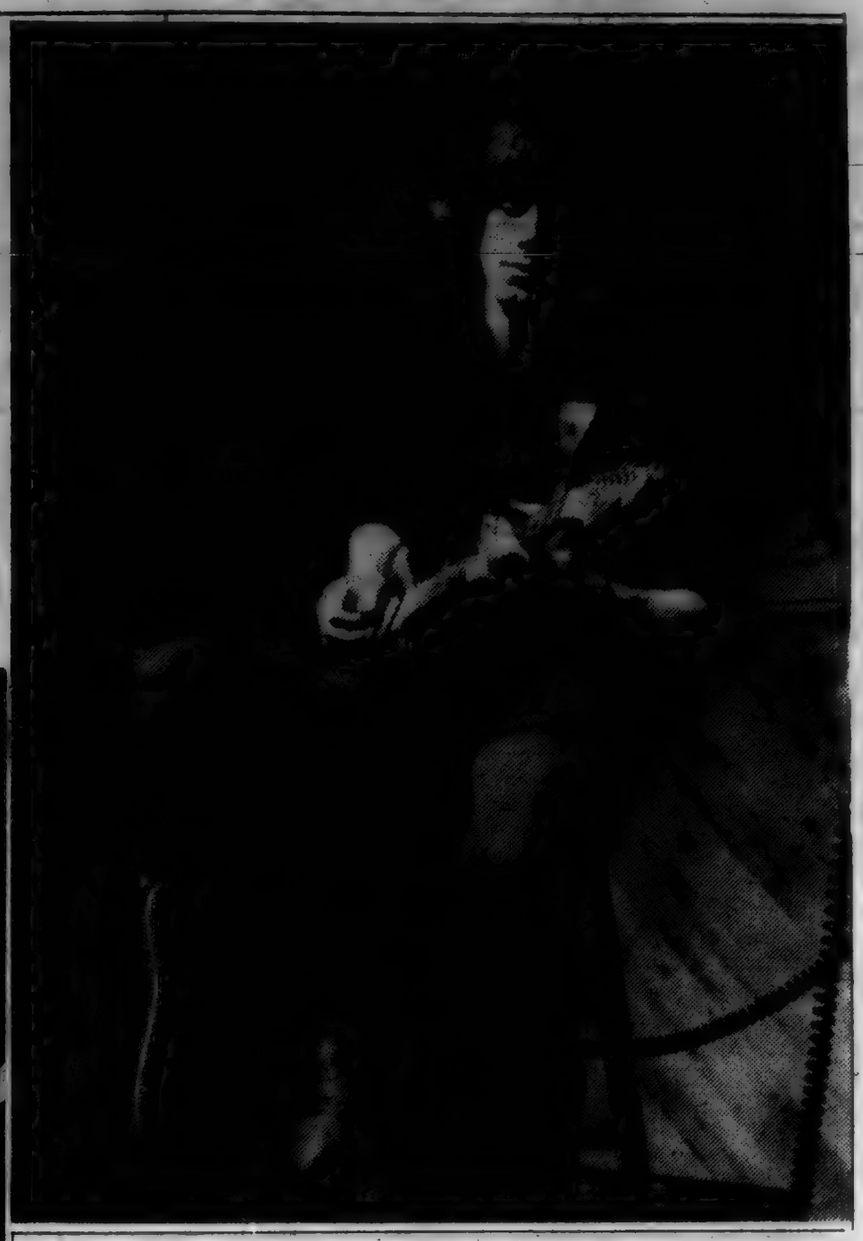
Reading aloud, William Stafford's manner meshed with his writing for a personable, explaining quality. Marked by a not-so-slight Mid-western drawl, Stafford's voice and rhythm suited his poetry without the forced feeling of a performance. On the page, as well as before an audience, is where his work succeeds.

From his Stories That Could Be True – New and Collected Poems (Harper & Row, $10.95 hardbound), Stafford read selections that shared a quality of quiet observation. His poems begin with pictures or thoughts that "occur" to him in the initial process of writing, an indication of his eye for what makes a poem. These occurred thoughts adhere to each other so well.

Born in Kansas in 1914, William Stafford writes mostly within the mental and physical landscape of the American west. Families, small towns, and wild animals all figure prominently in this world and Stafford (who now lives and teaches in Oregon) looks at it with wonder and gentle humor.

Out of the immediate recollection or thought in which Stafford finds a poem, associations lead to much larger things. Among the poems he read at UVM, "Thinking For Berky" was particularly memorable. After wondering what has become of a lost schoolmate, Stafford turns to the world she is lost in: "There are things not solved in our town though tomorrow came:/ there are things time passing can never make come true./ We live in an occupied country, misunderstood;/ justice will take us millions of intricate moves."

Stafford's most recent book, Stories That Could Be True, collects poems from five previous books, along with newer work. It stands best as a retrospective. Stafford is concerned with individual moments and small scenes that combine to make the life of a person or a place. Viewed as a body, the poems in the collection seem to repeat themselves.



The variety in Stafford's work lies in the unusual ways he speaks of the world. Marked by place names and other things the poet remembers, that world doesn't appear to change much in the nearly twenty years of work that Stories That Could Be True covers.

At his reading, Stafford interspersed his poems with anecdotes and comments on poetry and writing, telling the audience he preferred not to believe large blocks of uninterrupted reading. This gave him an advantage, having each poem set off by itself.

Taken separately or together, Stafford's poems approach what he is describing in "Spectator," where he begins, "Make the moment go rich in your stammering/ The grape already on the tongue,/ the words thought and old before they are said/ you can have time surrounded."

William Stafford's appearance at UVM was sponsored by the Writer's Workshop of the University of Vermont, part of a series of poetry and fiction readings offered each semester.

John Pousette-Dart played to a full house at R.W. Hunt's on Monday night. Singing tunes that he wrote for The Posette-Dart Band, the young musician breezed through melodies that pleased the audience. A little nervous and uncomfortable on stage, he recovered from some early mistakes to create and enjoyable performance. Although two attempted sing alongs didn't quite work, the crowd seemed to like the concert overall.

McGuinn/ Hillman's Timeline

By Jon Lese

The Roger McGuinn/Chris Hillman band entertained an enthusiastic crowd screaming for old Byrds' songs at R. W. Hunt's Sunday night. The two long-time folk-rock musicians continued their recent success with songs mostly from their two latest albums.

Without the services of Gene Clark, who appeared with the two in their last Burlington appearance, McGuinn and Hillman had Al Perkins, former member of the Flying Burrito Brothers and the Gram Parsons Group, playing lead and pedal steel guitar. Perkins has also done some early work for the Byrds and added flavor to the band, particularly in the group's opening song, "Don't You Write Her Off." The audience was treated to swift harmonies and characteristic McGuinn leads reminiscent of the former Byrds, yet with a new contemporary sound.

It's been ten years since the last of the Byrds played that easy country-rock. Now, with a new band and a new image, the McGuinn/Hillman band still retains that eerie Byrd sound, as the song "Turn on your Radio" from their new album attests. That country/western lead, mixed with the smooth lyrics, brings back memories of those early sixties' jams.

After several songs, the band left the stage and, apparently, their momentum, for acoustic guitar solos by Hillman and then McGuinn. McGuinn, playing a twelve-string guitar, played an unreleased song entitled "Severe Mercy." He worked around occasional feedback to show that he still has the talent for writing lyrics and music. McGuinn and Hillman played a duet called "Pretty Boy Floyd," featuring Hillman on lead and McGuinn playing rhythm on his twelve-string.

Finally answering the screams of the crowd, the band slipped into a segment of old music. "Turn, Turn, Turn," a song on the Byrds' first album, received a great response, and when the band dipped into "Mr. Spaceman," the crowd became hysterical. "Jesus is Just Alright," a song made famous by the Doobie Brothers but written by the Byrds, also left a profound impression on the audience. At times, the band seemed tighter on their newer songs, than on their older ones. The drummer, Tom Mooney, didn't seem to be on beat sometimes, throwing the other members off, but with no visible effect on the wild, cheering audience.

Coming back for two encores to a foot-stomping, hand-clapping crowd, the band played their famous "Eight Miles High" and then moved back to the present for a new song, "America For Me." This was a patriotic song with references to the beautiful U.S.A. and to bringing the former hostages home.

The show at Hunt's was a fine representation of how older musicians can produce new music, based on their past, with an original, contemporary sound. The music of the McGuinn/Hillman Band is a mixture of their connection with their past and their potential for the future.

Rock 'n Roll, Please, and Hold the Religion

By Mark J. Cadigan

The 4th Movement's self-titled album is full of surprises. For one thing, the musicians are all brothers: David (lead, rhythm guitars), Dennis (drums), and Bobby (bass, vocals) Hackney. Secondly, the album was recorded at the Starbuck/Ashley recording studio in Burlington. Finally, and most importantly, the songs are all religious, flavored with Biblical allusions and modern Christian euphemisms.

Religious rock 'n roll? Well, if Bob Dylan can switch from sneering sarcasm to "born again" lyrics, why can't The 4th Movement come out and preach their beliefs through their music? Their only problem may be reaching a secular audience.

I have difficulty with this record, because religion and rock music don't mix well in my mind. Also, I don't want someone to tell me: "How many times must I pound my head/ trying to get the message through to you/ When either way there will come the day/ when Jesus will reign over you." I certainly don't want anyone to pound his head for my sake.

Few people will be interested in this album unless they're Christian fundamentalists or need someone to tell them how to live their lives. In a sense, it's too bad the band's appeal is narrow, because Bobby Hackney's voice is melodic and emotional, and the group's music varies between light and semi-heavy rock 'n roll, often reminiscent of a 1960's-type sound.

The drumming and bass playing are consistent throughout, and the guitar playing is pleasant, though it gets a bit twangy at times. The strumming on "He Even Reigns Today" and "Life Without End," however, is light and airy, calming the listener. Conversely, some of the guitar leads are pretty hot, and if David Hackney would let loose more often and play with the intensity that he does on "Always at Your Door," the tunes wouldn't all sound so similar.

Lyrically, the same thing is said in a variety of ways, but it all comes down to: be thankful to God. "Love your life and daily live your dreams" is sound advice, and I'm sure most people would agree with that sentiment. Yet, what I hear: "all is vanity, weak man can't you see?," I'm inclined to respond, "Who are you to say that?" I don't think of anyone as inherently better than anyone else, and I resent the fact that the audience as a whole is looked down upon as "weak."

Since this is strictly a personal opinion, many will probably disagree – that's to be expected. To put it bluntly, I think that preaching belongs in churches and not on rock 'n roll albums. I have to admit that The 4th Movement are quite talented, particularly in light of their lack of additional guitars, synthesizers, and other instruments. Nevertheless, they'll have to confront the large barrier between them and possible fans due to their religious orientation.

The 4th Dimension

Ice magic, Instead of Beers

By Lynn Cline & Liz Peck

It's four weeks into the semester, and by now most students have settled into a basic routine of weekly classes, weekend happy hours, "downtown" excursions, and crowded fraternity parties. However, if this monotonous life has you seeking a change from the usual weekend rituals, the eighth annual UVM Ice Show should provide a welcome change.

This year's show, entitled "Expressions in Music," will be held on February 13 and 14 at 7:30 p.m. in Gutterson Field House. It promises to be a lively audio-visual performance.

Included in the program are guest skaters who rank among the nation's best: fifteen year old Elain Zayak, a 1980 world team member; Alan Schramm, contender for this year's world team and one of the best show skaters in the world; and of course, members of the UVM hockey team.

Eight years ago, a group of touring national competitors came to Lake Placid, New York and were invited to perform at UVM by a student, Barbara Levitt. The resulting exhibition initiated the annual Ice Show, and the following year the Ice Show featured skaters from the Champlain Valley Skating Club. It then became an official part of the Winter Festival at UVM.

Without much publicity, the show failed to attract a large audience, and it played a minor role among the more traditional events of the Winter Carnival. But over the past few years this has changed. The Athletic Department, recently replacing the Student Association as sponsor, has provided a larger budget. UVM students Vicki and Rene Newsham, the show's director and choreographer, are working hard with this extra money. Aided by advisor Ted Castle, UVM's rink manager, they hope to make their show a recognized campus event and an integral part of the Winter Ceremonies.

This year the directors are "really trying for a pro show," says Newsham. The visual effects, designed by Kelly Evans, strongly emphasize the show's theme of "Expressions in Music" and set the scene for a magical, musical show. The program includes a variety of different acts with the members ranging widely in age and experience. This illustrates the directors' efforts to "involve as much of UVM as possible" in their show. In addition to the great skaters, members of sororities and fraternities will display their talents, while children from the UVM skating school will strut their stuff to a song composed by UVM graduate Peter Rothkin.

For avid hockey fans, the UVM hockey team's number promises to be entertaining. The Royall Tyler Theater has lent its facilities for sets and costumes, and the UVM video department will tape the show for an ETV broadcast to be shown at a later date.

"This makes the Ice Show a total UVM function," explains Newsham. "We've moved in and we hope to make this a tradition."

Tickets are on sale at Bailey's Music store, Mills and Greer, the Outfitters, the Athletic Office, and Billings Student Center, as well as at the door. Adults will be charged $2.50, students $2.00, and children 12 and under, $1.50.

On the Tube

By Ed Stearns

Last May, Mt. St. Helens reminded us that politicians were not the only source of hot air in an election year. It also reminded us of something many politicians are loath to admit: how helpless we are when faced with a situation beyond our control.

For some people, the eruption of Mt. St. Helens symbolized a collective venting of the frustration and anger that many Americans were feeling at the time. For others, it merely served as a temporary diversion from the petty squabbles that seemed to dominate the news.

There were those among us, however, who viewed the eruption of Mt. St. Helens as more than just a passing fancy, and instead saw it as an opportunity of a lifetime. No, I'm not referring to those savvy entrepreneurs who saw a lucrative market for volcanic ash and "I Survived Mt. St. Helens" t-shirts, but to the dedicated geologists around the world who are striving to find better methods for predicting volcanic eruptions.

This week, the award-winning documentary series NOVA presents "Anatomy of a Volcano," the first in-depth look at the incident and its aftermath to appear on television. NOVA looks at the events leading up to the eruption, and analyzes the actual explosion using a series of photographs taken by a nearby amateur photographer.

NOVA

"Anatomy of a Volcano" gives us the first-hand accounts of people who had to flee for their lives to escape the scalding cloud of ash coming from the volcano. The camera also accompanies scientists from the United States Geological Survey as they set up survey posts inside the mouth of the crater.

Geologists who have studied Mt. St. Helens extensively since last May, often risking their lives in the process, share with us their findings about the early warning signs of future eruptions. Someday they hope to be able to use these findings to help prevent the extensive damage and loss of life that often results from volcanic eruptions.

"Anatomy of a Volcano" will be aired Tuesday, February 10, at 8:00 p.m. on Vermont ETV/UHF channel 33 or cable channel 10.

WRUV's Spoken Word

At 6 p.m. on Monday, February 9th, WRUV's Spoken Word program hosts Gale Lawrence. Ms. Lawrence writes a regular naturalist column, and 52 of her essays have been collected and published under the title The Beginning Naturalist by the New England Press. She'll be talking about the process of changing from a nature-lover to a nature-writer. Anyone interested in writing or in any aspect of the natural world should find this half-hour fascinating and worthwhile.

Spoken Word welcomes anyone who writes, talks, acts, or reads to contact them. Call Tim Brookes at the UVM English Dept. (656-3056) or WRUV's Public Relations Officer, Elise Brown (656-2247) for more information.

The Jam Spreads Out

By Jim Apfelbaum

Since The Beatles, only one group has entered the British singles charts at the top. That group, The Jam, has just released a new album, Sound Affects, The Jam's fifth (all but one are available domestically). Sound Affects includes two recent number ones, "Going Underground" and "Start."

Although the group's U.K. audience would go wild over a new release of whale sounds, The Jam continues to push forward musically, consciously avoiding typecasting but still satisfying their urges in the studio.

"That's Entertainment" on side one combines a pleasant musical backdrop of acoustic guitars and soothing harmonies with Paul Weller's casual but satirical lyrics, which sting. The song shines brilliantly and stands as one of their best to date. Favorites of mine include "Boy About Town," "Dreamtime," and "Dreams of Children" (included on a special single). You won't find any headbanging here, but The Beatles' influence abounds (Revolver is an acknowledged source).

In America, The Jam has been saddled with a "You're too British" rap. But with this album, that claim becomes meaningless.

ROBERT RINDLER
TWELVE VISUAL URBAN STORIES

By Max O. Lesselbaum

Robert Rindler creates new art. Using the latest in color Xerox equipment to create his special effects, Rindler's multi-colored mundanity resounds in his latest work, 12 Urban Visual Stories. This show can be seen at The Colburn Gallery through February 13, 1981.

Seventy-two pieces, thirty-six vertical and thirty-six horizontal, fill the gallery space. In 1975, Bob Rindler was responsible for designing the Colburn Gallery. "In a sense," said Rindler, "I made and planned this show to fit the Colburn Gallery."

Recently, color Xerox has become a very popular art medium (if you can afford it). In this Xerox process, color intensity can be controlled with the turn of a knob, adding more or less of the three main colors, or yellow, magenta (red-purple), and cyan (blue-green) to the color prints or slides being reproduced. The richness of color lends a depth and projection to otherwise natural tones.

The vertical works on the walls facing each other are from one of Rindler's earlier shows called Twice. In these, every image is a double — there are pairs of couples, animals, plants, and street objects. Each piece has its own color scheme, indicated below each image by grids which contain a foreign postage stamp cancelled out by the color's name; such as "purple," "green," "red." A layer of transparent acetate covers each "Story" which has a thread of the color zig-zagged in by a sewing machine. Each piece has been constructed with engagingly unique intricacy of detail.

"When Xerox reproductions come out of the machine," Rindler explained, "they are wet. If you touch them at this point, they will smear. I have experimented with smearing, and the effect can be seen in the series that has a large 'X' right through the middle of the print. I like that set a lot... aren't they punk?" he queried.

The success of Rindler's work is due to his sharp eye for good visual effects, that he is a fine photographer, and he does everything in quantity. Color photos are the focus of his recent work, which all toy with the urban environment, which give the individual pieces their own special character. Rindler commented on how he takes his photographs of people. "What I do is shout HEY!! and then shoot the picture."

Two years ago, Rindler exhibited his "visual comedy review" called Shirts for Sale. In this show, color pictures were taken of Rindler's collection of 300 shirts. The photos were then color Xeroxed and given their own paper plaque. The shirts, ranging anywhere from "work" to "hot Italian" style, were signed, sealed, stamped, and sold for five dollars each. The effervescence of style in Shirts carries on into his most recent work. Bob Rindler's whimsical and spirited style has created Twelve Visual Urban Stories that speak for themselves.

Amnesty International Group No. 28 announces the adoption of a political prisoner from the Republic of Mali. One of the group's major difficulties now is finding a volunteer who speaks good French.

Lamine Laico Traore is one of twenty teachers arrested as members of an autonomous teachers trade union that had been working, through the Ministry of Education, for an increase of salaries for teachers. Receiving no response from the government, teachers began boycotting some of their responsibilities. The government accused the union of creating disorder and said it would be opposed with "absolute rigor."

Lamine is being held and has not been charged or tried. It is feared that he, along with the others, will be tried soon, perhaps without lawyers. Anyone who thinks they can help out in the case should contact Steve at 658-6738 (caseworker).

Make Music Together

The choral music program at Living/Learning has room for people who would like to commit two hours of choral rehearsal on Sunday nights at 6:00 in 115 Commons, L/L. This term, we plan to do a wide variety of music from folk to classical. Solos will also be encouraged. For those interested in an informal but goal-directed group, contact Dave Hall or Reed Dewey at 656-4254 or drop by on Sunday night.

25 Make Time For Campus Center

After almost two years of research, Student Activities Director David Nestor and several students have developed a plan for the restoration and expansion of Billings.

Nestor's planning began with a "needs report" completed and presented to UVM President Coor in September, 1979. The report showed that the elegant but worn Billings, a national landmark which has been placed in the National Historic Register, is in dire need of restoration and is now inadequate as a center for a student population of over 7000.

At the same time, the report and S.A. President Mike Deutsch insisted that it would be a mistake to set sights on an entirely new student center. Two such plans failed dismally in the past because of the astronomical costs involved. But the major shortcoming of any plan that would exclude Billings, they said, was that Billings is a beautiful structure which UVM alumni and undergrads have special affection for. Billings is a UVM tradition.

The Campus Center Project planners hired Shepley Bulfinch Richardson & Abbott, the original designers of Billings, to design an expanded Billings Center.

The plans for the renovation and expansion of Billings are featured in our issue this week. Though financial plans for the proposed $5 million project — state capital improvement funds, private contributions, and a small student fee effective in 1984 when the project would be completed — do not directly affect our pocketbooks, the Campus Center Project deserves some serious attention. Everybody's yelling about the problems for students at UVM. Here's a chance to solve one.

Alas, when S.A President Deutsch called a General Assembly last week so that the Billings feasibility study would go to the students for questions, and a tentative approval or disapproval, only 25 of UVM's near 7500 undergrads attended.

Letters To The Editor

Nuke Movement Hypocritical

To the Editor:

The so-called anti-nuclear movement in America, led in part by student activists on our college campuses, seems to be withering away. I agree with the Cynic that the conservative tide sweeping the U.S. probably has a good deal to do with it. I also believe the real reason for this occurrence lies within the general make-up of the activists themselves.

At UVM for example, the outright majority of "No Nukers" were usually wealthy, hypocritical, self-serving, neo-hippie types. They constituted the bulk of the movement's membership encouraging conservation and disbandment of nuclear power plants. Meanwhile, these same so-called activists were driving their SAAB Turbos to class during the week, and then down to the second home in southern Vermont for a weekend of skiing. When it came to actually going to the Seabrook's or Vernon's (Seabrook, N.H., Vernon, VT) to protest the issue they were not to be found.

If people are really serious about a nuclear free America, then they should be active in their cause. Which leads me to the inevitable conclusion that these NO NUKERS are, for the most part, selfish, empty-minded rich kids similar to those who followed George McGovern. It seems as though many of these same people have gotten bored with the movement because it's no longer the fashionable thing to do.

I sincerely doubt the anti-nuclear movement in America will forever be in this state of quiet passivity. I believe there are many sincere, loyal, individuals very much opposed to nuclear energy. However, if this activism is to put its lasting mark upon this nation, they must begin disassociating themselves from the type of phony believer prevalent within the movement today.

Allow Students a Little Grace

To the Editor:

Three cheers for Grove Potter and his timely commentary illustrating the overbearing foolishness of the University Calendar Committee. Given the opportunity I would throttle the administration until it too became senseless and efficient. With bureaucratic scissors it has snipped the valuable time necessary to complete a semester's worth of work. In the same turn I would like to reduce the administration down to the slim role it was originally meant to play. Some claim the government must get off the backs of the people. Ditto for the administration at the university.

Its essential purpose is to relieve professors of the mind-wasting dribble of schedules and the apportionment of classes, and relieve students of the time consuming drudgery of the organization of academic material and the settling of living quarters. The administration was never meant to dictate academic policy. Exams in themselves are an intrusion by the bureaucracy on the learning process. It is a given that information stored up for the exam will be properly jettisonned as soon as the course is disposed of. Students are asked to regurgitate, and almost never to achieve some new synthesis of information. Exams serve no true educational purpose other than to screen, label, and classify incoming or outgoing candidates for diplomas. Are they necessary? Maybe. If only to urge students to finish their work.

But to ask an individual to finish his work, and not give him enough time, is to promote havoc and push hypocrisy. The least the calendar people could do is remanipulate the schedule, and allow us to suffer through the finals of the spring semester with a little grace.

Sincerely,
Alfred Terry

You Mean We Lost?

Come on Cynic,

Get your act together. When the final score of a track meet is UVM 30, Bates 65, and UNH 70, how could you say Vermont won? Either they have come up with a new way to score a track meet or Harry Eastman doesn't know his ass from a shot put. Doesn't anybody with a little sports knowledge reread the articles before they go to print.

Nice concluding paragraph also. It doesn't say anything. And if you call getting beat by 40 points an outstanding performance, you must have also picked the Eagles to win the Superbowl.

Tell Eastman to get a real job.

Love & kisses,

"Numbness"?

To the Editor:

In the editorial of last week (Feb. 5) the writer made many comments concerning the complacency, apathy and numbness of many of the students on campuses today. These conclusions were made in apparent contrast to the "activism" of the years gone by, better known as "the good old days."

Apparently, the writer lacked the direct contact with those "old days" in sufficient quantity to evaluate the more subtle ways in which the youth of today have translated their activism into less obviously violent channels. This is not to suggest that there are not times when the inertia of any group of people resists rapid change. There will always be resistance to change, just as there will always be pressure to achieve change.

To label subtle activities as "numbness" appears to be more a statement concerning the writer's frame of mind than it is saying anything at all about society.

God Bless the Believers

To the Editor:

After reading the article on the 4th Movement by Mark Cadigan, I am inclined to believe that Mark has a serious problem with Christianity and religion. I also noticed that he feels that "preaching should be done only in Churches." Well Mark I have just one question for you. Should we keep the Christian principles only in church also? God bless Bob Dylan, the 4th Movement and all other believing entertainers.

Ronald Wilson Reagan:

A Consummate American in the Truest Sense

By L. E. Lassiter

For Ronald Wilson Reagan, there is nothing anti-climactic about septuagenarian status. Indeed, Reagan has achieved something which only thirty-eight other men were able to attain – and has done so at a more advanced age than any of his predecessors. Yet the responses elicited by the mere mention of the new president's surname ofttimes are unflattering in the extreme; within the confines of the (admittedly unrepresentative) UVM community, the most typical responses run the gamut from amusement to scorn to indignation, and ultimately, to slander.

I must acknowledge that four years ago I might well have been one of Ronald Reagan's more vitriolic critics. Even now, I find that the fulminations of the president's spouse ("I believe in the death penalty – I believe it would save lives," "If the film industry doesn't start censoring itself, we're going to have to do it for them.") are odious, pretentious, and reprehensible as only the truly inane can be. I grudgingly forgive her lunacy, however. If she abuses the right to speak candidly, then we've scarcely a problem, for such "abuses" are themselves rather inconsequential.

The First Lady has long exhibited the uncanny, almost superhuman capacity for staring relentlessly at her mate as he delivers yet another lecture from his 3" by 5" index cards – a phenomenon which is so very disconcerting to me. I refuse to believe that such devotion can be feigned. Further, I submit that herein lies an enlightening aspect of the Reagans' appeal: as perhaps no other president could ever have hoped to, Ronald Reagan embodies sincerity, avuncularity, and – dare I write it at the risk of being thought an imbecile – idealism!

Yes, idealism.

Consider, if you will, the content of a given Reagan speech. Aside from the mundane particulars – i.e., fiscal responsibility, reductions in governmental authority, an unsurpassed armada, and the like – Reagan stump rhetoric is rife with a romanticized version of America, the "Shining City on a Hill." Assuredly, such oratorical flourishes as "Those who say we are in a time when there are no heroes just don't know where to look. You can see heroes every day going in and out of factory gates," are so wholesome, so simple, and yet so genuine, as to warrant our attention – and even our respect.

Be mindful that Reagan has voiced such platitudes for over two decades now. He did so with such fervor during his tenure with the General Electric Corporation, in fact, that he was thought to be an unmanageable zealot and was given his walking papers. G.E., mind you. A Bastion of Individual Initiative, Free Enterprise, Family, Neighborhood, Work, Peace, Freedom, Truth, Justice, and the American Way if ever there was one! To think that Ronald Reagan was too base in his reactionism, too strict in his constructionism, too staunch in his conservatism for such as they! I recall now the emphatic self-description of a particularly "rugged individualist," one Paul Anderson of Toccoa, Georgia, who bellowed thusly: "Compared to me, John Wayne is a Communist!"

But I digress...

As I write this, Ronald Reagan has been President for slightly over a fortnight. That he has confounded a generation of self-proclaimed expert political analysts by ascending to the nation's 'one mythic office' (to borrow a phrase from E. L. Doctorow) says much for the man who, as an eleven-year-old boy, had to drag his drunken father out of the snow into home and hearth.

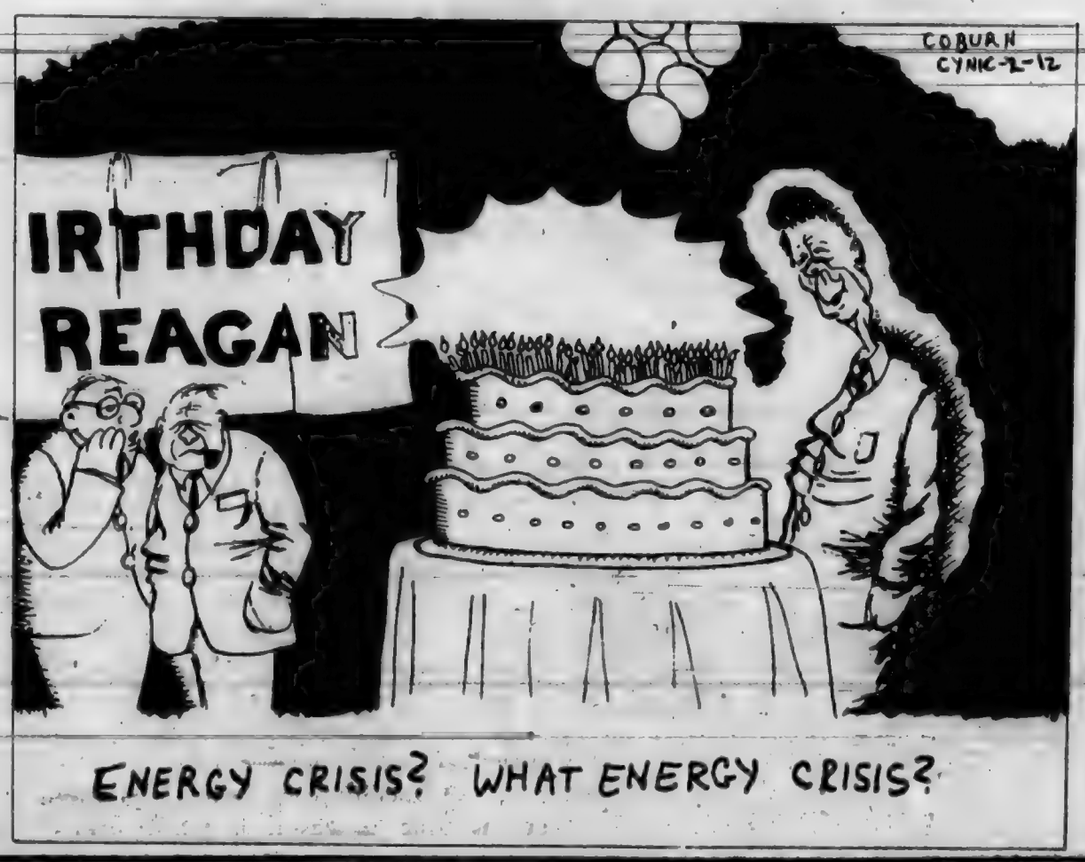
If it seems that President Reagan has won me over, then please be somewhat less smug in judging me. I am one of the 872 pariahs who chose John Bowden Connally Jr. over Reagan in the Vermont Republican Presidential Preference Primary last briefest presidential tenure ever. (Harrison was also the first president to die in office.)

Reagan, as fate would have it, is a resident of California – and here the precedent is disheartening. Richard Nixon was born and raised in the Golden State, while Herbert Hoover – whom I reluctantly include in this woebegone category – was, like Reagan, a transplanted Midwesterner.

As the reader may be aware, every president elected in a year with the last digit of zero, since the time of the aforementioned Mr. Harrison, has either fallen prey to a fatal illness or an assassin's bullet while serving as the commander-in-chief. Mr. Reagan will be attempting to defy this trend – and I wish him well. Already, the irreverent among us are enjoying the macabre spectre of an abrupt transition; in the classified advertising sections of such periodicals as Rolling Stone and The New Republic, one may find circulars offering bumper stickers which bear the legend "Reagan in '80; Bush in '81."

Well, no matter. I would no sooner deprive such commie-symp/collectivist/ effete-snob/fascist-appeasing/sexually-perverted/ registration-dodging/drug-addled/no-nuke/ military-emasculating/hedonistic/ petition-pushing/rabble-rousing/ no-growth/expectation-limiting/narcissistic/ gun-registering/God-forsaking geeks the opportunity to express their contempt, in a reasonable fashion, than relinquish this basic right myself.

That Mr. Reagan is so objectionable to a sizable portion of the electorate should not dissuade him from his agenda; nor should he be inhibited by the excoriations of a hostile media. Presidents seemingly offer a more accessible scapegoat than any other citizen, yet presidents are fellow citizens nevertheless. It is at once amusing and profound to realize that a president's popularity is never greater than during March. I have been heard to express reservations about Mr. Reagan on the basis of the historical record. Previously, the oldest elected president was a rather unfortunate gentleman named William Henry Harrison, whose fate it was to deliver an inaugural address in the freezing rain of Washington, D.C., on March 4, 1841. Predictably, the 68-year-old Harrison contracted pneumonia and died a month later, the those periods when a despicable adversary appears to embody an immediate threat to our national well-being.



Presidents are imbued with notoriety as virtually no one else is, and failures of policy are traditionally attributed to them, whether fair or not. Perhaps no other qualification is quite so vital as the capacity to withstand vilification, for in an open society, vilification of policy-makers is an integral feature.

Adlai Stevenson wasn't quite so imperious or sarcastic as he might have seemed when he said, "Your public servants serve you right." If it seems that Americans as a voting community make some very ill-considered choices on occasion, then I forgive them without hesitation. It has been said, by people of innumerable nationalities, races, creeds, religions, sizes, shapes, genders, et. al., that Americans are exceptionally naive. All too often, I'll grant you, this has proven to be the case. Still, some of my best friends are Americans, and I offer no apology for that.

As for President Reagan, I find evidence that the man is something of a well-intentioned bumpkin – quite comical, and just as astonishing, to see in a fellow who turned 70 on the sixth of February. Arguably, then, Ronald Wilson Reagan is a consummate American in the truest sense. At midday of January 20th, I should have preferred to hear the affable voice of a Gerald Rudolph Ford, Jr., or the supremely self-assured elocution of a John Connally reciting the presidential oath. I heard neither, and it is futile to dwell on such matters. Oh, what could have been!

So much for speculation. If I am just one among millions who are not unequivocally enthused about a Ronald Reagan presidency, it would be wholly improper, all the same, to infer that I anticipate or desire his failure. Having as we all do, a personal and a mutual stake in the well-being of America, I daresay that now is an inappropriate time for obstinacy. Reagan said it most succinctly, and adeptly, in his inaugural peroration: "After All, We Are Americans."

Poverty In American Cities:

As Serious As It Was Twenty Years Ago

By Patrick J. Rooney

The problems facing many Blacks and Hispanics in America are as severe today as they were ten or even twenty years ago. In some cases they are worse.

Poverty levels in central cities (where 75 percent of all Blacks reside) have increased dramatically over the last decade. In New York City, for example, the number of people living in technical poverty ($6,662 for a family of four) rose from 14.6 percent of the population in 1969, to 18.2 percent in 1978, despite the fact that the number of central city Whites living in poverty declined by 5 percent over the same time period. The average income for all Black families in 1980, $10,879, was 61 percent of the national average; hardly an encouraging sign. And the unemployment rate among Black teenagers continues to soar at dangerously high levels. The latest figures hover around 39 percent.

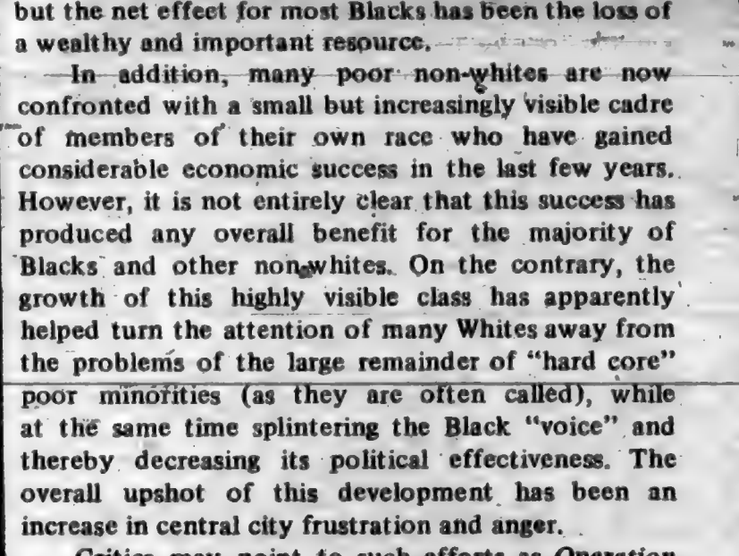
Hispanics, on the other hand, present an even bleaker picture. During the last two decades, their income levels have fallen from 71 percent of the national average in 1959, to 49 percent in 1979.

It would seem then, that many of the frustrations and problems which helped to spawn the massive upheavals of 1967 and '68 still burden many central city minorities. In fact, there are a number of reasons for believing that these groups may be feeling even more frustration now than they did at that time.

First, many of the liberal and moderate Whites who assisted in the drive for civil rights early on in the 60's, through, for instance, heavy contributions to such groups as the N.A.A.C.P., have now jumped ship for more "faddish" campaigns — the halt of nuclear proliferation, environmental issues, women's rights and its attendant causes, and the problems of the aged, to name a few. The reasons for this fallout of support appear to be numerous and complicated, but the net effect for most Blacks has been the loss of a wealthy and important resource.

In addition, many poor non-whites are now confronted with a small but increasingly visible cadre of members of their own race who have gained considerable economic success in the last few years. However, it is not entirely clear that this success has produced any overall benefit for the majority of Blacks and other non-whites. On the contrary, the growth of this highly visible class has apparently helped turn the attention of many Whites away from the problems of the large remainder of "hard core" poor minorities (as they are often called), while at the same time splintering the Black "voice" and thereby decreasing its political effectiveness. The overall upshot of this development has been an increase in central city frustration and anger.

Critics may point to such efforts as Operation Push, started by Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, as evidence that the new middle and upper class Black has taken the initiative in improving the lot of their fellow Blacks. But it does not appear that even these impressive attempts, by themselves, are enough to break the ghetto cycle.



Perhaps the most important reason for minority frustration is the striking lack of meaningful economic and political change which the last ten years have produced. There does not appear to be any simple explanation for this phenomenon. However, one crucial factor undoubtedly is the subtle nature of the discrimination facing many non-whites in America today.

In many instances, this discrimination shows itself covertly or even unintentionally — White flight to the suburbs, for instance. Also, its presence oftentimes performs no clear-cut violence to democratic norms. Zoning policies that effectively exclude low income families from certain neighborhoods might serve as an example. Does this practice violate doctrines of equal protection? How are we to deal with the property rights of the controlling group? The same questions might be asked of corporate hiring policies.

It is becoming increasingly clear, then, that not only does a very serious minority problem still exist in this country, but also that the remedies for dealing with this problem are becoming more elusive. Who do we look to for answers, the government? The private sector?

One possible starting point might be found in a comprehensive, nonpartisan, Congressional examination of current public policy. Among other things, such an inquest would have to answer at least the following questions: How are we to know when "equality of opportunity" has been achieved? Or do we want "equality of result?" How are we to distribute the burdens of our policies? How much should we all be willing to sacrifice?

Perhaps such an exploration may come up empty-handed. It may be that the structure of our government is such that it is incapable of adequately handling such involved and value-laden issues. (It would certainly appear that way today.) If that be the case, then another possible remedy must be found. As a nation, we can no longer pass this issue off with glib generalities; for if we continue to ignore the plight of the central city minority, we may well be forced, ten years from now, to view Miami as the Watts of the Eighties.

A False and Dangerous Inference

By Michael M. Cohen

In the February 5, 1981 issue of the Vermont Cynic, there appeared an article titled, "UVM Steams Arabs with New Heating Plant." The article was about UVM taking a "giant step toward lessening our dependence on oil" with the ameliorations made to UVM's Central Heating Plant. The article had nothing to do with, as the title implied, steaming Arabs. However, implicit in the title was the belief that by lessening our dependence on oil we were getting back at the Arabs. Such an inference is both false and dangerous.

It is false because we do not import all of our oil. And it is false because, of the oil we import, not all of it comes from Arab countries. According to the U.S. Department of Commerce we imported oil from some 34 countries in 1978. Of those countries, only 11 were Arab. We imported oil from Canada, Mexico, Bolivia, Indonesia, Nigeria, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union, to mention a few. We imported more oil from Nigeria than any other country in the world with the exception of Saudi Arabia. Contrary to popular belief, Iran, from whom we used to import a large percentage of our oil, is not an Arab country. It is a Persian country with an Arab minority which claims to be discriminated against.

If this were not the case and we did import all of our oil from only Arab countries, the title would still prove disturbing. The title exemplifies the prevalent attitude in the United States towards Arabs. "UVM Steams Negroes" would never have been allowed to be printed if, hypothetically, a similar article was written and we imported all of our oil from Africa. Some months back an article appeared that pointed out that if Abscam (which stood for Arab Scam) had used Jewish bankers instead and was called "Jewscam," there would have been a public outcry in this country. This was not the case with Abscam. The name played right into the accepted stereotype of Arabs, they should not be trusted.

To some extent, even our language contributes to this attitude. There are blacks and there are niggers. There are Jews and there are kikes. There are people of Spanish origin and there are spics. There are good people and there are bad people. There are only Arabs. There is no distinction made. When speaking of an Arab, it is almost implicit that one is speaking of someone bad.

The release of the hostages saw an outpouring of patriotism in this country. We were moved by their tales of fortitude, courage, and faith. Correctly, we were angered by their stories of mistreatment. One of the hostages was told falsely during his interrogation that his mother was dead. It was easy to see ourselves as all good and the Iranians as all bad. The night after the 52 landed back in America there appeared a non-fictional movie on television about a black American soldier who had been accused of stealing N.A.T.O. secrets some years back. Unknown to him at the time he was given L.S.D. during his interrogation. He was also falsely told during his interrogation that his mother was dying.

Bob Dylan wrote in his song "With God on Our Side,"

When the Second World War
Came to an end
We forgave the Germans
And we were friends
Though they murdered six million
In the ovens they fried
The Germans now too
Have God on their side.

There will come a time when we shall say that the Arabs and Persians have God (Allah if you will) also on their side. And they shall say the same of us. The sooner this happens the better. Jesus of Nazareth said, "He who is without sin cast the first stone." It is easy for an individual, a group, a nation to cast a one-sided judgment and label others in a negative light while forgetting one's own transgressions. No one nation, or group, or individual has a golden copyright on good, or bad for that matter. We are all made of both.

The problems we face in this world today are too acute and too intertwined to be seen in an all-good versus all-bad perspective. Stereotyped labels are a part of that outlook. They are false because they are based on misinformation, and they are dangerous because they help divide people into opposing camps — camps which do not communicate with each other. For the problems of the world to be solved, there needs to be more and better communication and understanding between the inhabitants of this globe. A step in that direction would be the elimination of article titles such as "UVM Steams Arabs with New Heating Plant."

Billings Restoration And Expansion

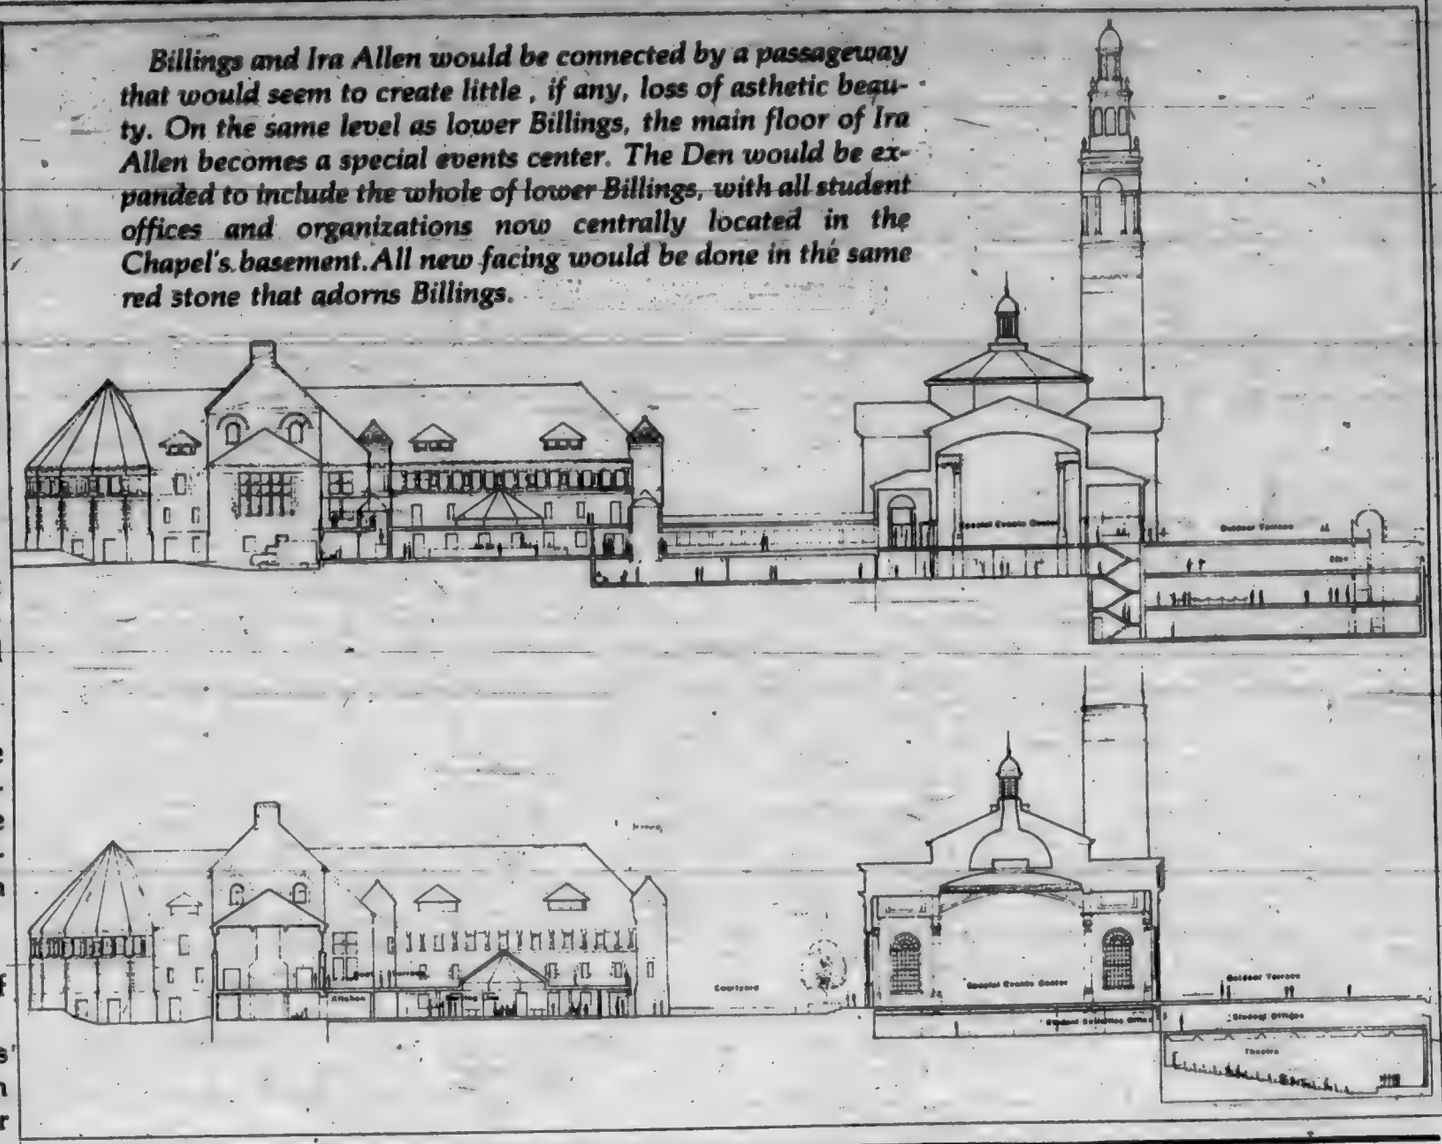
Billings Center Report

Student Activities Office

A student center can be one of the strongest unifying forces in the life of a college campus. Its mission is congruent with the quality of life among all citizens of the campus community. The Student Activities Office, as it administers the Billings Center in consort with the mission of the University of Vermont, finds the role of the student center most clearly articulated in the Association of College Unions - International Statement of Purpose which reads:

1. The union of the community center of the college, for all the members of the college family-students, faculty, alumni and guests. It is not just a building; it is also an organization and a program. Together they represent a well-considered plan for the community life of the college.

2. As the 'living room' or the 'hearthstone' of the college, the union provides for the services, conveniences, and amenities the members of the college need in their daily life on the campus and for getting to know and understand one another through informal association outside the classroom.

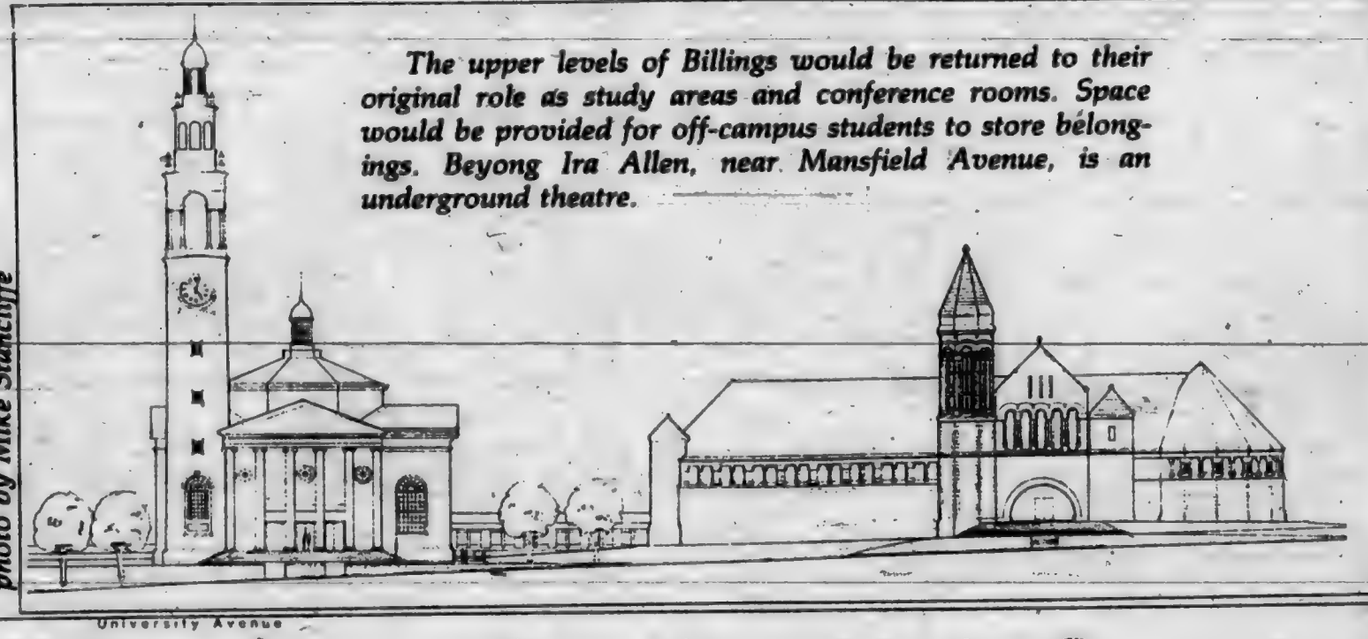


3. The union is part of the educational program of the college.

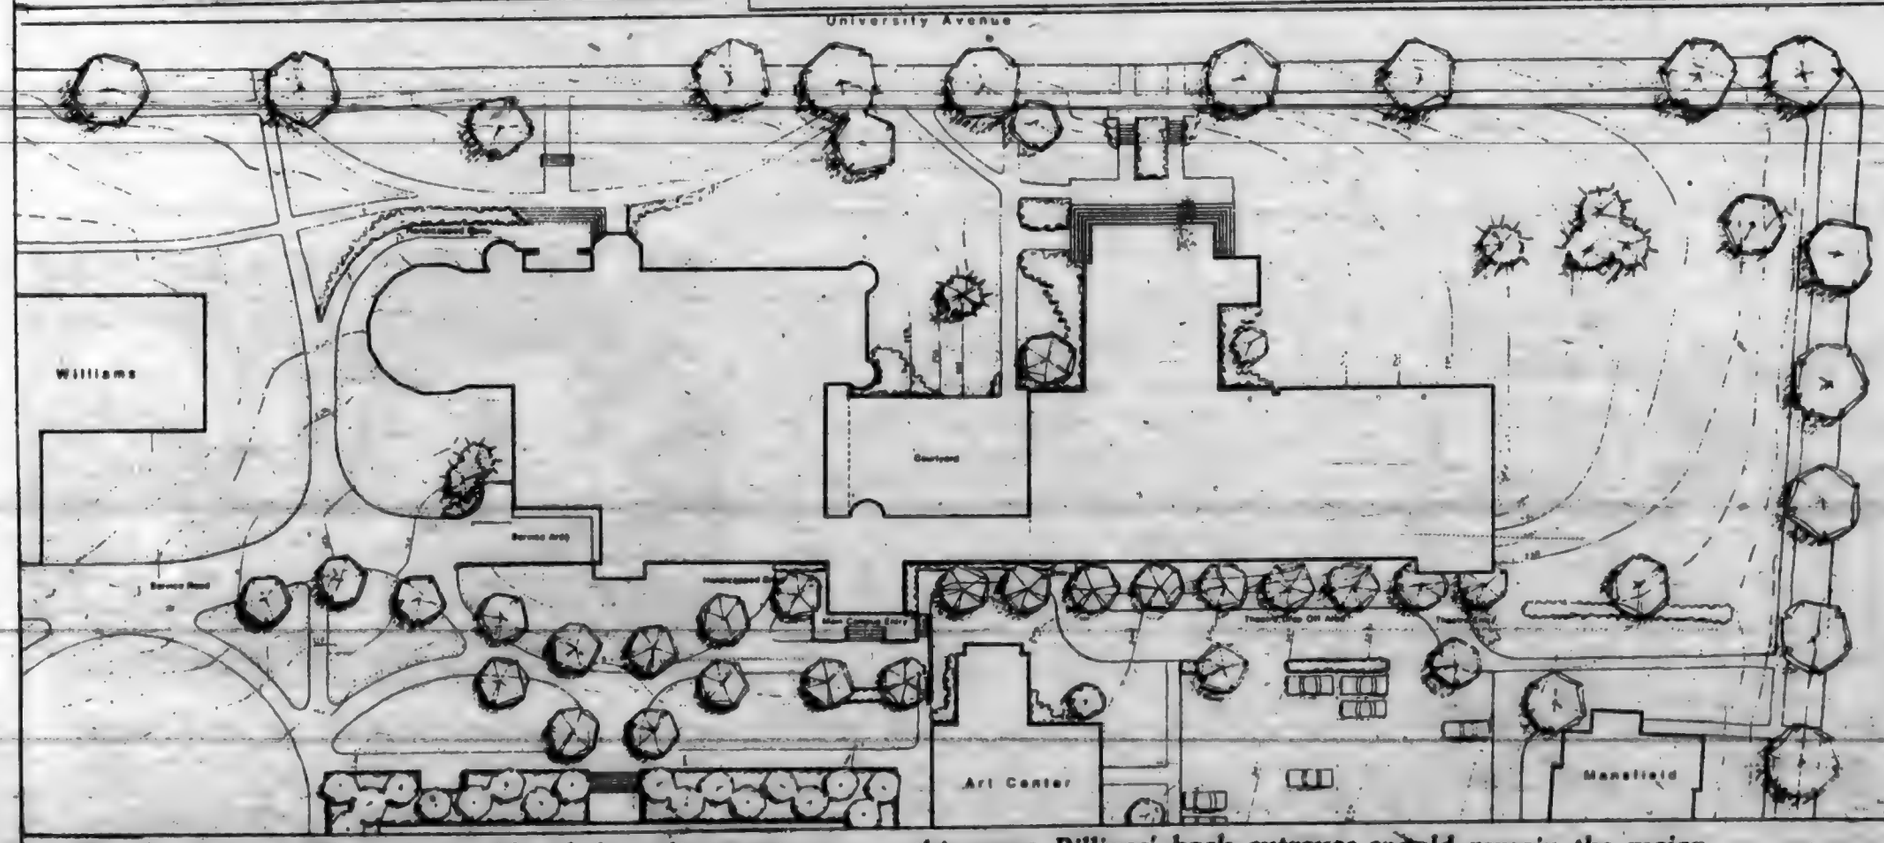
As the center of college community life, it serves as a laboratory of citizenship, training students in social responsibility and for leadership in our democracy.

Through its various boards, committees, and staff, it provides a cultural, social, and recreational program, aiming to make free time activity a cooperative factor with study in education.

In all its processes it encourages self-directed activity, giving maximum opportunity for self-realization and for growth in individual social competency and group effectiveness. Its goal is the development of persons as well as intellects.



4. The union serves as a unifying force in the life of the college, cultivating enduring regard and loyalty to the college.



Billings and Ira Allen would be connected by a passageway that would seem to create little , if any, loss of asthetic beauty. On the same level as lower Billings, the main floor of Ira Allen becomes a special events center. The Den would be expanded to include the whole of lower Billings, with all student offices and organizations now centrally located in the Chapel's basement. All new facing would be done in the same red stone that adorns Billings.

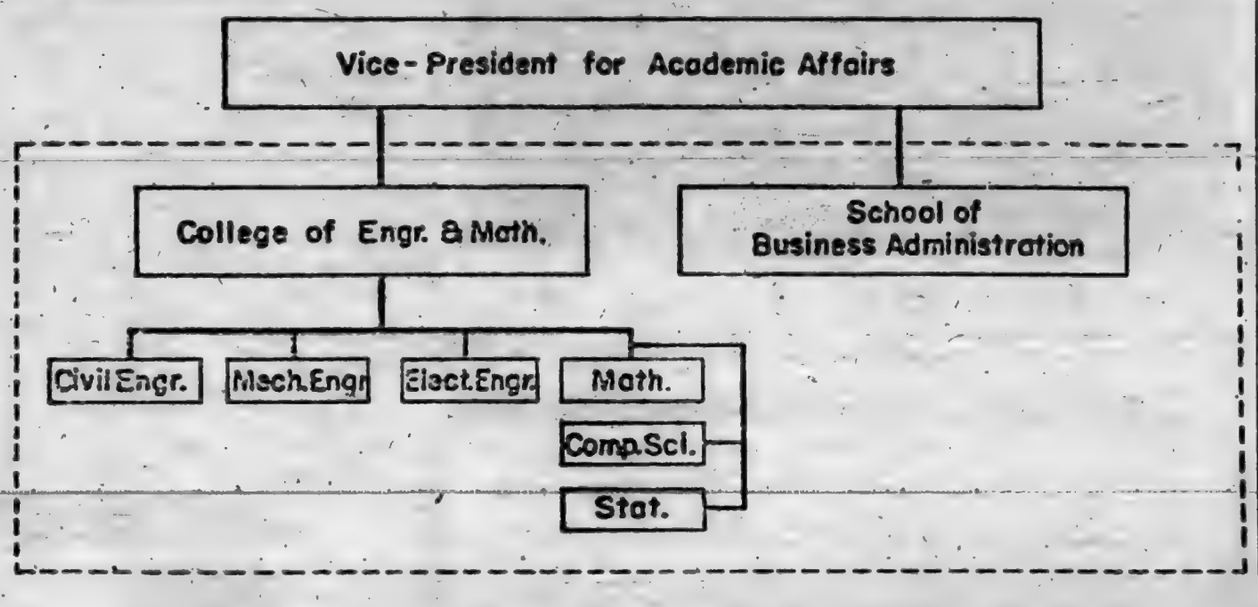
The upper levels of Billings would be returned to their original role as study areas and conference rooms. Space would be provided for off-campus students to store belongings. Beyong Ira Allen, near Mansfield Avenue, is an underground theatre.



The area behind Billings is considered the ugliest spot on campus. The Campus Center Project includes landscaping of this area. Billings' back entrance would remain the major passway.

Seeking Accreditation:

Birth Of A Business School

· PRESENT EMBA STRUCTURE ·

PROPOSED EMBA DIVISIONAL STRUCTURE

By Carol Hills

In an attempt to gain accreditation by the American Assembly of Collegiate Schools of Business (A.A.C.S.B.), the faculty of the College of Engineering, Mathematics, and Business Administration submitted a proposal last April designed to alter the organization of that college.

UVM is one of the few remaining state universities in the country that does not have a separate business school. UVM's business school is one of only three still not accredited by the AACSB. The other two are the Whittemore School at the University of New Hampshire and the University of North Dakota.

According to E.M.B.A.'s proposal, the E.M.B.A. College would be broken into a College of Engineering and Mathematics, and a School of Business Administration.

Dr. Malcolm Severance, present Chairman of the Department of Business Administration, said accreditation is important for attracting and keeping qualified faculty members and Master of Business Administration candidates.

"Many potential faculty and M.B.A. candidates won't interview at schools that aren't accredited. Outsiders not familiar with the program consider it a defect, and you are singled out as being different," he said.

Although the present structure of E.M.B.A. satisfies most of the requirements necessary for gaining accreditation, the AACSB insists that the Business School be a separate, administrative unit.

The formation of a School of Business Administration with a Director reporting regularly to the Vice President for Academic Affairs would fulfill this requirement, Severance said.

Currently all department heads within EMBA report to the Dean of the College, who in turn reports to Dr. Robert Arns, Vice-President for Academic Affairs, concerning personnel and budgetary matters. The division of EMBA would include a Dean to coordinate the activities of the College and School. The Division Dean would also serve as either the Dean of the College or as Director of the School.

Each department or program in the College (Civil, Electrical, and Mechanical Engineering, Mathematics, Computer Science, and Statistics) would report to the Dean of the College just as they now report to the present Dean. The change would have the Director of the School of Business Administration report directly to the Vice President for Academic Affairs issues dealing with personnel or the budget.

The Division Dean's duties and responsibilities would be handled by the current EMBA administration. The shift from "College" to "Division" would require no additional funding, nor would it imply any change in the curriculum for any department or program.

In the present EMBA structure, budget allocations for departments and programs are determined by the Dean of EMBA. The proposed change would give the Director of the Business School responsibility for preparing and administering the budget for Business Administration.

The Director of the Business School would also be responsible for the appointment of support staff, periodic evaluation of faculty and staff, annual adjustments in salary, work assignments, and similar matters.

The emergence of a strong program in Business Administration at UVM coincided with a general trend toward pre-professional programs nationwide. The Department of Business Administration was joined with the former College of Technology in 1973 to form the College of Engineering, Mathematics and Business Administration. The Business Administration program was formerly a part of a Department of Economics and Business Administration within the College of Arts and Sciences. Business Administration offered the only Bachelor of Science degree within the College of Arts and Sciences.

Severance, a tenured member of the faculty since 1953, has witnessed the changes in the field of Business Administration and calls them "dramatic. The program is much more profes-

UVM Tuition Highest In Nation

By Terri Johnson & Cynnie Wheeler

University of Vermont students next year will face the highest out-of-state tuition and the fourth highest in-state tuition for a state university in the country. Robert Stanfield, assistant to University President Lattie Coor, said "it is unlikely that the situation will change within the foreseeable future."

Although out-of-state tuition will rank number one, budget appropriations from the state of Vermont rank 50th among all states.

The administration has appealed to Governor Snelling for an 11 percent increase in appropriations for next year. The Governor's 1981 budget proposal calls for $41 million for education, the same figure as this year's.

The September 2, 1980 issue of the Chronicle of Higher Education reported that Governor Snelling ordered a three percent reduction in state appropriations.

UVM Faculty Union leader Delores Sandoval said, "We need more support from the state." Stanfield agreed, but added, "We have to be sympathetic to the taxpayer."

The Chronicle reported that state budget appropriations for universities are tight throughout the country. "State treasuries, which are the source of about one in every three dollars spent on higher education, are being squeezed by inflation," it said.

Nevertheless, the administration and Student Association are working together to take their views to the state legislature. S.A.'s Tim Heney is organizing a letter-writing campaign to get students to make a plea to state legislators for more money.

Also, S.A. is forming a legislative lobby to present detailed testimony to the legislature. Heney said S.A. and the Administration successfully lobbied the legislature last year and increased appropriations from the proposed 6 percent to 10 percent.

Stanfield explained that UVM tuition remains lower than that of private institutions. Tuition and fees at Middlebury College, for example, this year are $7800, while UVM's total charges amount to $6,734.

Stanfield says that the solution to the high cost "does not exist on campus, it exists in the nation. Tuition will go up in response to inflation." The administration held the tuition increase to 11 percent last year, while inflation rose 12 percent.

At the same time, the Reagan administration is threatening to cut many federal financial aid and loan programs. In pursuit of a balanced budget, Reagan called last week for "budget cuts in virtually every department of government."

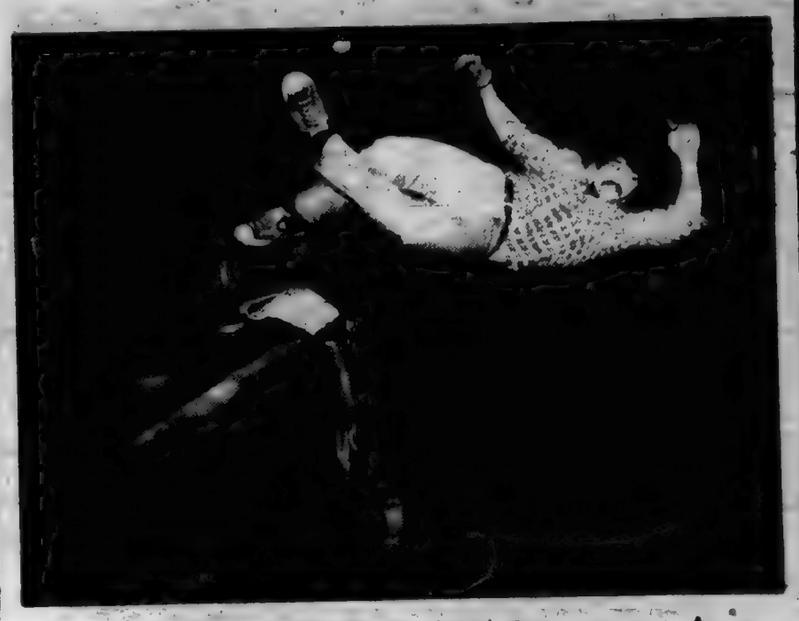
...Governor Snelling ordered a three percent reduction in state appropriations.

President Reagan is expected to abolish or change the federal guaranteed loan program, which now allows any college student, regardless of need, to take out a loan insured by the government.

The demise of the federal loan program will severely affect the 60 percent of in-state and 30 percent of out-of-state students who receive financial aid.

UVM Financial Aid Director Dale Hyerstay explained that university and state financial aid programs do not have the resources to pick up the gap that the Federal government may create.

Currently, the State of Vermont's allocation of per capita financial aid is among the highest of any state, according to a National Association of State Scholarships report published in the Chronicle of Higher Education. The average amount of student aid for Vermont in 1980-81 is $707. New Hampshire averaged $423, New York paid an average of $678 and Pennsylvania, $639.



Hyerstay said, "The most logical thing for out-of-staters to do is write to their legislators in Washington" to encourage them not to cut financial aid programs. U.S. Senator Robert Stafford (R–Vt.) is in a key position to support the programs as Chairman of the Senate Post-Secondary Education Subcommittee, he added.

Faculty leader Sandoval expressed concern over the effect of high tuition on the diversity of the student body. "Part of education is the milieu you're in," she says. "High tuition skews the population." She fears that the higher tuition will close the university to some students.

Sociology professor Steve Berkowitz did a study of the average UVM family income. He would not disclose the study's exact findings but said the average income, especially for out-of-staters, is well above the national average. Berkowitz recently came to UVM from the University of Toronto, where he said the student body is so diverse it is difficult to teach them.

While fighting to increase state appropriations and save the financial aid programs will help hold down tuition, Berkowitz said UVM should be making cuts in other areas. He suggests that the University could set up cooperative housing, where students work to maintain their own dorms, much like what is done in Hamilton co-op now. This would cut down on the cost of living on campus, Berkowitz says, and he added that the University of Michigan has extensive co-op housing that works very well.

THE CAMPUS BOARD

Hands Across The Water

By Carol Hills

A UVM sophomore has aroused the interest of his dorm to the problem of world hunger and poverty.

Since October, 1980, Mark Davis and his friends on second floor Wilks have been sponsoring a poor and needy child overseas. Through Foster Parents Plan, they are providing 12-year-old Iris Carolina Melendez and her family in El Salvador the financial support and social services they need for a better life.

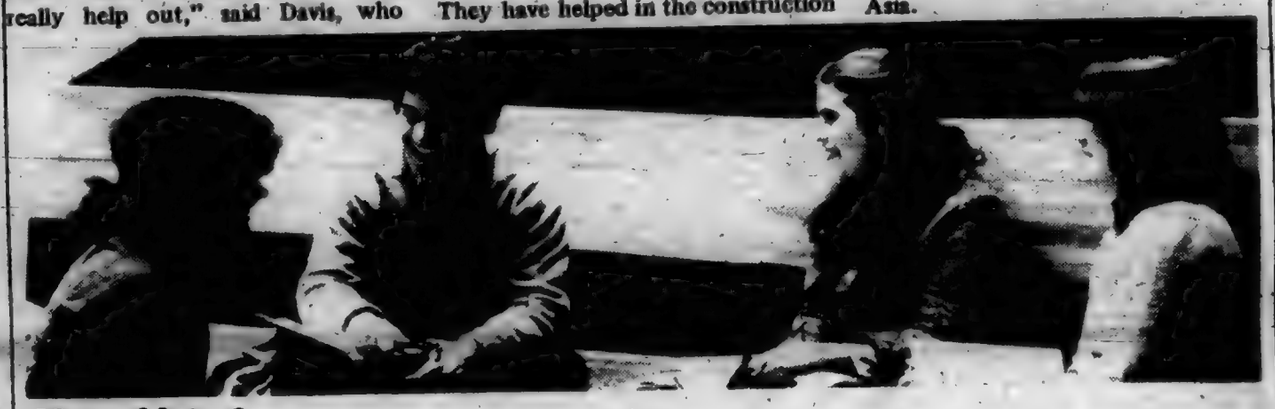
Davis, a native of Hydeville, Vermont, has been interested in adopting a Foster child since high school. This Fall he thought of getting his floor to sponsor one and approached his floormates with an idea to make it financially feasible.

Each of the 49 students on second floor Wilks is contributing five bottles each month to be turned into cash to cover the cost of sponsoring the child. The students responded enthusiastically and have taken an active interest in the child. "I think it's a rewarding experience. It's a noble organization and they really help out," said Davis, who plans to adopt a foster child of his own eventually.

Some of the Wilks residents who speak Spanish have been communicating with Iris through letters. Foster Parents Plan has also sent a photograph and case history telling about the child and family, their living conditions, health and special needs. This report will be updated periodically to indicate the child's progress.

The funds sent to Iris provide additional food and clothing, as well as an education and any needed medical or dental care. The child's entire family is also being helped through the many services available at the Plan Field Office. In El Salvador, where the number of sponsored children exceeds 5000, these include access to a well-stocked pharmacy, and the services of five consulting physicians and a dentist.

Individual families and entire communities benefit from the repair and construction or expansion of schools, the provision of school equipment and books, vocational training, uniforms, and school supplies for client families.



In addition, the field offices assist in community development and home improvements by providing material and technical assistance. They have helped in the construction of small bridges, repair and expansion of community centers, vegetable gardens, electrification, portable water, wells, and leadership training.

Foster Parents Plan provides monthly counseling by social workers for individual families in San Salvador and similar programs throughout the rural areas of El Salvador.

Foster Parents Plan is a non-profit, independent child care agency with no political or religious affiliations, only the support of concerned groups and individuals. Located in Warwick, Rhode Island, it has been giving assistance to desperately needy children and their families since 1937. At present, over 150,000 children are being helped in Latin America, the Caribbean, Africa, and Asia.

Desertification Disastrous For East Africans

By Maggie Hayes

Famine in East Africa and the efficiency of the international relief system was the topic of a discussion Tuesday led by Steven Green of Oxfam and Richard Calandrella, Director of Development of CARE at St. Joseph's Parish.

Both men spoke of the devastating starvation in the countries of Kenya, Somalia, Ethiopia, and Uganda, where the process of desertification has advanced to such a degree that restoration of agricultural land may be impossible.

The spread of arid land to areas surrounding deserts — "desertification" — is recognized as a major global environmental problem. It is estimated that up to 14 million acres worldwide become desert each year.

"Most people haven't read of desertification yet, but I am telling you about it now because I've seen it," Green said. Dried river beds, wilting vegetation, starving animals and people, and badly eroded hillsides are evident throughout the region, Green said. The 1971 drought that killed 20-50,000 people was never publicized, he added, and "100,000 people died in the 1973 famine before the first assistance arrived."

Green said that this information is suppressed by governments.

Calandrella supported Green's information, adding that the situation in East Africa is horrendous, yet Americans know little of the scope of the disaster.

"the situation in East Africa is horrendous, yet the American people know little of the scope of the disaster." There are one million refugees in Somalia alone who move in and out of that country to avoid the seasonal droughts. This nomadic lifestyle, according to Calandrella, results in a loss of production, an absence of permanent farmers, and the disintegration of resources in the region.

"The carrying capacity of the land has been passed, and the land is no longer adequate," Green said.

Calandrella said the situation was worsened by the Kenyan government's refusal to acknowledge the atrocities and take action to prevent them.

Both men acknowledged rehabilitation and reconstruction programs in countries sympathetic to the plight of the starving Africans. The civil war between Somalia and Ethiopia, however, makes the prospect for immediate cooperation between those two nations impossible. This must not be an excuse to step up international relief, Green added, because the situation must be solved "regionally."

"The answer is not going to come from the established international agencies," Green said. He continued, saying that self-sufficiency within the country is the only solution to the famine problem.

Green explained that temporary relief from organizations like Oxfam and CARE only prolong the disaster. Moving food from one area to another is very wasteful, due to high transportation and administrative costs, he said.

According to Calandrella, the monetary distribution that supports an international relief organization is not direct, and therefore wasteful. Usually, an account is opened in a bank of a donor country. When a specific relief program is established, the agency representative draws on the account as needed.

"However, the money is drawn only if it is approved by a government committee. Because of these administrative costs, most of the money doesn't find its way to the affected areas," Calandrella said.

Both speakers said they do not, however, call for an end to the work of the relief organizations because it is the only thing keeping people alive. Although they encourage long-term programs that stress greater self-sufficiency, the immediate task is to feed dying people.

Calandrella explained that "the problem that East Africa faces means that the relief system is the only thing we can apply now because there are literally no resources left... but the long term goal is not the continued supply of aid, but for the people to deal with their own problems."

Green proposed a long-term development plan that would predict seasonal droughts using a satellite rainfall monitoring system. When a drought is predicted, food from a local region could be stored and rationed when needed. He said that the goal is to keep the people stationary, so a permanent agricultural system can develop.

Calandrella added that "action from within" involving distribution of rice seed for planting led to a successful crop yield in famine-stricken Cambodia last year. "This program let people deal with their own means of support," he said the long term goal is not the continued supply of aid, but for the people to deal with their own problems.

Environmental factors, not political issues, will determine whether East Africa will survive, Green and Calandrella said. The gradual deterioration of the land has been caused by a population explosion, political instability, and government agricultural decisions supported by the U.S. government, Calandrella explained.

"The U.S. has had a tendency to de-emphasize food production and stress manufacturing in the urban areas."

The U.S. has thus played a part in the disruption of the agricultural base, Green said. "The end result is a region that can no longer feed itself."

America's Peanut Butter In A Jam

By Susan Calhoun

(CPS) — Iowa needed it. New York admitted Texas had it, but couldn't handle the deal. Iowa resorted to contacting a go-between in Chicago. The go-between finally pulled off the deal in December, and the 6840 lb. shipment arrived in January.

Now comes the big question: can it last through the spring?

Iowa's not the only place asking such questions and indulging in purchasing practices once reserved for wheeler-dealers on the spot oil market. All over the nation, colleges' hottest commodity is growing scarce. A panic is growing over the shortage of nothing less than... peanut butter.

Finding peanut butter is a task to stretch the resources and imagination of the most able college food service director these days. But exhaustive searches by school purchasing departments have been only occasionally successful, and some colleges are starting to ration the substance.

For example, students at Penn State, University of California at Berkeley, and the University of Colorado now find peanut butter offered at only one of the 21 meals their food services provide each week.

Northwestern University began a similar rationing plan, but cancelled it when the university food service found some peanut butter in a Kankakee, Illinois warehouse at the last minute.

"Oh, we pay twice the usual price," says a Saga food service secretary at Northwestern, "but we have to have peanut butter."

Some schools, however, just don't have the money. "We found out we can get it, but at a price that would break the university's budget," laments a spokeswoman for Berkeley's purchasing office.

Robert Greiner, food stores manager at Iowa State, tells what a campus food director who won't give in to high prices or low availability has to go through:

"We happened to hear of the impending shortage early last fall at a conference," he recalls. "We knew people were going to start bidding on peanut butter all over, but we got the jump on it."

Consequently Greiner learned from the Standard Brands Food Corporation headquarters in New York that 230 cases of the previous stuff were sitting in a Texas warehouse. The New York office, however, refused to sell the cases to Iowa State, which is in a different sales region. In response, Greiner hired a Chicago agent to make the buy from Texas.

"We ordered all the peanut butter they had," Greiner says. Unfortunately, "only 190 instead of 230 cases" were delivered.

Greiner is triumphant nonetheless when he boasts, "We got the last peanut butter in Texas."

"We'll get through it because Iowa's enrollment is usually a little lower in the spring," he projects. "And you know, people are on diets and stuff in the spring. We'll make it, but I don't know about summer term."

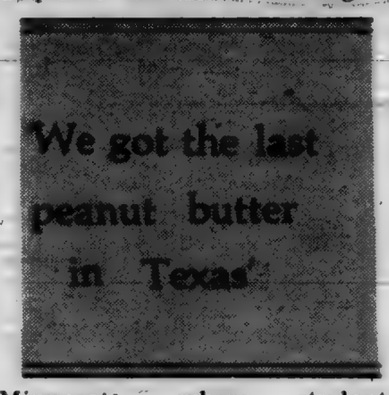
The real culprit for the shortage is the drought that wiped out half the U.S. peanut crop last summer, according to James E. Marsh, counsel for the Peanut Butter and Nut Processors Association in Washington, D.C.

The nation's three peanut-producing regions — Virginia and the Carolinas; the southeastern states of Georgia, Alabama and Florida; and the southwestern states of Texas, Oklahoma and New Mexico — had rainfalls that were 34 to 44 percent of the usual summer average.

Marsh says the shortage was noticable by early September, but that the International Trade Commission (ITC) refused to allow peanut imports to compensate for the domestic crop failures.

"The (import) restrictions were made to protect domestic growers," he growls, "but domestic farmers were already in trouble, and we couldn't alleviate the problem by importing."

"The administration really botched it," Marsh complains. "If the president had acted responsibly, the price would have gone up, but not nearly as much. That was about as poor governmental administration as could be."



"All I can think of is that the administration had somebody or something that they were trying to protect domestically," Marsh hints broadly.

The restrictions and the drought pushed the price of raw peanuts from 40 cents per pound to $1.75 per pound by December. Finally, on December 4, the U.S. allowed two and a half million pounds to be brought into the country, but that was "about a quarter of what we needed," Marsh contends.

Peanut butter manufacturers are again in the midst of hearings with the ITC, and Marsh is optimistic that "we'll get a fair shake from the new administration."

If trade restrictions are suspended, Marsh estimates the price of peanuts should settle at about 80 cents per pound by the end of the spring — still twice the amount of last summer.

That leaves administrators at places like Carleton College in Minnesota, where students devour 100 35 lb. cases of peanut butter weekly, contemplating even more desperate acts than the rationing they recently imposed in their cafeterias.

"I've been thinking about Canada," confesses Mike Rohr, head of food purchasing at Carleton. "I wonder if we could go over the border and get some of their peanut butter? Maybe the stuff isn't considered imported if it comes from Canada."

But smuggling isn't necessary if one has the right business connections, suggests Phillip Bauer, a food service manager at Harvard.

"Well, it took a little finagling," Bauer remembers, "but I got enough to get through April, and I've got a guarantee of another shipment in late March."

The deal, he says, "did cost quite a bit, but it was a good deal."

While all the administrators contacted for this article say they've been affected by the shortage, schools in some areas of the country have fared better than others. Two southern schools in the heart of peanut country — the universities of Alabama and Georgia — both anticipated the shortage and prepared for it.

"We hear about these kinds of things early in Georgia," says Sam Phillips, who purchases things for Georgia. "We stocked up late in summer before the price went up."

Look For The Soy And Jelly Sandwich

(CPS) — So what are you going to do the next time the urge for some good old peanut butter strikes?

"Try a candy bar," suggests James Mack of the Peanut Butter and Nut Processors Association.

Candy bars, he explains, are going to be a lot easier to find than peanut butter itself, even candy bars with peanut butter in them. "A candy bar is from 20 to 50 percent peanuts, like in a Butterfinger, so the shortage won't affect the price or availability of candy and peanut cookies as much as peanut butter, which is 90 percent peanuts."

But that alternative, while plugging the hole in students' diets, can also open a few holes in students' teeth. Still, Iowa State nutritionist Elisabeth Schaefer counsels that students panicked by peanut butter-less grocery shelves should not despair.

"Bologna and cheese are other sandwich fillers that are high in protein," she told the Iowa State Daily. "Other things you can put in sandwiches that are high in protein are tuna, chicken, turkey, ham, and other meats."

If only a nutty butter will do, try loading a do-it-yourself peanut butter-making machine — they're available at some hardware and toy stores — with walnuts or soybeans.

Walnuts and cashews can be made into a "butter" spread, Schaefer says, but it's "very expensive." Soybeans are a more economical choice, but the results could be less than satisfying.

"Soybeans would be of outstanding nutritional value," she told the student paper, "if only something palatable could be made out of them."

sional now. The fields have greatly expanded to include statistics and quantitative methods as the dominant tools. These weren't available before the advent of the computer." Severance said that the academic program today is much more "quantitative and structured," but it allows for flexibility. "We feel candidates must have a heavy dose of Liberal Arts," he said.

Figures released in 1979 show a 62 percent increase since 1973 in the number of Bachelor's and MBA degrees awarded by the Department of Business Administration. The 151 Bachelor's degrees in Business Administration in 1979 accounted for approximately 10 percent of all awarded at UVM. On the national level, almost 17 percent of all bachelor's degrees are in business.

A recent development at UVM and elsewhere has been the increasing number of non-business majors electing to take business courses. Severance said that the Business Department at UVM has been unable to satisfy the demand with their existing staff.

There has also been a steady increase in the number of new students and transfers applying to study business administration. The 121 freshmen admitted to the program in 1979 were chosen from among 887 applicants. Of the 173 transfer students who applied to the program that year, only 39 were admitted.

'It is something we must do'

Several business-related activities have been made available to business majors and other interested students to supplement the standard curriculum. These include the Business Seminar Series, the Wall Street Seminar, Career Day, the business suite at Living/Learning, the MBA Association, and the Undergraduate Business Society.

Dr. Gerald P. Francis, Dean of the College of EMBA, said the new proposal is a minor structural change that will facilitate accreditation.

"It is something we must do. The stature of the School will help the program, and the new elevation for business will enhance its attractiveness. It is an excellent program with qualified people. It deserves accreditation."

The proposed Division will not affect the policies regarding the admission and retention of students, curriculum, recommendations for degrees, or funding requirements.

A School of Business Administration accredited by AACSB would help in recruiting qualified business graduates by appealing to firms and companies that only consider graduates of accredited programs. Severance said it would also aid in fund-raising efforts by communicating an achieved level of excellence to the business community, and would give UVM faculty and students access to programs only open to those in accredited programs. These include faculty and graduate student research, and tuition scholarships, internship programs, and memberships in Beta Gamma Sigma (a national business honorary society) and Beta Alpha Psi (a national accounting honorary society).

There has so far been no opposition to the proposed change and the central administration seems anxious to act on it. The proposal was unanimously approved by the EMBA Faculty at a meeting last February, and by the Faculty Senate last week.

If passed by the Board of Trustees at their March meeting, the change will take effect this summer.

Student Government For Education College

By Cynic Staff

The College of Education and Social Services (C.E.S.S.) has formulated a unique proposal to organize a 38-member Student Government to "incorporate themselves fully into the maintenance of the College's mission and objectives," according to the CESS's Constitution for Student Government.

Dr. Charles Rathbone, President of the Faculty of the College, has been working closely with several students over the last three years. Rathbone said that this will be a "formal process for students to assess the political structure of the College," stressing the fact that it was imperative for students to voice their opinions.

The Constitution calls for four freshman and four sophomore majors in the College, and upperclassmen from the various programs and majors to form the governing body. This body will be broken down into three committees, to be concerned with communications, student activities, and instructional standards.

Sabrina Ezickson, a junior in the American Primary Experience Program (APEX), said that the Constitution offers guidelines for future reference that will be defined as the Student Government gets on with its business, she explained. That business, Rathbone explained, is to formulate student policies for the programs, channel information between students and faculty, and provide an important forum for discussion.

The function of the Student Government as a discussion forum is probably the most important, said Leah Coggeshall, a junior majoring in Environmental Education. "It's really important to have student input," she explained. Without it, Rathbone added, the Student Government will be ineffective in its other roles.

Rathbone also said that student input was "what got this idea off the ground in the first place." With the help of Sabrina Ezickson, Leah Coggeshall, Kim Burke, Colleen Thornton, Tony Seisfeld, and Susan Leiberstien, the Constitution was written, and a schedule for elections was formulated.

Elections will be held for the Student Government of CESS on March 4th and 5th.

Experience, Not Grades, For Mass Comm Jobs

by Reed Dewey

Students were told at a career forum last Tuesday that if they wanted to enter the field of communications, they had better get some experience while still in college.

Five UVM alumni working in mass communications fielded career questions from an assortment of about 50 students.

When the panel was asked if grades were an important criteria in selecting employees, Cristopher Scott, President of New Images, an advertising firm, flatly replied "no." Steven Carlson, public relations man for Senator Jeffords, added, "no one even asked me if I'd ever been to college."

Cyrus Parker, a station manager at "Interact Television Network," stressed the importance of having technical experience to enter the field of communications. Virginia Downs, a freelance writer, said that typing and grammar are important for beginners. Many of the alumni stressed the lack of writing skills as their main weakness when they started their careers. Downs, though, had worked at the Cynic back in the 1940s which she felt had given her valuable training for her first job with the now defunct Burlington Daily News.

"Be aggressive," advised Scott. He added that those that aren't aggressive or don't like working under pressure shouldn't consider communications. Jeb Spaulding, President of WNCS-FM, said one should carefully analyze his or her lifestyle to determine whether they are the type of person that can handle the fast life of the media.

Carlson said there are many avenues to pursue. Because communications are so inter-related, one might switch from a news reporter position to work on a magazine staff, as Downs did. Jobs change more rapidly in advertising and communications as compared to other occupations, Scott explained. One shouldn't stick to a single job, but rather experiment in different realms of the media.

Spaulding recalls rookie students working under him who "thought they knew it all" after graduating. If one is flexible and assimilates into a particular company well, he or she will stand a better chance toward learning needed skills, he said.

For those seniors who are about to fly the academic nest, it was advised that they work in their related field of interest before thinking of graduate school. Carlson said Vermont offers great opportunities for beginning workers in the media areas, because of the state's small size.

One student asked, "But what if I just didn't happen to have any experience in radio, TV, or newspapers?"

"Get it," replied these professionals, adding that anyone who didn't have experience probably wasn't very motivated or determined about the field in the first place.

The "Careers in Communication" meeting was arranged through the Student Alumni Sessions for Career Development. Coming events include career sessions in art, physical education, self-designed majors, and liberal arts.

Iranian Students Face New Troubles

(CPS) – In the wake of the release of the Iranian hostages two weeks ago, Iranian students in the United States have reported renewed harassment on campus. The government, meanwhile, has resolved to continue its deportation proceedings against the foreigners while school administrators wonder if this will be the last generation of Iranian students to study in America.

Reports from around the country indicate that the harassment usually has consisted of threatening phone calls and public ostracism, the first such instances noted since the hostages were first taken over a year ago.

Iranian students at the universities of Florida and Central Florida have lodged complaints with campus police in hopes of getting some kind of protection from the jeering phone calls.

For example, a student named Saeed at UF says he has received repeated calls from someone who identifies himself only as "an American marine" who wants to "cut the Iranians' throats."

"They (the callers) think they are doing their country a favor by fighting with me," says Saeed. "They are blaming me and the situation only gets worse."

UF administrators are advising the Iranian students to "keep a low profile."

In California, an Iranian student who identifies himself only as Hooshyar reports similar incidents at his Berkeley campus.

"There is not much trouble here compared to the trouble my friends have had in Texas and the Midwest," he explains. "Here, it is mostly angry phone calls, but my friends in Texas have been beaten up in the last week. A friend in Chicago was made to drop a course by a professor, who said he didn't want any Iranians in his class."

A spokesman for the administration at MIT also indicated that there have been numerous problems there recently, but university officials were told not to discuss the incidents.

Hooshyar attributes the renewed antagonism to press reports of abuse of hostages while in Iran. He says that whenever the hostage situation receives extra coverage by the news, the pressure invariably becomes worse for the students.

"I thought that after the release, this jingoism would diminish," he says, "but what I have seen of the media... stirring up the people again and making all Iranians out to be horrible, makes me know the pressure will get worse."

As American citizens get tougher with the visiting Iranians, the U.S. shows no signs of letting up on the strict enforcement of the immigration policies instituted during the last year by President Carter.

UVM Man Trains For A Crown

photos by Sarah Brayman

By Mike Gochman

A Horatio Alger boxing story, where the hard worker makes it big in the ring, is shaping up at UVM. The University of Vermont's own pugilist, Larry Bruno (not a nickname), is a junior business major. Although he is a full-time student, Bruno has taken an interest in boxing over the past two years, and much of his energies are directed toward this pursuit. Bruno had been working without the guidance of a coach, until recently. His story is being told for the first time.

Bruno ended his freshman year with a 3.6 grade point average, and took the 1978-79 school year off to make some money in order to continue his education. He worked in a sports shop and was able to buy sports equipment very inexpensively. He bought a heavy punching bag and set it up in the basement of his home. He also bought some heavy bag gloves and some wraps (small ace bandages used to wrap around one's hands and wrists for support) and started a regular routine, working on boxing style. At this point, Bruno was boxing for exercise; the possibility of competing arose later as a whim.

When he returned to UVM for the 1979-80 school year, Bruno brought his heavy bag with him and set it up in the basement of the Sigma Nu fraternity house where he lives. In a small room about 10' by 20', cluttered with weight lifting benches, his heavy bag, a speed bag, and over five hundred pounds of metal plates and bars, Bruno worked out with loud music blaring and the smell of stale beer in the air.

As he improved, he began studying the mechanics of boxing closely. He gathered any bits and pieces of advice he could from experienced boxers he knew. One of his more inspiring advisors last year was his own fraternity brother, Al Talerico, who fought in local tournaments until his elbows began to hyperextend.

Larry needed increased instruction as he got more and more involved. So, last spring he visited the Winooski Armory, which has more boxing facilities and other fighters interested in sparring.

Feeling confident in his ability, Bruno decided he wanted to compete, and he joined the Essex Junction Boxing Club this fall. The coach, Mike Armstrong, won the Vermont Golden Gloves Championship for the 135-pound class in 1964 at age nineteen; he won it again in 1978. Armstrong is currently competing in the Vermont Golden Gloves tournament, the finals of which will be held Saturday, February 14 in Memorial Auditorium. The semi-finals of this tournament were last Friday, and the preliminaries were the week before.

Bruno planned to fight in these preliminaries, but he failed to make the weight limit of the 165-pound class and was not allowed to enter. This would have been his first competitive boxing experience.

Although he did not get to fight in this tournament, Bruno has gained valuable experience sparring with members of the boxing club. He sparred with nationally ranked Tony Robitaille, who is also a member of the Essex Junction Boxing Club. Bruno plans to enter a tournament in March. His lessons thus far should serve him well if he continues to work at his present pace.

In an interview in his room, Bruno was relaxed as he sank, broad shouldered and thick chested, in an easy chair. His face was slightly drawn from the loss of weight, as it was only three days after he would have fought. Although he was excited about the interview, I sensed that he was still somewhat depressed about the disappointment.

Cynic: When you returned to school in the fall of '79, did you continue to work out?

Bruno: I did. It relieved a lot of tension. Boxing was something I really enjoyed and I stuck with it.

Cynic: Where do you work out when you're not at the clubs?

Bruno: Sigma Nu. I used to work-out with Al Talorico. He fought in local tournaments for the Air Force up here. He also worked out at the Winooski Armory, where I first started working out up here.

Cynic: How often did you go to the Armory last Spring?

Bruno: I really only went a few times, but I went a couple times last summer when I was up here. I didn't have my own equipment. I even used other people's mouth guards.

Cynic: How much did you weigh last Spring?

Bruno: 200 pounds.

Cynic: What's your best asset as a boxer?

Bruno: I'm a hard puncher. If I get the chance, I think I can do a lot of damage in two minutes. I know I can take a punch, too. I ran into a telephone pole last summer and came out O.K. (Bruno ran into a telephone pole trying to catch a football and bashed himself in the temple region. The cut needed thirteen stitches.)

Cynic: I know you worked part time last semester while a full-time student. How much time do you put into your work-outs per day?

Bruno: O.K. I work out three hours a day running, lifting, hitting the speed bag, the heavy bag, and sparring once in a while. I rotate heavy to light work-outs every other day.

Cynic: Ever spar against Tony Robitaille?

Bruno: Once. He was in control and basically kicked my &%$+.

Cynic: What's his ranking?

Bruno: Tony is the third ranked amateur heavy-weight boxer in the country. That makes me feel better getting hit by a champ. He's picked to win the National Golden Gloves title this year.

Cynic: Your next big fight is in March?

Bruno: Yea, the next recognizable tournament is in March. I'm very anxious to get some recognition for my boxing. The "boys" in the house know I'm working out hard, but I came out looking like a chump when I didn't make the weight. Before March, I'll be fighting in "smokers" (inter-club boxing). I lost so much weight in such a short time that I've gained ten pounds over the week-end eating and drinking. I think my natural weight is about 180, so I might fight in the 178-pound class.

Cynic: What about a boxing program at UVM?

Bruno: I don't know how many people would be interested at UVM. There is a lot of passion involved in boxing. I'd love a program here at the University. If you get the right people and structure, it would be great. There has to be other outside competition though. After you develop a camaraderie with members in your club, you don't really want to beat on them.

Cynic: What about Norwich?

Bruno: That's right! That would be great competition boxing the "bullet heads."

Cynic: Would you like to initiate this program?

Bruno: I would. I really would! That is, if there were people interested. I don't think the administration would be up for it though. Boxing doesn't have a good image.

Larry Bruno does not give boxing a bad image. Perhaps a boxing program can be developed at UVM if interest is shown. In the meantime, I wish Larry Bruno the best of luck in his future bouts and will be following his progress in the Cynic.

A Dorm It Is; Normal It's Not

By David Durkee

I live among a group of fellow students who are studying telepathy, psychokinesis, mysticism, holistic health philosophies and a broad range of other topics in parapsychology. Next door is a group which is learning about the everyday aspects of medieval life by imitation and participation. Downstairs, one group studies and teaches aspects of emergency medicine, and a suite of graduate students from widely divergent fields of study is learning and developing research strategies.

The setting of this study, some of which is designed and implemented almost entirely by undergrads, is the Living/Learning Center. Learning strategies in L/LC include reading and lectures, but the stronger focus is on learning by doing, and then sharing what has been learned. The residential aspect is integrated with the education here in a way that is duplicated in only a few other places in the country. Perhaps the most vital aspect of the center, though, is that each year brings a wide variety of new ideas that reflect the constantly changing needs of the students.

At this time of year this fact is especially important. From now until March 2, the center will be accepting proposals for new programs from undergrads, graduate students, and faculty members from all sectors of the university. No idea is too wild; all will be considered by a committee of students, faculty and staff who are currently involved with the center. The basic premise, according to Assistant Director Peter Wolk, is that students deserve the opportunity to enrich their lives intellectually within the residence halls.

The strongest programs are those which combine various disciplines with a closely integrated living situation. Ideally, a program is developed by people working and living together. This is the "Living" aspect of Living/Learning. Anyone interested in designing a program should contact Peter Wolk or the Director, John Engroff, right away.

The Center is now in its eighth year of operation. As originally conceived, it was a place for faculty members to implement their courses with a residential component. In the first few years only some of the suites were occupied by programs, the rest being used as regular dormitory space.

The impetus for the student-designed program actually came from the students themselves, two years later. By the fourth year, the center was filled with both student and faculty-designed programs, and for the first time anywhere, student-designed and implemented programs were receiving financial support from the academic sector. Last year, graduate student programs were included for the first time. Each year more ideas come in with a broader field of topics from a wider variety of students and faculty. This year,

UVM MOOOves Into Dairy Future

By Jim Newman

The closest most students ever come to the University of Vermont Dairy Farm is eating ice cream made from milk obtained there. Maybe the students who run on the golf course are familiar with the foul odor that sometimes lingers over from the multi-barn complex. But other than these indirect contacts, a lot of people don't know exactly what goes on down on the farm.

An estimated 15,000 elementary and high school students visit the farm each year to see why UVM's Dairy Farm is one of the major assets of the Agricultural School. The complex serves as a teaching lab for many animal science courses and also allows students to perform research, attempting to improve farm life and the efficiency of production. John Knapp, who runs the Dairy Farm, feels that "it is important that we attempt to be as much like a real farm as possible, but of course we don't have to turn a profit as a normal farmer must." This system might upset a few dairymen around the state, who believe that the Dairy Farm uses their tax money to compete against them in cow shows, but once they observe all the projects going on at the farm, they are convinced that the farm works for them also.

UVM's Dairy Farm is made up of three major barns, a show ring and an assortment of other smaller buildings. Within this complex exists two different methods for keeping dairy cows and a barn in which horses are kept. The horse barn houses horses owned by students. The barn is maintained by the students alone. The farm has worked out an exchange system with the Horse Club in which the students are allowed to use the barn if they help out around the farm. Usually sixteen horses live here. Some of these compete in horse shows put on by the club.

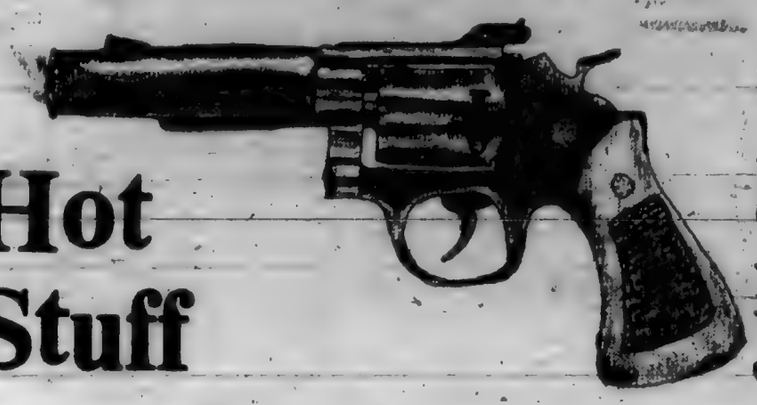
The two other major barns are full of dairy cows, some of which also compete on one of UVM's more expensive teams. Though the Dairy Cow Competition Team does not have as many meets as the swim or track teams, when they host a meet, they go all out. UVM hosts a state-wide competition in midsummer, and the barns can hold up to two hundred head plus UVM's own herd. The Catamount herd also travels to Springfield, Mass. and Harrisburg, Pa. during the summer before winding up the season at the Essex Fair in August. Mr. Knapp says, "There is a lot of work for a few minutes in the ring... but we usually hold our own."

Because Vermont is a State Agriculture school, the arrangement of the cows is rather unique. UVM utilizes two systems, free stall and individually stalled, both predominant in the U.S. dairy industry. The use of two systems allows the farm to run tests in both environments. Also, the farm is able to house four different breeds of cows. The two major breeds are Holstein and Jersey. If a farmer calls up and wants to know what the effect of a certain change in diet or something else on his herd might be, the UVM Dairy Farm is able to perform the test under similar conditions for the cows.

In the individual stall method, normally used with smaller herds, two rows of cows face each other. Each of these cows has an individual feeding trough and must be milked one by one. UVM has sixty-two cows in this arrangement, while forty-two cows live in the free stall method. The free stall method is mostly associated with larger farms, because fewer people can take care of the herd. These animals are fed through a community trough. Until recently it was hard to prevent one cow from over-eating and another from under-eating.

At present, the farm has a computer which daily allocates a certain amount of grain to each cow. This system gives a cow part of its daily ration every time it returns to the afeeding station. This system has weaknesses though, for it only measures the amount a certain cow has for the day, and does not show if individual cows do not eat their entire ration. The farm is requesting a new system, like the one at Cornell University, which identifies the animal rather than the amount of grain. This enables a farmer to determine if a certain cow does not eat enough, rather than just showing a shortage amongst the whole herd. This method would help in the early detection of illnesses, and the information obtained from feeding can be closely correlated with changes in milk production.

The phenomenon of computerization of the dairy industry is not only used in feeding the herd. A revolution in the method of milking cows has also occurred. An automatic milking system has replaced the old stool and pail method. If one is lucky enough to be at the farm during milking time, he/she will be able to see the milking parlor in action. This room is adjacent to the free stall, and at milking time two doors open and four cows enter to be milked. They are hooked up to an automatic milker, which does all the fun stuff and even disengages itself when the milking process is complete. After a cow is finished, the quantity of milk given is recorded and another cow is ushered in and the process starts over again. This system requires only two people, and the rapidity with which the cows are ushered through makes this room seem like a milking factory. The advantage of utilizing this system with a big herd is apparent, for milking the cows in an individual stall means that you go to the cow with the machine instead of having the cow come to you.



The milk from these cows is moved through pipes to a central collector for treatment and testing. Here students might get a chance to test the fat content of milk (optimally around 3.5%) to determine the quality. This test is also conducted on individual cows for yearly production levels. For instance, the Jerseys test higher than most Holsteins, but do not match the Holstein's yearly production. Therefore, UVM, by having both types, has the best of both breeds.

One method they are experimenting with at the maternity farm is geared toward producing a higher quality herd. Since genetics have a great deal to do with milk output, the UVM farm has initiated a process called embryo transplant. After isolating a cow whose ovulation cycle is the same as a prize cow, they artificially inseminate the top breed cow. When the egg has matured, it is transplanted to the other cow, and the true mother never sees the calf. Not all cows are bred in this way, but the UVM Dairy Farm is experimenting on other methods to increase the quality of future herds.

For anyone interested in dairy farming, the advantages and disadvantages of many systems are on live display at the farm. Or anyone who just wants to see a cute little calf mooing expectantly at feeding time can enjoy the farm. You might even be shown how to milk a cow if you ask nicely enough.

Although the air smells slightly of manure, it is better for you than the city air of Boston or New York. With the costs of a good dairy cow now around $3,000 to $4,000, and prohibitive feeding and upkeep costs, dairy farmers are slowly getting eaten up by large corporations.

The UVM farm displays the techniques used on small and large farms. By viewing the mechanics of dairy farming and talking with the experts at the farm, a deeper understanding of the problems facing farmers today can be cultivated.

Hot Stuff

By Sonny Valentine

In one of his most bizarre adventures, Barry Cutlass lies cold and still on an operating table in the morgue of the Sloan-Kettering Cancer Research Hospital late on a Thursday night. The laboratory is closed and everyone has gone home, but our hero listens carefully for any movement in the morgue.

The mystical magnetism of gold is at the bottom of this strange story. Unscrupulous gold dealers have been stealing radioactive gold used in cancer treatment and making jewelry with it. The unknowing buyers of this hot jewelry risk developing cancer by over-exposure to low level radiation.

In an earlier conversation with Dr. Bakiel, director of the radioactive treatment program, Cutlass was filled in on the technicalities of the use of gold.

"We have found the use of radioactive gold, sometimes called hot gold, to be useful in treating certain types of cancer. Due to the unreactive properties of the metal, hot gold can be injected around a tumor and it will stay put. Other radioactive elements react with the chemicals in the body and get spread all over," Dr. Bakiel said.

Back in the cool, clammy chamber, Cutlass begins to shiver under the hospital smock he wears as a disguise. The lead vault where the hospital's radioactive supplies are stored is located in the back of the morgue. Cutlass waits, disguised as a corpse, for the thieves to strike again.

"Hang on guy, it's only two hours till the morning attendant comes in. You can make it," the chattering Cutlass assures himself.

After four minutes of shivering, Cutlass hears a latch opening, and suddenly a drawer near his table slides out from the wall. A warmly dressed man climbs slowly out of the drawer and lumbers over to the lead vault. The strange arrival opens the vault door with a key and steps inside.

When the thief slips out of sight, Cutlass silently slides off his table and, with his pistol drawn, approaches the vault. He hesitates before entering the room full of radiation and instead crouches behind a lab desk, waiting for the intruder to step out into the morgue.

When the thief emerges from the vault and seals the door, Cutlass shouts, "Hold it right there!"

The startled burglar flashes a small revolver out and peels off three shots in Cutlass's direction. All the bullets miss their mark, and Cutlass returns the shots with two direct hits to the robber's chest, but the bullets drop to the floor.

"Oh no, this is going to be tougher than I thought," Cutlass thinks. "I'm fighting Superman."

The light in the morgue is dim, and the thief squints to see Cutlass in the darkness. Cutlass, meanwhile, sneaks behind an operating table with a body on it. He quietly pulls the corpse down behind the table with him, as the gold thief begins to walk through the cold room searching for the witness to his crime. Judging where his opponent is by the sound of his boots on the cement floor, Cutlass drags the body away from the noise.

Silently, Cutlass props the corpse up against a table facing the stealthy footsteps, and creeps away. The anxious burglar comes upon the upright corpse and fires two shots at it. Cutlass springs out from behind another table and slugs the startled robber on the head with the butt of his gun. Knocked unconscious, the intruder crashes to the ground with a thud.

"Just as I suspected, this man is wearing a lead apron to shield himself from the radiation. I didn't think Superman would go down so easily," a relieved Cutlass says to himself. "I'll call the police and they can take it from here."

That weekend Cutlass shocks his secretary, Missy Featherdress, by passing a Geiger counter over all her jewelry. When he checks the necklace she is wearing, the nervous woman asks:

"What are you doing Barry? If you are trying to scare me, you're doing a good job. What is that ticking thing?"

"I'm checking to see if any of your gold jewelry is hot stuff. It could be dangerous," Cutlass warns.

"Hot stuff!? Hot stuff!? I thought I was the only hot stuff around here. That's what you've always told me," Missy whines.

As Cutlass finishes passing the Geiger counter over Missy's ankle bracelet without measuring an increase in radioactivity, he assures her, "Thank goodness, you are the only hot stuff around here, my dear.

grated residential atmosphere. The programs are strengthened more students applied to Living/Learning programs than there were spaces in the building.

Other centers of this sort, under the general category of Special Interest Housing, exist in the country, but few are as broad based and fluid as ours. No other center combines student-designed educational programs with academic budget support. A few are sponsored by the Housing departments of their various schools. Faculty involvement in others is limited. According to Wolk, there is a "natural partnership between Living/Learning Center and faculty" because of the educational nature of the place. With further growth in student interest and participation, the center will continue as an important and unique aspect of UVM.

Library Noise!

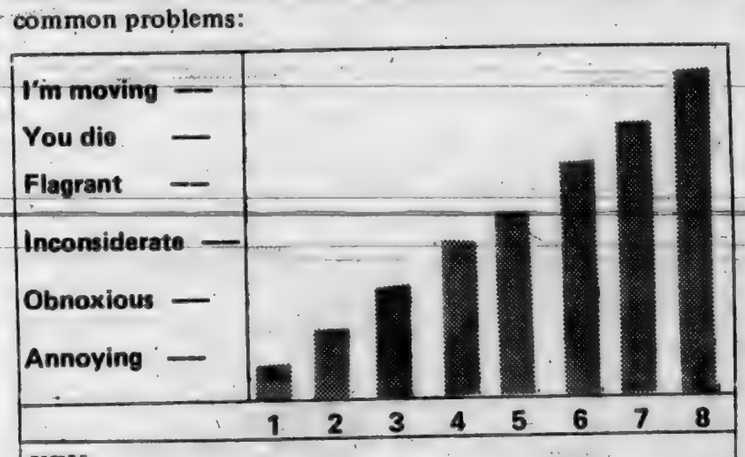
By Randy Ross

The new student center is here. Located in the new library, this facility features a live band and dancing on the second floor, a hot dog vendor and bar on the first. Monday is 25 cent night, with a game room featuring a free phone in the all-nite study. Saga will run all the operations, including the selection of music acts. This week the legendary opening act for Barry Manilow—Azaelia Fleenen appears. The library-Saga merger was signed after Campus Security abandoned operation Q-197-A, which would bring library noise within zoning ordinance levels.

This hypothetical merger is highly unlikely, but distractions and noise are plentiful at the new Bailey-Howe library. As one engineer put it, "people come (to the library) with the intention of socializing, under the thin guise of studying.



The all-nite study consists of mainly off-campus, bean sprout, save the whale crowd; anti-fashion is in, so instead of washing your hair, cover it with a small piece of linen (a used handkerchief or diaper will do) — in one ear put the longest trout streamer that can be found, and wear a flannel shirt three sizes too big.

Another well-represented group is the one waiting to use the free phone. We found special annoyances such as (1) people abusing the coke machine because it is perpetually empty, (2) those eating ten course brown bag lunches, in which all entrees are individually wrapped in 150 decibel waxed paper, (3) group therapy and immaturity hour being conducted at the long table next to you, (4) students who find 'Do not use this door or the alarm will sound' too deep a concept and (5) individuals on bottle recovery missions, who fill their pockets, shirt sleeves, book bags, and then walk away sounding like a car accident.

Major problem spots are the second and third floor stairways. Here are the antitheses of the all-nite study crowd. Designer socks and yachting clothes are considered stylish. To recreate a typical conversation, pick one from column A and intersperse the answer with a few from column B.

Question:	A
How was your	vacation weekend night day breakfast past half hour of life
Answer:	B
Great, we went	Rasputins
	Bone
	Ales You
and got	Faced to the max
	So wild that...
	Sick

People who have been studying elsewhere and want a break know that these stairways are the social oasis in the library. Singing and other loud behavior are difficult to discourage. You will certainly have a friend in the crowd that is talking, and it would be easier for you to join in than try to disperse the mass. The following histogram shows the eight most common problems:

KEY
(1) corduroy pants rubbing
(2) guy blazing trail with hiking boots in old library.
(3) girl cracking gum non-stop
(4) girl with clogs in old library
(5) girl talking about her roommate's love life
(6) guy talking about his latest conquest
(7) sorority girls trying to whisper
(8) freshmen laughing fit

The noise problem in the library definitely lies with the students. The medical library is always quiet due to the more serious attitudes of its inhabitants. Having proctors or the Fascist Studies Suite force consideration on students does not seem to be the answer. Individuals should assert themselves when noise is in their immediate area. But everyone must show a little consideration for others who are studying, when socializing seems like the thing to do.

Hoopsters Extend Winning Streak

By Cristina Fiorini

"I think we've become a smarter offensive team, patience being the key!" exclaimed Vermont coach Peter Salzberg, after his Catamounts claimed two exciting victories over Dartmouth College and University of Baltimore. The week's play brought Vermont's record to 11-8 and marked the Catamount's fourth consecutive victory, the longest string of wins since the early part of the 1977-78 season.

In front of a large, supportive and spirited crowd here at Patrick Gym, Vermont pulled a narrow, nerve-racking victory over the University of Baltimore. It was a close, suspense-filled game, as the victor was not determined until the very last seconds.

Nocera began the momentum, giving a 12-6 advantage to Vermont by dunking the ball off the alley. Baltimore, however, came back quickly and retaliated with a fierce, powerful defense. Within a three minute period the Super Bees kept Vermont pointless while building up a 10 point streak, led by Pierce, Young, Snead and Wise, so that with 9:09 left, Baltimore grabbed the lead, 18-14.

Pressure kept building as Vermont remained one step behind, until with 5:12 left in the half, the Cats came up with a turnover. As Baltimore carried the ball down the court, Wielgus quickly stole the ball and passed it to Correll, who then tipped it in for a neat basket, tying the score at 24-24. Tyrone Johnson entered the game and chalked up critical points with two foul shots and a 3 point play. "T.J. did great coming right off the bench," stated Salzberg. In the very end of the first half, Vermont's Jeff Brown took the ball, shot it from the lane and scored, giving Vermont the lead once more, 33-32.

Baltimore opened the second period with a Wise jumper. After settling into play, the Cats leaped up at 12:18, with Brown tying the game on a 3 point play.

The battle continued with points waging back and forth. Finally, with 8:17 left, Vermont slowly began edging ahead on a 6 point surge led by Evelti's two foul shots. Following right behind was a Nocera shot, and then once again, an Evelti shot from the left side of the base line. Mike completed two more foul shots, as UVM attained a four-point lead, 55-51.

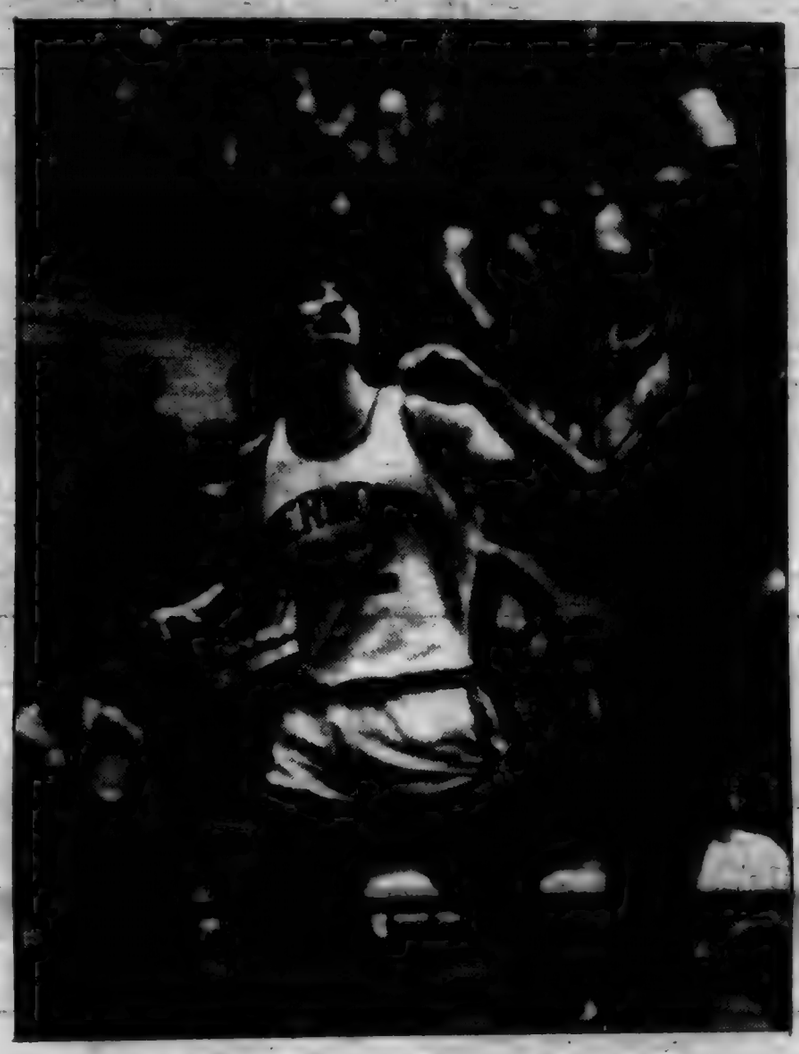
The game held fans in suspense even down to the last few minutes as points continued to creep up slowly for each team, as neither one dominated the game. With 2:27 left, the Cats pulled everything together as Beyonne got the ball, fed it to Evelti who scored. Then Brown laid the ball in to establish a 61-55 lead for Vermont.

The Super Bees, hard-nosed and determined, did not give up and devised a fierce defense, holding Vermont pointless for two minutes, as they added three points to their score to close the gap to 61-57. The crowd was frantic as Evelti, with 26 seconds left, hit a foul shot to wrap up the ulcer-producing win.

"I think it's games like this," remarked Salzberg, "where experience and maturity show. We seem to be developing the capacity to do what we have to do to win."

Both coaches agreed that the key determinant in the game was rebounding, as Vermont outdid Baltimore, 33-26. "We did one good thing," noted Salzberg, "we outrebounded them, and I've hammered that into the players."

Baltimore coach, Jim Casey, noted the same thing, while in addition commented that, "We matched up against Vermont o.k.; they didn't do anything we weren't expecting." Casey also added, "I must say, Vermont has a couple of good, gutsy, aggressive kids. Nocera and Wielgus could play for me anytime."



Strong individual performances were turned in by Evelti and Nocera, both leading Vermont's scoring with 20 and 15 points, respectively.

"Evelti has been playing well," commented Salzberg. "I think his playing is a result of the increased patience the team has shown. Jim also played well; he's had a lot of good games. Certain things he's done have gone unnoticed. He's a man who gets key rebounds!"

Earlier in the week, UVM travelled to Dartmouth, where at Alumni gymnasium, patience and hard efforts earned the Cats a 74-62 victory over the Big Green. The high scorers were Evelti with 22 points, Jeff Brown with 16 points, and Tim Woodlee with 12 points. From the start, Dartmouth tried to slow the game down, using a strong man-to-man defense in efforts to thwart the Cat's advantage in a running game.

Although Vermont won with a safe and steady 12 point margin, the game, in contrast, was a rigid competition marked by back-to-back baskets, as neither team succeeded in obtaining a lead. With eight minutes left in the game and the score tied 46-46, Woodlee, who had an outstanding game compiling 12 key points and five rebounds, managed to complete a critical play, making a basket from the inside along with a foul shot, which boosted Vermont ahead 49-46.

Vermont now plays St. Mikes here before travelling this weekend to New Jersey and New York where the Cats face Fairleigh Dickinson and Colgate.

Women Runners Lose First Meet In 3 Years

By Vicki Johnson

The women's indoor track team suffered a tough loss Sunday, as Cortland State defeated them by just two points (76-74). It was the first loss in three years for Coach Ed Kusiak's girls. Plattsburgh finished with 23 points and Albany State tallied 10 points. The University of Massachusetts failed to show due to poor weather conditions.

Cortland and UVM were tied with 51 points going into the three final events. The Cats had picked up most of their points in the shot competition with Katrina Guerkink taking a first with a put of 42'6" (a new meet record), Barb Luneau grabbing second (36'7¼"), and Marsha Phillips taking fifth place (35'2½"). Vermont also took second in the 4x176 (1:29.8), and Tammy Rugo was second in the 50 meter dash (6.3). Rugo excelled in the 200 meter, finishing first (27.9), followed by Mellissa Morans' fifth (29.2).

UVM dominated the 800 meter with Judi St. Hilaire coming in first (2:17), Pam Molton taking third (2:23.4), Kingsley Belcher finishing fourth (2:25.2), and Patty Roach taking fifth (2:30.1). Another strong finish was in the 3000 meter with St. Hilaire taking first (9:35.2), Anne Schiarone second (10:10.7), and Erica Thuro (10:50.6) fifth.

Karen Bucke put in an outstanding effort against tough Cortland competition, taking fifth place in the high jump (4'10"), and a fourth place in the long jump.

Highlighting the day was St. Hilaire setting a new field house record in the 1500 meter (4:30.5).

Lynn Muller and Moran ran second (7.5) and third (7.6) respectively in the 50 meter hurdle, bringing in badly needed points. The final test for UVM came with the last event, the 4x440. The Cats needed a first in order to beat Cortland, but unfortunately the speed just wasn't there and Cortland coasted to an easy victory winning by 13 seconds.

Coach Kusiak took the loss well, "They (Cortland) deserved to win it; they're just a better all-around team."

Protest Costs Icemen Game

By Greg Weimer

The hockey Catamounts lost a hard-fought decision to the Tigers of Princeton this past Saturday night in New Jersey.

It was a crucial mistake in the third period which cost UVM the game. After Farrel and Friedman connected for Princeton, making the score 3-2 in favor of Vermont, Ed Lee took a snap shot off a face-off to tie the score. Vermont protested the goal, saying Lee's stick was illegally curved. The officials checked the stick and found it legal and assessed a two-minute delay of game penalty to Vermont, which cost the Cats the game. At 12:34, Farrel stopped a Sherstobittogg slap shot and redirected it past Turcotte for the game winner. The Cats now drop to 2-10-2 in Division I play.

Although the first period was scoreless, the hustling Cats outskated Princeton and controlled the tempo of play. In the second stanza, Princeton picked up the pace of the game with more hustle and checking. However, the Cats found the net three times. Mark Litton drove a shot past Princeton's goalie Ron Denis at 3:00 for a power play goal. Then at 9:10, Ray Casey lifted a backhander past Turcotte for Princeton's first power play goal. Dave Hungerford assisted on Vermont's second goal by carrying the puck deep in the right wing corner and hitting freshman Jim Varzakis, who slipped the puck past Dennis.

Tony Messina wrapped up Vermont's scoring by stealing a pass deep in Princeton's zone, outskating a defender and putting the puck between Dennis' legs.

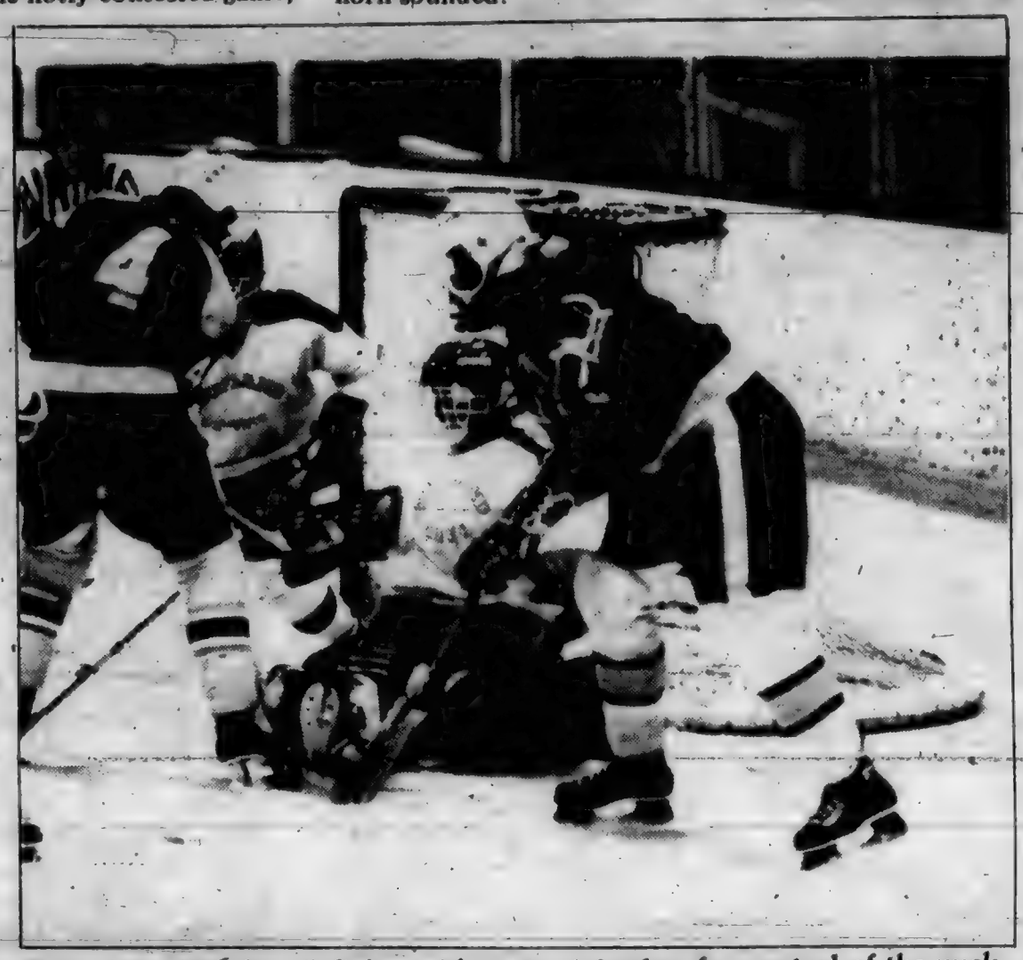
Lady Skaters Succumb to Third Period Barrage



By Celia Anderson

UVM's women's ice hockey team bowed to the visiting Cortland College players in a fast, rough game played at Gutterson Rink on Saturday afternoon. The two teams traded the lead and turns in the penalty box in the hotly-contested game, which remained close until the final period.

Cortland opened the scoring early in the first period, but soon put the defense in action as UVM fought back with a tying goal by Mary Glowka. The remainder of the period saw Cortland take a 2-1 lead, then lose it soon afterward, when Captain Sarah Dougherty, playing in her last game of the season, found the puck in front of the net and fired it past the tardy goaltender. Jeanne Gaudreau made it 3-2 on a quick blast from close range before the horn sounded.

In the second period, the Cortland skaters added two goals, both screened from UVM goalie Louise Joyce, who turned away 12 potential tallies in her finest period of play this season. Despite Cortland's persistent attacks, Lila Kirkland added one for the Cats, leaving the teams in a 4-4 deadlock at the end of the middle period. Hampered by penalties in the third period UVM could not maintain the offensive pressure needed to counter the threat of the Cortland skaters. The continuous barrage penetrated the UVM defense to make the final score 7-4.

The team now looks forward to the chance to better its 5-6 record in four away games against Middlebury, Dartmouth, UConn and Northeastern. The women will then return home for a final contest against Potsdam on March 7.

Women Alpiners Finish Disappointing Second At Own Meet

By Mary Anne O'Malley

The Women's ski team had to settle for a disappointing second place in their own carnival at Stowe February 7. The team was led by a second place finish in the cross-country relay; a third in the 7.5 kilometer; third, fourth, and fifth places in the giant slalom; and top three places in the slalom. Their scores were not quite good enough to overtake Middlebury, who beat UVM by just 2.5 points.

The cross-country team, suffering from an absence of two top racers, Leslie Bancroft and Betsy Haines, put in a driving effort. The 4x5 relay team of Abby Bronson, Margo Thornton, Liz Carey, and Jennifer Caldwell was second to Middlebury's team. UNH finished third, followed by Dartmouth, Williams, and Bates. In the 7.5 kilometer race Carey was the top Vermont finisher, while Caldwell and Bronson finished eighth and ninth respectively.

The alpine events were a bit more promising with Vermont skiers Leslie Baker, Jennifer Kennedy, and Lindey Kelly finishing one, two, three in the slalom. Fourth and fifth places went to Dawn Janerich and Meg Singer, both from Dartmouth. Laurie Baker and Gayle Voelker of UVM were sixth and ninth. Victory in the giant slalom went to Singer with Leslie Smith of Middlebury placing second. Vermont finishers were Kennedy in third position, Voelker in fourth, Leslie Baker in fifth, Laurie Baker in seventh, and Lindey Kelley in tenth.

Top six teams overall were Middlebury with 309 points, UVM with 306.5, Dartmouth with 252.5, UNH with 237, Williams with 199, and Bates with 162. Johnson State was ninth with 70 points.

This week the teams travel to Hanover, N.H. for the Dartmouth Carnival.

UVM WINS CARNIVAL: John Teague races to a first place finish in the Men's Slalom event held at Stowe, Vermont. He, along with Todd Kampainan and Jon Zedechlic, were the stars in the Catamount's victory over Dartmouth, Middlebury, The University of New Hampshire, and Williams in the two day meet that took place last weekend.

By Lon Brettell

The University of Vermont's men's ski team won the UVM Winter Carnival, held at Stowe, Vermont.

On Saturday, UVM won both the slalom and the 4x7.5 cross-country relay. John Teague placed first with Tim Itin (Dartmouth) second, and Pete Murphy (UVM) third. Middlebury's John Morrissey, who was disqualified but won a protest, finished in fourth. Finishing out the top ten were Tor Melander (UVM), Chris Mikell (UVM), Mark Altmeyer (Middlebury), Dave Kent (UNH), Bruce Fenn (Dartmouth), and Bob Hill (Dartmouth).

The 4x7.5 relay was all UVM from beginning to end. Pal Sjulstad took the lead at the start and UVM never looked back. Jon Zdechlic ran the second leg, and his connection with Rick Solie displayed how a great tag can bring a crowd to life. Sjulstad, Zdechlic, and Solie's aggressive performance made easy running for anchorman Todd Kempainan, who all week long had been proving to Nordic fans that he is one of the five best cross-country runners in the United States.

The defending N.C.A.A. champions took an almost insurmountable lead after the first day of competition, as they dominated the giant slalom and the fifteen kilometer cross-country events. The giant slalom was won by UVM's Melander, who had won both races two weeks ago at UNH. He came back from a sixth place finish in the first run with a flawless second run to win the giant slalom. Pete Murphy (UVM) finished second, just ahead of Chris Mikell (UVM) and John Morrissey (Middlebury), who tied for third. Finishing up in the top ten were Mack Lyons (Dartmouth), John Teague (UVM), Crawford Lyons (Williams), Tim Itin (Dartmouth), David Kent (UNH) and Dave Bean (UVM).

Runners Race Over Plattsburg

By Harry Eastman

Coming off a strong performance at St. Lawrence University, the University of Vermont's men's indoor track team cruised to an easy 99-46 victory over an undermanned Plattsburgh State College team.

Albany State, the other team scheduled to compete at Plattsburgh in the meet held on February 7, did not participate. This allowed for several individual UVM performers to concentrate on qualifying for the Eastern Championships, which will be held at the Coast Guard Academy in New London, Ct. on February 14.

There were several outstanding individual performances in the meet. Steve Shea (600m. dash), Mark Christensen (50 yard dash), Erik Stabenau (pole vault), Lucas Peluffo (300 meter run), Jim Rideout (triple jump), and Tony Bates (two mile run) turned in exceptional efforts in their respective events.

Eighteen team members have qualified for the Eastern Championships. Captains Joe McCalallen and Charlie Claudio are seeded second in their respective events, the 55 meter dash and the pentathlon. Jim Rideout, Dave Swan, Erik Stavenau, Dean Flanders, Randy Sightler, Steve Stebbins, Kelly Bartlett, Tony Bates, Sam Davis, Terry Gilmore, Brad Phelps, Lucas Peluffo, Bill Newberry, Steve Shea, Jon Stankevich and Steve Wechter are the other team members who have qualified.

Swimmers Dunk Panthers For Second Time

By Art Cunningham

The women's swim team turned in its finest performance of the year last Wednesday, dismantling the Middlebury Panthers at Forbush Pool, 86-54.

A handful of varsity records fell in the lopsided meet, as Liz Levens, Patsy Demarcken, and Lisa Johansson set new marks.

Levens won the 100 freestyle in 57:58, shattering the previous high for the third time in two weeks. She surpassed her own mark in the 100 individual medley. Last week, in a victory at St. Michaels, she established a new mark in the 50 yard freestyle, giving her three new varsity records.

Demarcken continued her fine swimming, taking first in the 1000 freestyle, 200 freestyle (varsity record at 2:03.28), and the 100 backstroke.

Johansson swam in at 31:34 to edge Lona Cliff of Middlebury in the 50 back for the new mark, and swam a close second to Demarcken in the 100 back medley, and easily glided into victory in the 100 butterfly.

The divers, coached by Cathy Layman, continued to set the pace, with Sarah Moore capturing first place in both the one and three meter dives. Robin Campbell collected a second and a third.

Sarah is the defending New England Division B diving champ, and her dives can bring you to your feet, and take your breath away. She was honored for her four years of dedication at this, her final meet in Forbush Pool.

The swimmers finished up the season yesterday at Albany State in a tri-meet with Utica, and are preparing for the regionals in Boston during the first weekend in March.

Celtics Are Great Without Cowens

By Robert Doolan

What effect has the retirement of Dave Cowens had on the Boston Celtics this year? Other than missing some intangibles, very little.

The success of this year's club has made the absence of Dave Cowens seem minimal. Though his intensity, desire and aggressiveness were greatly admired by the Celtic faithful, the team concept and selflessness of this year's team have made up for the loss of the former All-Star center.

After finishing the regular season last year with the best record in the N.B.A., the Celtics beat Houston four games to none before losing to the Philadelphia 76ers in the Eastern Conference finals. It was a pretty successful season for a team that had one of the worst records in the league the previous year.

This astonishing turnaround wasn't quite enough, though, and some changes were made. Boston acquired Robert Parish and the third choice in the collegiate draft from the Golden State Warriors for the first pick in the draft. With the third pick they chose Kevin McHale from Minnesota. Parish at 7'0" and McHale at 6'11" have added size and strength to the Boston front line.

When training camp opened, many people felt the Celtics would trade one of their big men for a guard to shore up the lack of depth at that position. But one afternoon Dave Cowens boarded the team bus and announced his retirement. The trade talk was put on hold and has been there ever since.

The season began with some big question marks. Would the backcourt be able to sustain itself, or would it become a glaring weakness? Would the two new arrivals be able to compensate for the loss of team captain and veteran Cowens?

These big questions have become non-existent as the first half of the season has come to a close. At one time the team had won 25 of its last 26 games and had the winningest percentage in the league. The credit for this amazing streak and league domination has been due to the concept of team play and defense. Boston has not lost a game when it has held the opponent under 100 points. Also, there are usually four or five players scoring in double figures in each game. This balance is hard to stop and is a tribute to the team's lack of selfishness.

The skepticism concerning the guard position has disappeared. Tiny Archibald has been playing as well as any point guard in the league. He is among the league leaders in assists and almost always scores in double figures. As for the front line, this aspect has become one of Boston's strong points. Parish has been the surprise of the league this year with his markedly improved play. McHale has been a solid contributor, coming off the bench and, along with Parish, has given the team an intimidating, shot-blocking force on defense which was missing during the Cowens era.

Garcia Shines in Beantown

By Jay Connolly and Eliot Bergson

Outside the Orpheum Theatre in Boston last Saturday night was a scene familiar to many. Groups of young, blurry-eyed smiling faces paced the streets surrounding the theatre hours before showtime in search of food, friends, and froth, and the elusive extra tickets to two sold-out-well-in-advance concerts. It was a homecoming of sorts, amid questions like "Wow, what've you been up to?," "What row?," "How much?," "Is it speedy?," and, a few blocks away, "Jerry who?" The occasion, of course, was just one more day in the long, strange trip known as Jerry Garcia, touring the East Coast once again with a band of studio musicians (drummer, bassist, two keyboard players) and trailing bits and pieces of ever-faithful followers along the way.

Most of the time Jerry Garcia is lead guitar player for the Grateful Dead. But as he admitted in a recent interview, he's a "music junkie," someone who lives for the opportunity to play music whenever and wherever. When he isn't playing with the Dead, he can be found in nightclubs and small theatres somewhere in the U.S., especially near his hometown, San Francisco. Garcia and band are presently winding their way up the East, a trip which always includes a show or two in Boston.

After hearing about Garcia's performance the night before in Philadelphia, expectations were high. This man has a remarkable repertoire of songs he can play, and he usually works his way through it over several nights. He pulled some classic tunes from the hat Saturday night, much to the surprise and pleasure of an appreciative audience.

One of the surprises of the night was an opening act, a rarity for Garcia band shows. It was a tasteful Jonathan Edwards, however, not another Rachel Sweet experiment like last spring. Edwards, well known to Burlingtonians, played an inspired "greatest hits" selection. He laced favorites like "Sunshine," "Shanty," "Lady," and Janis Joplin's "Mercedes Benz" with fine harp playing. An all-harmonica "Amazing Grace" was a nice touch to a fast, yet flawless, opening act. Edwards played for a little over a half hour, just long enough to warm up an already anxious crowd for the music they came to hear.

Jerry appeared on stage wearing the ever-present black tee shirt and brown corduroys. A little tuning up, a couple of long drags on the Camel non-filters, and he opened up with "How Sweet It Is," a James Taylor hit which has become a Garcia Band regular. A mellow reggae-like "Catfish John" followed, and a "That's What Love'll Make You Do" jam was a high point of the first show. Garcia was troubled with forgotten and broken lyrics during much of the show, and this was especially evident on "Like a Road," a touching lullaby seldom played. It's always a shame when Jerry spaces on the words, but he plays flawlessly from the heart on guitar. A well-done reggae tune, "Love in the Afternoon," from Garcia's last solo album, eased into one of Jerry's favorites, "Sugaree," played as well as any at a Grateful Dead concert. The first show ended with Bob Dylan's "Tangled Up In Blues," a song Garcia has adopted in the last year, but already a polished interpretation of a ballad about life on the road. The first show was a nice collection of old and new. It had its moments musically, but for the most part was a lackluster performance compared to what this man can produce. The second show was another story.

What Garcia wasn't quite able to do the first show — reach that incredible musical mountaintop that brings ear-to-ear smiles to Deadheads' faces — he quickly accomplished in the later show. Opening with "The Harder They Come," the Jimmy Cliff "fight-for-your-rights" reggae smash, Garcia stepped back after the first chorus and began to warm up that new Irwin custom-made guitar to a fearsome level. The heat circulated to the audience, who were all on their feet as the song ended.

More quickly than usual, Garcia jumped into a perfectly technical, laid-back version of "They Love Each Other," off his Reflections album, which brought a collective sigh from the audience. Sit back and let the drugs take hold...

That was the last time the audience had a chance to sit until Garcia took an unexpected break, something he didn't do during the first show. After conversing with the band and receiving a nod of approval from long-time friend John Kahn on bass, Garcia launched into a version of "Tore Up" that was phenomenal.

You can always tell when Garcia is going to really wail, because he stares at the floor and rocks back and forth as he plays. Like a Weeble who dared to wobble too far and not fall down, Jerry kept a blistering, Chuck-Berry-like lead going for about ten minutes. The crowd grew those smiles on their faces that non-Deadheads can never understand.

With the crowd still on their feet, Garcia and company slipped into what's probably everyone's favorite tune on Reflections — "Mission in the Rain." Rather than sit down, many remained standing to receive those jolts of quicksilver that Garcia often sends forth. Again, the solo was almost fatal to anyone on LSD that night. To the surprise of many, Garcia announced a short break (it lasted 40 minutes) to allow all to sit back and smile at what had just passed.

The second set opened with another soft tune from Reflections, "I'll Take a Melody," which was the slowest tune of the second show. Troubled again by vocal mishaps, Garcia wasn't quite able to reach that plateau he had climbed to in the first set. Then he gave us another chance to sit back and melt as he played a rare "Mississippi Moon," from his first solo album. When you play fast, you can cover up mistakes, but when you play slow, the song has to be perfect; Garcia showed the audience exactly what perfection was.

The end of the show was a three-song medley that brought back amazing smiles. Starting off with an inspired version of the Beatles' "Dear Prudence," Garcia couldn't ignore the mass cry from the audience near the end of the song for "Deal," a song off his second album that the Dead usually play to end first sets. In that song's classic tradition of building to an awesome musical crescendo, Garcia smiled wide as the crowd went virtually crazy in the aisles; he was truly enjoying one of his rare acceptances of crowd requests. Those Chuck Berry-like riffs returned at the end of the song, and we all expected a smash ending, but Garcia must have been in an exceptional mood by then, because he neatly slipped into an unexpectedly lively version of "Midnight Moonlight" (off his Old and In the Way album, which he recorded with Vassar Clemens, David Grisman, John Kahn, and John Dawson of New Riders of the Purple Sage fame). Picture a man playing riffs on a guitar as fast as a master banjo player picks his instrument, and you get a good idea of how the show ended.

Outside the Orpheum, the unseasonably warm night air harbored the familiar antics of that family known as "Deadheads" enjoying their most recent pilgrimage. People danced in the streets, and friends hugged each other and weaved new tales about life on the road.

Some people don't understand these fanatical fans who forsake all else for a few hours of live music in a packed concert hall; other critics scorn the Dead's faithful as "dreamers" or "druggies." Whatever the reasons are, these fans appear to be the happiest people on earth — except for the musicians themselves.

That's the most important thing. After sixteen years on the road, the strain is beginning to show, and rumors of Jerry's failing health have been circulating for quite a while. These may indeed be true, but the smile on his face last Saturday night indicated that he's doing what he loves, and loving what he does. Defying all conceivable explanations, Garcia just keeps on playing, and as long as there is a Jerry Garcia, there will be people dancing in the streets.

Abercrombie and Towner at Hunt's: Ambient Beauty Through an Exploration of Sound

By John Dennison

Being in a place that doesn't really generate the anger and frustration of a big city, Burlington takes a different type of vehicle to attain musical nirvana: simplicity. Where Black Sabbath and AC/DC exert brute force to achieve their musical goal, John Abercrombie and Ralph Towner minimize and conserve to achieve theirs. Thus, Burlington experienced the antithesis of rock 'n roll last Sunday night at R. W. Hunt's.

"We'd never heard of this place, until today," John Abercrombie said with a hint of embarrassment. "I mean, some of those guys on the wall out front are dynamite performers. It's a pleasure to play here."

John and Ralph gave two stunning performances, in which they used extremely sparse chordal frameworks to produce tunes of ambient beauty. At times, the duo blended runs of incredible speed which were completely synchronized. Other songs were characterized by phrases consisting of light stroking of strings, creating very soft tones. Towner's raw acoustic sound on any of his three available stage guitars complemented Abercrombie's electric array of twelve-string, six-string, and four-string guitars. During one song, Towner weaved an empty matchbook between his strings, providing a percussive feel which Abercrombie played off with bell-like flights from his tiny four-string "electric mandolin."

The two would often appear to be in a trance, with eyes closed and instruments motionless, concentrating on ethereal harmonies (as in the song "Timeless"). Included among their repertoire of original pieces was a number by Miles Davis and Bill Evans called "Nardis," which was the most accessible tune of the night due to its swing-like familiarity. "Staircase," a song the two virtuosos recorded on the album Sargasso Sea, featured John Abercrombie's face contorting madly as he lit up the neck of his six-string Gibson. This was a common event throughout each set the band played.

All of the material was very appropriately titled, particularly one song named "Waterwheel," which depicted a steady aqueous flow. Glancing around, I saw a very attentive audience. In fact, there was scarcely a fidget during either of the two shows, both of which were sold out. Paul Kaza hit the bullseye, so to speak, when he mentioned in Monday's Free Press that 'the music was exceptionally demanding of the audience.

Abercrombie and Towner are certainly exploring new territory in guitar playing, and they come up with some brilliant innovations. The concentration involved in playing together enables experimentation to take place. Over ten years of playing with one another and apart have wrought many interesting discoveries in the exploration of sound. The two attain their musical ecstasy by the beauty of simplicity.

These two distinguished guitarists were on the first leg of a nine-day tour of the U.S., and after a short rest they will travel to Europe for five weeks of concerts. A new album will then be recorded this summer in Oslo. The fact that they are spending so little time here and so much in Europe is yet another reminder of the better attention Europeans devote to jazz, one of America's only indigenous art forms.

The Clash: Danceable Politics

By Jim O'Donnell

In early 1980, the Clash released a double album, London Calling, which many (myself included) considered to be the best rock album of the year. It was more subtle than their passionately explosive debut, The Clash (released in the U.S. in 1977), and yet at the same time, it was just as uncompromising in attitude and more diverse musically. The album featured punky rock, reggae, blues, and rockabilly, all meshing Clash-style with their hard-edged themes of struggle and power.

Surprisingly, considering the seriousness of the material, London Calling hit the top twenty in the U.S., and produced a top ten single, "Train in Vain (Stand By Me)." The Clash had reached their potential musically, while at the same time becoming the only original English punk band to achieve commercial success in the U.S. The problem now was that many people wondered what they would do for an encore. Would they compromise their message now that they had attained commercial success, or could they duplicate or better the sounds produced on London Calling, which was compared most often with the Rolling Stones masterpiece, Exile on Main Street?

These questions have all been answered on the latest offering from the Clash, Sandanista! It is safe to say that they have given us another epic: a three-record set this time, again drawing on and using many different musical sources. The album was recorded in New York, London, and Kingston, Jamaica, and it reflects the moods and sounds from each of these locations. The most immediately striking feature about Sandanista! is the pervasive use of reggae sounds and idioms. The Clash have always been regarded as reggae soul brothers (by themselves, if not the Jamaicans), and they have done some excellent reggae songs (such as Junior Murvin's "Police and Thieves" from The Clash), but Sandanista! reflects a serious commitment to the sound. With the aid and influence of reggae deejay Mikey Dread, the Clash are the first white band to capture the feel of reggae, as well as the sound (Blondie, et. al., take note). This suits them well, for if nothing else reggae is truly political music, and the Clash are a truly political band.

The album is not all reggae, though, and its diversity is made clear on the very first side. The opening cut, "The Magnificent Seven," is a funky rapper about the drudgeries of everyday life, which ends up mentioning Marx, Engels, Martin Luther King, Gandhi, Socrates, Nixon, Plato, and Rin-tin-tin. The words fly by faster than the ear can hear on this song. "Hitsville U.K.," the next song, has a true Motown feel (featuring fine backup vocals by Ellen Foley). "Junco Partner" is a good reggae number, and "Ivan Meets G.I. Joe" is a discoish romp about (you guessed it) the next and last world war. "So you're on the floor at 54/ Think you can last at Le Palace/ Does your body go to the to and fro?/ But tonight's the night — or didn't you know — that Ivan meets G.I. Joe!" The frivolity of the beat is a sharp counterpoint to the seriousness of Joe Strummer's vocals. "Ivan Meets G.I. Joe" is in the same vein as Bob Marley's "Real Situation;" that is, there is little any of us will be able to do once the big two decide to have it out.

There is musical variety on every side of Sandanista!, with side two being perhaps the most prominent of the six. Here they slide effortlessly through be-bop jazz ("Look Here" by Mose Allison), reggae, and driving rock 'n roll. The outstanding cut here is a rocker, "Somebody Got Murdered," sung by guitarist Mick Jones. It is an excellent song about loneliness and desperation in the urban jungle: "Somebody got murdered, his name cannot be found/ A small stain on the pavement, they'll scrub it off the ground/ As the daily crowd disperses, no-one says that much/ Somebody got murdered, and it's left me with a touch."

The struggle to stay free and alive is a fact which is driven home on every song and side of Sandanista!, and their message is both personal and universal. For The Clash, winning or losing has always seemed secondary to the struggle itself, and this attitude is seen in songs such as "Police on My Back" and "Washington Bullets," a song about the Sandanistan rebels in Nicaragua: "The killing clowns, the blood-money men/ Are shooting those Washington bullets again."

The Clash's songs are about real and sometimes dangerous subjects (how many other groups would write a song about Nicaraguan rebels?), but they always manage to keep the beat danceable and accessible. You might describe their music as "A cymbal splash, a word of truth — and a rocking bass and drum," as bassist Paul Simonon sings in "The Crooked Beat."

On the whole, Sandanista! is a truly excellent album. There is more good music stuffed on to three records than one can write about. Rock fans may be put off by the heavy reggae emphasis (side six is almost all dub reggae), but this seems to be where The Clash are headed. There are also several good rockers on the album, though, such as "Up in Heaven (Not Only Here)," "Somebody Got Murdered," and "Midnight Log." The interesting thing is that Mick Jones sings on all the rockers, while Strummer takes on almost everything else (including the surprisingly convincing gospel number, "Sound of Sinners"). Other lead vocals are done by Simonon, Mikey Dread, Timon Dogg (a "guest" musician), and keyboardist Mickey Gallagher's kids, Luke, Ben, and Maria. With Topper Headon still pumping on drums, the band retains its pulsating sound.

The most impressive thing about The Clash, however, is that they mean what they say, and in this era of hypes and over-inflated egos, that is all too rare. Strummer and the boys are totally sincere about everything they say and do — this is apparent on all their records. Perhaps the only other major rock artist who can make this claim is Bruce Springsteen. Sandanista! is selling in most record stores for around $10, which is an unbelievably low price for a three-record set. Take my advice, at that price Sandanista! is a steal.

CLOWNS / CONCERT

Who's the Clown By the Altar?

By Jennifer Weiss

Father Floyd Shaffer, a Lutheran minister, began experimenting with the use of clowns in his masses 15 years ago. His congregation really enjoyed the idea and thus he started the Faith and Fantasy Clowns. The troupe has over 14,000 members throughout the world, four of whom held a workshop at St. Michael's College last Friday, Saturday and Sunday. Father Joe DiMauro, with the aid of Angela Mullen, Janet Scarcia, and Jim Katone, led the workshop. The participants learned how to apply Christianity to clowning.

The workshop was comprised of three stages: (1) learning to develop within oneself, (2) learning how to bring that developed self out, and (3) how clowning fits in with the sacred intention. On Friday night, everyone experimented with make-up and costumes. No talking was allowed, so the clowns had to find other means of communication. On Saturday morning, the group travelled to the Green Mountain Nursing Home to share the gospel with the patients. After returning to St. Michael's, the clowns enacted biblical tales, interpreting the stories in their own distinct way. Father DiMauro had this to say about one skit, "The Good Samaritan": "simple, concise and packed a message." The final stage was Sunday morning mass, in which some of the clowns performed parts of the sermon.

Christian clowning is highly symbolic. The costumes and make-up all have special meanings. Jesus, in the bible, refers to clowns as doulos, servants of other men. When clowns put on their make-up, they always start with white. Whether they cover their entire face with white or use it on only small spots, they always have some white. This color symbolizes the death of Christ. The clowns themselves 'die,' and with this death they lose their ability to speak. They then add color to their faces and are considered resurrected. The only means of communication the clowns have is body language. Father DiMauro said the clowns say much more through body language than through speech.

There exist three types of clowns: the white face clown, the august clown and the tramp clown, each characterized by a certain type of make-up and costuming. Every part of the costume has a special meaning to the clown. By looking at a clown's costume, one can tell what type of person the clown is. "This is the best group we've ever worked with," commented Father DiMauro, noting the individuality of each clown.

The participants are all involved in some service area, including big brothers and sisters, nursing and psychology. All have an "idea of Christianity." Christian clowns are "alive to God and are in wonder and awe, like a child."

The workshop ended with picture-taking and a moving sermon. Some of the clowns acted out parts of the mass, adding a new dimension to the ceremony. Those who participated in the workshop now can go on and conduct their own workshops, teaching others how to be Christian clowns.

A Sober Pleasure With Dan Gillmor

By Christopher Scott

For the past few years, UVM Residential Life has sponsored Booze News Week, coinciding with National Alcohol Awareness Week, in an attempt "to raise awareness of use and abuse of alcohol on campus and to promote responsible drinking." In a university (not to mention, city) where social life tends to revolve around the consumption of libations, this goal is indeed a noble, but regretfully impossible, task. Simply, it seems that most students are too preoccupied with where to get "blitzed" after classes on Friday to be concerned with anything other than doing a bare minimum of work. Consequently, the message of Alcohol Awareness Week falls upon deaf ears.

Sometimes that message sinks in, loud and clear, however. That was the case in Harris/Millis lounge last Wednesday night when local artist Dan Gillmor played a benefit concert for UVM Booze News Week. Gillmor, a clean-cut, conservative-looking UVM graduate in his late twenties, is well-known in this area for his established guitar work. He began the show informally, simply tuning his guitar and joking with the small, polite crowd. Then, just before he began playing, he said, "You know, I resent the fact that few people listen to my music unless it's played live in a stinky, smoke-filled bar. It's a pleasure to see you all here without drinks being served." With that and a chug on his Coca-Cola, he began.

Musically, although somewhat rusty from inactivity since he and his group "Roadapple" stopped touring a few years ago, Gillmor impressed me as much with the range of his selections as with his playing. Gordon Lightfoot's "If You Could Read My Mind, Love" and Joni Mitchell's "Carousel" were played delicately and soothed the audience while more upbeat tunes like Tom Paxton's "Can't Help But Wonder Where I'm Bound" and Merle Haggard's "Mama Tried" allowed Gillmor to show off his skill. Throughout the show, the crowd was quiet but responsive to the almost coffee-house atmosphere. Gillmor appropriately concluded the set with a nice, semi-sing-along version of Jesse Colin Young's "Get Together."

After the show, I asked Dan why he has played benefits for Booze News Week for the past two years. "Because I've buried too many friends after accidents involving drunk drivers," he said bluntly. I then asked him whether he felt his message was getting across. "I certainly hope so, but, of course, the true responsibility for alcohol awareness lies within the individual."

To me, Dan Gillmor's message is clear. Let's just hope people are listening.

BOOK

Arkin's Journey to the Self

By Mark J. Cadigan

Halfway Through the Door is Alan Arkin's remarkable account of the changes that took place within him after he discovered yoga. It's surprising that a man who had directed and acted in numerous plays and films would write a book on such a topic, but he accomplishes the task brilliantly by carefully revealing his innermost thoughts and feelings to his readers.

Arkin's feelings are easily understood because he writes honestly and clearly. Concerning John, his guru, the author says: "The idea of his simply liking me, caring about me, wanting to spend time with me because I was in some way valued, did not enter my mind. It took six years of intensive work in analysis before I could even consider these possibilities and was ready to meet him again. Even then I did not recognize him as my teacher."

This openness is evident throughout the book. Rather than speaking in abstract, cosmic terms, Arkin uses ordinary language ("street yoga, or colloquial mysticism," as he calls it) to make his points. "As you will see," he comments, "I had enormous misgivings about embarking on a spiritual path." His struggle comes to life via this easygoing style, and we learn firsthand about the confusion, anger, fear, and ultimately, peace involved in this struggle. The highly personal quality of these emotions distinguishes Halfway Through the Door from so many "how-to" treatises on meditation.

Early in the actor's yoga experiences, he recognized a paradox within himself. He remembers that his guru "spoke of auras, of astral travel, meditation, life on other worlds, reincarnation — and I became convinced that he was mad. Yet these were all things in which I secretly believed." In fact, Arkin's childhood desire to be able to fly was one of the reasons why he became a disciple. The flying archetype involves the same kind of power and concentration as a journey to the self, and it was a yearning to tap the resources of the self that spurred him on to greater heights.

Those greater heights include mental visions of two earlier incarnations and a fascinating out-of-body experience. While meditating and breathing deeply and rapidly, a throbbing grew in his head "and then in an instant I felt my whole head turn inside out, as if sucked through a hole created by the pressure. The back of my head came right through the front of my skull and I was left sitting in front of myself."

As bizarre as Arkin's account seems, it is handled in a very realistic manner. He examines his fear of such events as well as his general disbelief about certain aspects of his learning. Since the reader may share a similar skepticism about yoga and meditation, Arkin's uncertainty may become credible to a larger audience.

It is this down-to-earth integrity that allows Arkin to deal with a fairly abstract subject in a concrete way. In his own closing words: "The purpose of this work has been to let you know that I am not unique, and that you are not alone." I find Arkin's story to be a powerful and moving remembrance of his inner growth through yoga.

Recognizing Afro-American History

By Ed Stearns

As a result of student protests in the late 1960's, many schools around the country began offering courses in black studies.

By 1969-70, UVM was offering such courses as History of the Negro in the U.S. and Literature of Black America. Many schools, such as Cornell, Ohio State, and Stanford, established autonomous black studies departments. Others, including UVM, established inter-departmental programs, arguing that the study of blacks was more effective when it wasn't set apart.

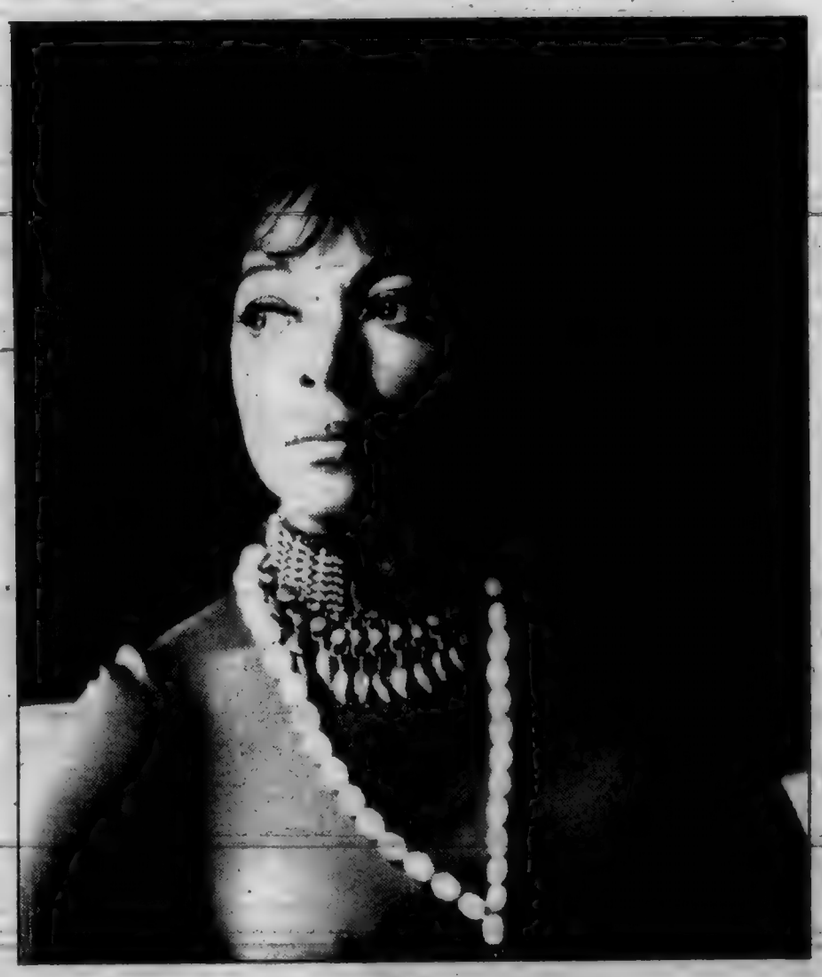
Only about 300 black studies programs have survived the mood of fiscal and political conservatism so prevalent on college campuses today. At one point there were close to 500 such programs being offered around the country.

Despite the small number of black students attending UVM, the 1980-81 catalog lists seven courses in the realm of black and African studies. Only four of these (Literature of Black America, Cultures of Africa, Minority Groups, and Race Relations) have actually been offered in the 1980-81 school year.

According to Professor Marshall True of the UVM History Department, the Black History course is now in a state of limbo. This is partly due to the fact that Susan Jackson, the professor who taught the course, is no longer at UVM. Professor True also said that a lack of student demand for the course has led to its uncertain status.

All hope is not lost, however. This month, Vermont ETV is celebrating black history by looking at some of the many contributions blacks have made in all areas of American life.

Two programs of particular interest to students are "To Be Young, Gifted and Black," a tribute to the late playwright Lorraine Hansberry, and "Only the Ball Was White," a look at the era when baseball was still a segregated sport.



For those of you who may not remember, Lorraine Hansberry was the recipient of the New York Drama Critics Circle "Play of the Year" award in 1959 for A Raisin in the Sun.

"To Be Young, Gifted, and Black" is an autobiographical documentary based on unpublished letters, poems, diaries, and also the stage play of the same name written by Ms. Hansberry's husband, Robert Nemiroff. Rudy Dee portrays Lorraine Hansberry in this moving story of growing up black in America. Joining Ms. Dee in this original teleplay from the classic "NET Playhouse" Biography series are Roy Schneider, Barbara Barrie, Claudia McNeil, Al Freeman, Jr., Blythe Danner, and Lauren Jones.

For those of you interested in sports, "Only the Ball Was White" uses original film footage, photographs, and interviews, to remember the days when the Negro leagues presented the only opportunity for blacks to play professional baseball.

Special attention is given to Josh Gibson, who many people believe would have been a superstar had he been allowed into the major leagues. Satchell Paige, Jimmy Crutchfield, and Roy Campanella are also featured in this half-hour documentary about the men who played on such teams as the New York Black Yankees, Newark Eagles, and the Birmingham Black Bantams. These men share with us their feelings about Jackie Robinson's integration into the major leagues in 1946.

Both of these programs will be aired Monday, February 16th on Vermont ETV/UHF channel 33 or cable channel 10. "To Be Young, Gifted, and Black" will be shown at 8:00 p.m., and "Only the Ball Was White" will be shown at 9:30 p.m.

Its Another Catch-22 At UVM

The Dean of Arts and Sciences has put a stopper on future hiring and admissions to the Communications department. Soon he may decide to close the department down altogether. After nine years and several departmental reviews, Dean Jewett said this week that the quality of the communications program is unacceptable, and that the communications faculty has been unsupportive of attempts to revitalize it. At one of several meetings with anxious communications majors, who have put together a Steering Committee to protest the mandate, Jewett warned that the department would be closed if its program wasn't improved.

But the communications department will not receive any extra funds for the vital changes, and no new tenure-tracked professors will be hired. Acting Chairman Dharam Yadav requested funding for two senior professors, in a low-key and rather uninspired revitalization effort. 60 applicants were screened for the proposed positions, but according to Jewett, none were qualified.

As it stands now, Communications is again being "reviewed," and communications majors are stranded in a stumbling department. The prospect of graduating from UVM a communications major is gloomier than ever.

Training for students interested in communications careers has never been one of Waterman's top priorities. The Communications department has been able to offer fine courses in film production and speech making, but none in print journalism, for example, or in the use of the sophisticated technology that modern media organizations use. Obviously, quality communications and journalism departments need hefty budgets for salaries and complex equipment.

Communications needs the kind of human and financial resources that the College of EMBA and the College of Medicine, and the hockey team receive. And it needs a talented chairman with professional experience in the highly competetive mass communications field.

Dean Jewett might just as well have confessed that UVM has no interest in communications careers, and that it is time to close a department that it long ago decided not to cultivate and fund responsibly. Instead, he has presented the Communications students and faculty, and all concerned UVM students with a catch-22: shape up, but don't expect any help from the UVM administration.

HE SAYS TO LET 'EM EAT JELLYBEANS!

Letters To The Editor

More Than The Average Crowning Jewel

To the Editor:

Having been an undergraduate at this university for three years, I have watched with amusement and horror some of the amazingly inept and irresponsible acts that the university administration has undertaken.

The recent threats of axing the Communications Department is only the top of the crown. Yet the seriousness of this surely makes it more than the average crowning jewel.

The Dean of Arts and Science, Doctor Jewett, has plainly neglected a matter which most universities in this country have been aware of for a number of years. While it is true that enrollments are falling, and that programs may need to be cut, why is it that he feels the area of communications is the area that needs to go?

It probably reflects a self-serving interest. The facts, when examined, show that the communications department has been given a bureaucratic run-around for some time now, and that the university would really rather not support it. All that ad lib verboseness that they only want to offer quality courses must be prefaced by the fact that UVM would really rather they offered no courses at all. And Dean Jewett is doing everything in his power to carry that wish out.

This would not be the first time the UVM administration has made a fool of itself, but it's about time this tomfoolery ended once and for all. We ought to have people in our offices who have a forward-looking attitude, and who can see clearly the future trends of the job market. If the present administration maintains its beauvine path, they might as well reconcile themselves to the fact that UVM will go from a pretty decent University to a third rate joe blow community college unable to deal with the way the rest of America is going.

Unsubstantiated and Erroneous Statements

To the Editor:

As a member of UVM's Board of Trustees and specifically its Investment Committee, I read Mr. Rick Green's letter of January 29, 1981 with great interest. Unfortunately, I found that Mr. Green made several unsubstantiated and erroneous statements in regards to UVM investments and South Africa, and the role of UVM Trustees.

I question Mr. Green's statement that, "U.S. corporations get around this (U.S. law) by using their South African subsidiaries to do their work." That U.S. corporations evade U.S. law by selling their goods through their subsidiaries is a statement which is unsupported by evidence. As far as I know, even the Investor Responsibility Research Center Inc., which publishes a monthly newsletter called News for Investors, has yet to prove what Mr. Green claims. Furthermore, all of the corporations that UVM invests in either subscribe to the Sullivan Principles, or parallel principles that support "human dignity and will contribute greatly to the general economic welfare of all the people in the Republic of South Africa."

If Mr. Green is convinced that U.S. law is allowing corporations to deal with South Africa through its subsidiaries, he should contact his congressional delegation to precipitate a change in the law, which would be far more effective than one university's divestiture. Almost as effective as changing the law would be a campaign against the purchase of a corporation's goods. A corporation is much more sensitive to consumers than it is to sales and acquisitions on the secondary market.

What is most unfortunate about Mr. Green's letter is his misunderstanding of the role of a UVM Trustee (student, legislative, gubernatorial, self-perpetuating, or otherwise). All UVM Trustees have a fiduciary responsibility to the University of Vermont and State Agricultural College. A trustee does not represent the State Legislature, the Governor, the UVM administration, or the Student Association – his only constituent is an institution that is now 190 years old. A trustee's primary purpose is to see the healthy, vibrant, and solvent perpetuation of that institution.

Who Cares About Jerry In Boston?

Editor:

While sitting in my office last Friday morning drinking coffee, and going through my routine of reading over the last issue of the Cynic, I came upon the lead article in the Arts section, "Jerry Shines in Beantown".

God forbid me to say anything degrading about the deity of Jerry Garcia. It would be the equivalent of discrediting the Messiah, Henry David Thoureau, Martin Luther King, John Lennon, and the rest of the established spiritual leaders of our time. I am so thankful I took the time to see the Dead a couple of years ago in Seattle. Now I can go to sleep everynight knowing I have been touched and sung to by the Greatful Dead.

But we are in Burlington, not Seattle, and above all Garcia was in Boston. For the sake of Mr. Bergson, Mr. Connolly, and the Cynic Arts Editor, a redefinition of the UVM and Burlington community arts may be in order. Art is all around us, gentlemen. Art is students working in the studios at 3:00 a.m. Art is music majors and students practicing at Living/Learning. Art is pottery and ceramics at Living/Learning too. Art is music. Art is local musicians playing their hearts out while their pay is $10.00 a night and all the beer they can drink. Art is Cynic photographers expressing themselves. Art is snowdrifts. Art is dance classes at Southwick. Art is human movement -our university gymnasts on the high beam, or the precision of our divers on the UVM swim team. Art is creativity and intuition, something which the foundation of the university community is based on. Mr. Bergson's and Mr. Connolly's article is hardly creative and representative of the student environment. Art to them is the same old thing - another Garcia concert, something that if I wanted to read a review on, I would subscribe to the Boston Globe. Basically, "Jerry Shines in Beantown" was a means of blessing us with thier own special interest. Oh boy.

Art is everywhere, gentlemen. Just open your tunneled vision and pay te art around you it's due repect. You just might discover something NEW, and learn something you don't already know. And golly, you might just be able to put an article together that your readers can identify with rather than be alienated from. Besides) who cares about Jerry in Boston?

Paquette's Rose Garden

To the Editor:

The refusal of Mayor Paquette to debate his tax increase after tax increase record, reminds one of another vain autocrat, President Carter, who hid himself in a Rose Garden rather than debate his infamous inactions and policies.

The mayor's caterwauling, moaning claims of dire consequences are ridiculous; it is high time that His Majesty Paquette realizes that the tax burdens that he proposes are too expensive for the average property owners, more so the people are fed up with the ever-increasing costs of local government, are weary of the infinite fables as to why they have to spend and hire more.

Paquette's arrogance, disregard for the plight of the elderly, his Boss Hogg attitude demonstrate disdain for the rank and file. Otherwise, why is he refusing to debate his opponent, Bernard Sanders?

As many would treasure a photo of Mayor Paquette watering roses, the question arises Where is Mayor Paquette's Rose Garden???

COMMENTARY

Do We Get From SAGA What We Pay For?

By Reed Dewey

"Reed, see this pen? It's so awesomely overcooked I can't even shoot it at anybody!", muttered Dave over the background music of Harris-Millis dining hall. "Ya know Reed," Dave continued, "I get so mad every time I think about how ga ga Saga rips us off."

Many students at the University seem to have those food frustration blues. Other on-campus eaters who are required to purchase their plan in their housing contracts, are angry at having to pay $391 a semester for a food plan they don't even want. Do we get from Saga what we pay for?

The yearly meal plan costs UVM students a minimum of $782, of which half ($391) is used each term. The $391 Saga receives is instantly divided into two budget areas: food costs and operating costs (including labor, utilities, and china). When on-campus students eat at a dining hall, they pay half the marked price because they have already paid for operating expenses. Some students argue that they are taken advantage of because they say the average student doesn't eat $1.67 worth of food per meal at the unlimited seconds halls. Saga managers, however, budget their weekly food costs according to the amount of points they bring in per week. If Harris-Millis dining hall pulls in $3,500 worth of points in one week, the manager's goal is to put out (on the average) the same value of food. The aim is to balance the budget.

Couldn't Saga just cheapen the food quality by cutting corners to boost profits? I think it's more advantageous for Saga to serve good meals so that extra points are sold. Saga's profits are 6½ percent of the total amount of money spent for food and operating expenses. Therefore, an incentive is created for the company to sell as much food as possible. If the food isn't good, students aren't going to expend points for it. Don't forget — Validine points can be saved, or cashed in at marginal cost.

If Saga makes any more than 6½ percent profit, 70 percent of the excess goes to UVM while Saga collects 30 percent. Last year, Saga grossed about $250,000 in profits at UVM. $10,000 of that was made because of left over monies that exceeded the 6½ percent. A quarter million dollars profit seems fairly chunky, no matter how one looks at it. If Saga makes as much this year as it did last, each student will indirectly be paying over $60 for the company's profits this year.

Most students would probably agree that they should get a little more than just indigestion from their food service. After all, being a large food service gives Saga many advantages over smaller operations. 95 percent of all the food Saga uses comes from long-term contracts which often save considerable money. A national china contract for dish replacement saves UVM 45 percent of the regular retail price. Meats and canned goods also are largely discounted. These savings are passed directly to students, so Saga may actually not cost us anymore than if the University did the cooking.

Last year, Residential Life completed a survey of yearly board (food) rates among eighteen eastern colleges. Harvard students paid most, spending $1,440 per year while the University of Connecticut students were billed least at $748. UVM's old $827 coupon plan was 13th in cost, well in range of the other schools.

UVM's new meal plan may very well be in line with other schools' prices. But the key question lies in whether we get decent food or slop. It's important to realize the difference between how the food is prepared and what materials are used. I too would love prime rib on Mondays, but unfortunately there is not enough money in the budget unless we all wanted a $3,000 meal plan. Put in bread and margarine terms: you get what you pay for. College prepared food is one of the least expensive meals one can buy. What other restaurant charges $3.34 for all the food you can cram down your gullet? If the University ran its own food program, could it prepare better or worse institutional food given the same price?

Saga's Dick Kaufman, who helps head up the UVM operation, believes his company brings experienced managers to campus. Saga trains and helps its managers run the 1,500 school cafeterias throughout the country. Kaufman feels that because of the companies professionalism, quality control and services are kept high.

Hiring a food service also provides a natural incentive for Saga to maintain good food. If they don't satisfy our needs, UVM can easily fire this company. Last year, the food contract was renewed for the eighth consecutive time. Why do we continue to hire Saga, if we are dissatisfied with it?

UVM's food service could always be improved, but students definitely are not receiving a poor food value.

If students are upset about having to belong to the food plan, such criticisms should be brought to the University's attention, since they require all on-campus students to purchase it. Understanding Saga's role in the whole food program would help students knowledgably criticize areas where the company could improve.

Peace Through Non-Intervention

By Evans-Raymond Pierre

"Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations — entangling alliances with none." Thomas Jefferson

In 1978 over 20 percent of our military forces (494,000 troops) were stationed in more than 12 foreign nations. 330,000 of these troops were in Western Europe alone. In the same year the U.S. gave away nearly 6.5 billion dollars in economic assistance, and 2.3 billion in military assistance, to foreign governments. Since the end of World War II the U.S. has spent 170 billion dollars on "developing" nations, yet today these nations remain destitute and impoverished.

Not only have American politicians refused to heed Jefferson's warnings against "entangling alliances," but so have the American voters who have continually elected interventionist/expansionist/imperialist/colonialist politicians of the conservative and liberal yokes. The result of America's interventionist policies has resulted in involvement in foreign conflicts (WW I, WW II, Korea, Vietnam) that destroyed large percentages of the nation's male labor force and committed the U.S. to post-war alliances, which culminated in U.S. interference in other nations' economic, social, political, military and diplomatic affairs.

Many Americans erroneously believe the U.S. must either lend economic assistance to develop the Third World and protect Western Europe, Israel and other nations friendly to the U.S. in order to stem the communist tide, or protect American "interests" abroad, in other words, protect American corporations abroad. But all of these policies have resulted in increased American economic/military aid, interference in nations' political and economic affairs, and continued poverty among the world's poor.

Much of the U.S. economic/military aid goes to "developing" nations, most of which are ruled by corrupt dictators. Contrary to popular thought the economic aid received by these dictatorships does not benefit the people of those nations. Most of the U.S. dollars spent on Third World development projects are mismanaged or embezzled by government officials through non-existent contracts or in the form of kickbacks from contractors. In the end, the "masses" receive but a few trickles of the economic aid.

Revolutions almost always occur when standards of living, literacy and political freedom among the previously oppressed poor and working classes are on the rise. In order to avoid this prospect which would surely bring about their overthrow, dictators receiving American economic/military aid have a very strong incentive in keeping their populations poor, unemployed, illiterate, and politically repressed.

The American taxpayer must pay for his politicians' generosity towards other governments with higher taxes and government deficits which result in increased inflation. The beneficiaries of American economic and military aid are the American corporations, which profit from dictators' created poverty, unemployment and repression by paying native workers mere subsistence wages. The latter have little or no political power, unions are controlled by the governments or outlawed, strikes are illegal and political dissent is met with severe punishment. Corporations backed by American economic/military power thrive in this atmosphere of repression.

In the past when the American-sponsored dictatorships were overthrown and American property seized, the U.S. policy makers under pressure from corporate leaders plotted against the new regimes. The overthrow of the Iranian government in 1953 and the Chilean government in 1973 are only two examples of American policy makers' interference in the affairs of sovereign states in order to protect American "interests." American foreign policy has been guided by corporations and politicians bent on protecting American business interests in foreign nations no matter what the costs to the American taxpayers or the consequences to the peoples of those nations.

American corporations must do business abroad at their own risk and not depend on the U.S. for protection, at the same time the U.S. must cease subsidizing dictatorships, a nation with a tradition of freedom can not pursue a policy of repression abroad.

Contrary to popular belief the U.S. can not pretend to be the policeman of the world or the protector of the west. Western Europe, Israel, and other nations which in the past have depended on U.S. military power must learn to stand on their own.

Our "allies" in Western Europe, Japan and South Korea have the manpower, money and technology to properly defend themselves against the communist imperialists (USSR, Red China, Cuba, et al.), yet year after year they have refused to increase their military budgets in order to relieve the U.S. of the burden of providing for their defense. It is estimated that 60 percent of the U.S. military budget goes towards stationing troops abroad, providing for the more than 370,000 military dependents, and providing military assistance to foreign governments. The time has come for the burden of other nations' defense to be taken off the shoulders of the American soldier and the American taxpayer.

Although the Communist nations still dream of destroying the U.S., their dreams are slowly becoming nightmares as the state of their Socialist economies decline and their populations become more dissatisfied. In 1977 Eastern Europe's debt to the west was at approximately 62 billion dollars. In 1978 the U.S. extended more than 420 million dollars in economic assistance to the Marxist dictators. The U.S. must withdraw all economic assistance to the Marxists regimes and sit back and enjoy the demise of the Socialist paradises.

The Israel lobby in Washington has influenced U.S. policy in the Middle East and especially vis-a-vis Israel, a nation with an inflation rate of 132 percent. In 1978 Israel received over one billion dollars in economic assistance and one billion dollars in military assistance. Israel must be left alone to solve her diplomatic problems with her neighbors without relying on the U.S. to subsidize its defense or its economy. Israel is living in a dream world, the time has come for her to wake up and recognize that she must deal with the Palestinian people and her Arab neighbors.

With no import/export quotas, and no tariffs, et cetera, the U.S. would be able to meet its needs of raw materials, especially oil.

The American taxpayer can no longer afford government adventurism in the world. The U.S. could reduce its military budget by almost half (40 billion) and still afford to build the MX missile, the Trident submarine, and the B-1 bomber. The U.S. must withdraw from all its alliances and commitments, the United Nations, and other international bodies and still live in a peaceful world. This does not mean isolation. The U.S. must maintain cordial relations with all nations. At the same time, it must make it clear to all that it will bow to no nation under any circumstances. Nations must learn to stand or fall on their own.

Peace through strength, mutual respect, and non-intervention (economic or military) in other nations' affairs must be our policy in this rapidly changing world.

It's Make Or Break For The Comm Department

Steering Committee member Jim Blouin

By Jonathan Goodspeed

Dean of Arts and Sciences John Jewett, on February 11, issued a memorandum to members of the Faculty of the Department of Communication, announcing the Administration's decision to suspend the admission of majors into the Communications department.

The Administration's decision was revealed to the public last Wednesday. Communication majors and concerned students, many of whom were unaware that the Administration was even contemplating such a measure, met Monday night and formed the Communication Students Steering Committee. This committee, which formally represents the Communication students and majors, pledged non-support of Jewett's decision because they feel it is a threat to the future of the Communications program at UVM.

Arts and Sciences Dean John Jewett

The decision was made as a result of a three-year study concerning the quality of education in the department. Jewett said the Administration will not hire additional full-time senior faculty members, but will bring in visiting professors for semester teaching periods. He said a formal review of the department is now being conducted to see if instruction can be improved. There is a possibility the Communications department could be closed, except for certain courses, if the quality is not raised.

Jewett said three fundamental problems led the administration to take this measure: The "unacceptably low" quality of the program, the "lack of effective support" by the Communications faculty for appointed departmental leaders, and the "extremely thin" recruitment pools for the vacant faculty positions in the department. Most of the applicants do not have the necessary qualifications for the upper level positions offered, according to Jewett.

According to Jewett, the quality of the program has been the focus of many studies, dating back to 1971. Communications' faculty members reviewed the entire department in 1971, and found several problems. A second full review of the department in 1975 found the Communications' graduate program to be "unstructured and incohesive." This eventually led to the suspension of admissions to the Communications' graduate program in 1978.

In 1977, an "outside" review team was brought in to the University at the request of the Administration. The Physics, Psychology, Theater, Classics, Geology, and Communications departments were evaluated in terms of their over-all effectiveness. Members of the review team that evaluated the Communications department were professionals from the three fields of Rhetoric, Mass Communication, and Communications.

> ...it is a negative approach to solving a crisis in which we believe there can be positive solutions.

In 1978, another study was conducted by Chairman Dharam Yadav, and an external review team.

Jewett's charge of non-support surfaced after recent efforts to restructure the Communication department's curriculum. Yadav and the review team, in 1978, proposed the need for ten senior faculty members. At that time there were eight filled faculty positions. Jewett said he "did not have the resources to fill another two positions." He did eventually, however, hire one more faculty member.

Five of these faculty members are tenured. They are Dean Manchell, Professors William Lewis and Norman London, and Associate Professors John Worden and Dharam Yadav. Manchell has been inactive in the department for several years, so the revitalization process was left to the remaining four.

In an interview Tuesday morning, Jewett said "the department has had two to three years to put something together. Nothing has been done. Yadav has had most of the weight put on his shoulders."

London recently accepted a post at the Canadian Embassy in Washington, and Worden received a Fulbright Scholarship, and as a result spent the fall term in India.

As a means to make the department tighter and more supportive, and to fill empty faculty positions, in the fall of 1978, applications from the recruitment pool were examined by the faculty of the Communications department and by Manchell. Sixty applications were examined. "It was a very poor pool," Jewett said. No new full time faculty members were hired.

Chris McClure, a lecturer in the Communications department, said Monday night at the student meeting the "salary level offered to these applicants is very low."

As the present situation stands, Jewett said the Administration has a number of options to follow. He could "fill all tenure positions now, and hope the situation resolves itself." Or "I could terminate the entire program, and find positions for the already existing tenured members, and Communications classes could be switched to an associated department." But the course of action he is taking, as he said to students at the Tuesday Student-Administration meeting, will pave a middle ground between those two extremes.

"My first concern," said Jewett, "is to deliver a high quality of education to those majors currently enrolled." To carry this out, the Administration plans the following: (1) Keep the already existing tenured faculty members, and hire no additional members. Jewett said he "does not want to commit funds (salaries for new permanent faculty) to a program which is lacking in quality." (2) Recruit established communication professors, as visiting senior professors, for semester length periods to teach upper level courses. (3) No junior faculty members will be hired, for "there are insufficient funds to hire both junior and senior faculty members," said Jewett.

The students involved feel threatened by the Administration's course of action. They believe it is "a negative approach to solving a crisis in which we believe there can be positive solutions." At the Student-Administration meeting Tuesday, students said they believe there could be three adverse effects to the Administration's actions: (1) This action could jeopardize the credibility of current communication students and graduates for competitive positions in the job market. (2) This action could result in the neglect of perceived commitments to future students, in-state as well as out-of-state, who will attend this university. (3) This action could become a catalyst for dispersal and/or termination of communication interests at the University.

They explained it is not the suspension of admissions to the program that they are primarily concerned with. It is the result of what this could mean to communications at the University in the future.

Cover Story

Jewett says the Communications department is currently under review, according to the Administration's document "Review of Proposals to Initiate, Alter, or Terminate Academic Programs and Organizational Units." As part of the first stage of the document, Jewett has asked all departmental faculty members for written advice on possible options concerning the future status of the department. "All options will be studied... and eventually a decision will be made by the Board of Trustees," said Jewett.

If no solution is found, the department could be closed. If this occurs, it is policy that all tenured members will remain at the university. Because 13 departments (Nursing, Plant and Soil Science, Wildlife Biology...) require Communication 11 and several require Communication 14, these two courses will still be taught.

"The debate program will also remain," said Jewett. There is a $750,000 endowed chair, provided by the Irwin Lawrence Fund, which applies specifically to the debate program. It can not be terminated.

Jewett said at the meeting Tuesday that Manchell has been appointed Chairman of the Communications department. The Student Steering Committee will be meeting with Manchell and the Arts and Sciences Deans often to discuss the future of the Communications department.

"...Free To Speak"

PROFile

Interviewed
By Wendy Goodrich

"The reason I'm relatively free to speak on issues is first of all I have tenure – thank god! Secondly, I have a working wife so salary punishments aren't going to affect me. Finally, I don't want any inside power; I serve on no committees, no nothing, and I have made it quite clear to the University that I have no intention of serving on anything. This has given me a great deal of freedom. I can flale, I can zig people, with relative impunity.

"I also have a relative amount of freedom because I have been able to establish links to people in the mass media. This has given me an outside perspective on the University, it has given me some satisfaction, and it has given me an opportunity to be a teacher outside UVM. I sincerely believe that a professor's responsibility is to educate the entire community as well as the students in his/her classroom. That is what publication is all about."

Professor Nelson spent the fall semester down in Washington D.C. concluding some research for his publication due to come off the press sometime in late May – early June.

"The project I've been involved with over the past four years is a compilation of the committee assignments of the United States Congress. We have put together an interesting data set numbering 160+ thousand individual records on committee assignments with 27 variables on each assignment. These variables include information on a Senator or Congressman's political career, the date of committee assignment, the assignment's location within his political career, and the date of termination. We also have the reasons why each member left each assignment. Altogether we are talking about over four million pieces of information.

"The most fascinating aspect of the project has been the way members of Congress today have made use of the material. The committees have been very cooperative, and they are pleased that 'at last' someone has put together this information in a usable form.

"The project has received some curious requests. The House Ways and Means Committee needed to check if the majority party ever had a seat advantage of 10 percent or higher on the committee than in the House itself. After doing the research I found that there was never a precedent set of that size – but there is now. On January 28, 1981 they voted themselves the advantage. Other unique historical instances were also discovered throughout the research. There was a committee that served for only two days, a member that quit a committee assignment after only one day on that committee, and, in the most recent Congress, a Senator became Chairman of a Committee without ever having served on the committee.

"The publication plans of the project have been going along well. Volume I covers from 1947 to date and it is due out in late May–early June. There are also three historical volumes that cover 1789-1947 which will be published in 1982. All four volumes are divided into a computerized output covering all committee assignments, and a narrative portion. Altogether, the project will run some 5000 pages and occupy a substantial chunk of shelf space. The computerized output of the research will be available to over 200 universities in the U.S. and Europe, thanks to the University of Michigan.

"What's been most gratifying about the project is that the bulk of the research was done on the UVM campus. I think this indicates that UVM has a number of internal resources that make it possible for large scale national level research to be done. The project has been successful due in large part to the library and computer center, but also because I've had a dozen or so undergraduates who've worked closely with me learning how to get the material ready for production. I feel this proves that the students here, when interested, can produce fine work.

"I often like to characterize the student body at UVM as bright, lazy, and honest. Because they are bright, they are very capable; because they are lazy, it's a challenge to get them to work up to their full potential; but because they're honest, they will tell you, directly, whether or not they are willing to make the effort. Students at UVM will do the work if they feel the subject is interesting, there is not a lot of brown-nosing at UVM compared to other schools.

"This is one of the most satisfying elements of being a teacher here. You can get the students to move up a notch in regards to their intellectual development and their energy level if you push the right buttons. The level of work one can expect from the students here, once motivated, is comparable to that of an elite institution.

"There is an intriguing phenomenon that occurs between native Vermonters and out-of-state students. During the freshman year, because out-of-staters come from high schools that have prepared them fairly well for college, they develop coasting study habits because they aren't pushed. But the native Vermont student comes from high schools that haven't prepared him as well, thus he must work hard at developing good study habits. By the junior year, the native Vermonter begins to catch up with the out-of-stater, and begins to excel by the senior year. I am always struck by the number of native Vermonters that make Phi Beta Kappa.

"Unfortunately it is this aspect of UVM that is most threatened by the coming economic crunch. The native Vermonter will become a victim because he comes from a state with a low per capita income, and a high cost of living, thus they don't have the multitude of choices available to them that the out-of-staters possess. If the Reagan administration decides to cut back on student loans, then we may be closing the door on the intellectually capable but poorly funded native Vermonter. Yet because of its enormous appeal to out-of-state students, UVM will survive and unfortunately may become the University in Vermont rather than the University of Vermont.

"The administration is very short-sighted about this. It does not communicate the real plight of UVM. The stifling bureaucracy over at Waterman has also grown short-sighted concerning the faculty. This is very demoralizing to professors here, and as a result, the faculty has become almost schzoid. Half of the week they are high, they feel good about what they are doing, and, in many cases, over-estimate themselves. The other half of the week they are asking themselves 'what am I doing here?', and are generally underestimating themselves. Because UVM is removed, faculty members don't get an idea of where they fit on a national scale. This also produces low morale, and demoralization results in political passivity.

"It is a serious mistake for the administration to believe that silence means satisfaction. There is a need for the University to show concern for what professors are doing. One option open to the faculty is unionization. So far this has been a relatively small movement located in departments that have historically been short-changed.

"I have found that maintaining a foot outside the University has proved invaluable in protecting me against the early burnout that so many of my colleagues experience. My advice to other professors is for those who have marketable skills to sell them. In this way, the inside problems at UVM seem far less infuriating. For those that don't have marketable skills, the option would be, as I said before, unionization. It is important not to let the University be the sum total of your Universe.

"Unfortunately, – however, faculty members are lured into compliance with the University by the promise of 'inside power' to get an 'inside title.' The problem with 'inside titles' is that the people who give you the power can take it away. For faculty who want 'inside power,' their effectiveness as spokespeople is limited, and their perception of the University is clouded by their realization that this 'inside power' can evaporate.

"To avoid this problem, one must first get a solid hold on their profession and keep a foot outside the University. Also, like any other bureaucracy, learning who the key staff members are – the ones who really do the work – is essential. Most important, do not be bought off with inside rewards. Try not to be co-opted, then the administration will have to treat you as a peer and not as a subordinate.

"For faculty members who are fearful that this is the only life they could live – as a college professor – demoralization is inevitable. This is going to impact upon the quality of education not only here at UVM, but across the United States, as the role of the college professor becomes increasingly difficult to maintain in 20th century America."

"PROFile" is a column designed to give UVM professors a forum for discussion of their current research, the University administration, student body and faculty, or any other subject they wish to express their views on.

Ticker-Tapes Didn't Fly

When Vietnam Vets Came Home

By Carol Hills

No ticker-tape parades greeted Vietnam veterans when they returned to the United States in the early 1970's, and some local Vietnam veterans say the unprecedented welcome given the former hostages emphasizes the problems facing veterans of that war.

"There is definitely some feeling of resentment because of the way we were treated. The Vietnam veterans' sacrifice appears insignificant in view of the way the hostages were treated," commented Jim Howley, a Vietnam combat veteran and an active member of the Vietnam Veterans of America. He expressed concern over the lack of attention given the servicemen who died in the abortive rescue attempt in Iran.

"I would challenge anyone on the street to name any of the eight servicemen who gave their lives trying to save the 52 hostages," said the Director of the Vietnam Veterans Center in Williston, navy veteran Jason Conway. "The president referred to them as 'heroes' and it's been ten years since we've been home and there has been no recognition for us. No one ever said 'good job' to us. It just dramatizes how little Vietnam vets got compared with the 52."

A bill designed to create outreach centers distinct from the Veteran's Administration and staffed with veterans won Congressional approval in 1979. The Williston Vietnam Veterans Center opened shortly thereafter on January 1, 1980. In addition to providing an important social atmosphere, the center offers counseling in areas ranging from alcohol, drug, adjustment, and marital problems to Veteran's Benefits, education and employment. The Center also functions as a referral service to hospitals and local community organizations and maintains working relationships with the Disabled American Veterans, PAVE, the VFW, and Howard Mental Health.

According to Conway, the number one problem for Vietnam veterans concerns jobs. Many veterans in their mid to late thirties have found competition with younger candidates in a dwindling job market difficult. For some, the period of adjustment has taken several years and only now are they learning of the benefits and opportunities available to them. A mistrust of anything government-related prevented many from utilizing their Veteran's Benefits. New outreach centers like the one in Williston are helping to alleviate the problem.

Conway explained that unlike World War II and Korean veterans who returned home in groups, the veterans of the Vietnam War returned to the United States individually, and thus suffered a sense of isolation. "It was an individual war. You lived as best you could, day to day," he said.

In 1945, a G.I.'s educational benefits included tuition, books, room and board, and a monthly stipend of $54. In contrast, a Vietnam Veteran returning home in 1968 received only a monthly stipend of $130 with no additional funding to cover the other expenses.

> "I would challenge anyone on the street to name any of the eight servicemen who gave their lives trying to save the 52 hostages." - Conway

The monthly stipend effective January 1, 1981 for a single person with no dependents is $345. This amount has been criticized as inadequate by many veterans, who charge that it forces them to attend schools according to cost, not quality of the program. Of the more than 23,000 Vietnam Veterans living in Vermont, only 470 are presently enrolled in two and four year colleges.

Washington, D.C. area veterans held a demonstration at the White House February 16th, Washington's Birthday, to present the Reagan Administration with a list of demands. Recent federal budget cuts have resulted in a funding crisis that threatens the feasibility of groups like the Veteran's outreach centers. The Vietnam vets are responding by making themselves and their needs visible.

Vietnam Veterans groups nationwide have designated March 8 as National Vietnam Veterans and Supporters Green Ribbon Unity Day. Local groups have been asked to attend a national press conference, and the Center in Williston has planned a demonstration in front of the Federal Building in Burlington.

"Continuation Of Hunger Inevitable"

By Maggie Hayes

The major obstacle to ending world hunger is a political and economic system "that just doesn't want to feed the common people," UVM Plant and Soil Science Professor Frederick Magdoff said Wednesday.

Presiding over a discussion forum in Memorial Lounge as part of "Hunger Week," Feb. 9-14, Magdoff also told the group that people misunderstand the reasons for the existence of worldwide famine.

Distribution of food is the major problem in Third World countries, Magdoff explained. There is enough food, he said, but it either falls into the hands of the wealthy or is exported to obtain a greater profit. Overproduction, waste, and spoiled food exists in many areas because most Third World inhabitants cannot afford to purchase the food.

The continuation of hunger is inevitable, he concluded, because "the structure of society that is firmly rooted in a capitalist system protects the wealthy people... and food exporting helps to maintain an aspect of that structure."

Most people think that overpopulation is the cause of famine, Magdoff said. But they are mistaken. He explained that many countries with relatively small populations, such as those in Latin America, still suffer from hunger and malnutrition. This is because the land is used to grow crops for animals, not humans. The trends of agriculture are decided by profit, Magdoff said, "where the patterns of production are determined by what is profitable for the corporation."

Magdoff used El Salvador as an example of a country where large land owners squeezed out the small food-production farmer in order to increase profitable cotton yields. In addition, Mexico stopped growing their main human food sources — corn and beans — and switched to an increase in soybean and alfalfa. These new crops are used for feeding beef cattle in the U.S. which means that the most productive land in Mexico is being used to grow food for us, Magdoff said.

The Soils professor added that the "Green Revolution," a long standing international attempt to give advanced agricultural technology to less developed nations, is not solving Third World hunger problems.

"The benefits from the Green Revolution have not gotten to the people who need them," because the poor people cannot get credit to buy the new seed varieties. The program is really "a new negative for the hungry," Magdoff said. When seeds finally become available, there is no extension service that could offer education on methods of caring for the advanced hybrids. The "educated wealthy are again the only beneficiaries."

Because the political and economic structure only helps the wealthy, the removal of U.S. involvement in Third World allow Third World nations to deal with their own problems, free from international politics, he said.

A system is needed to feed the people, "but this is going against the basic right and power of the wealthy segment of society. This system upheaval can only be done through revolution," he said.

Hunger Week

The Forest Connection

By Maggie Hayes

Dr. Carl Reidel, Director of UVM's Environmental Program, said Monday that present economic and political issues are promoting the global hunger situation, but that the impacts of deforestation, erosion, energy consumption, and abusive agricultural methods are even greater threats to food production world-wide.

"Even a doubling of food production would not change the status of the hungry and malnourished, because the food would not reach the poor," he told the audience in Memorial Lounge.

A featured speaker of "Hunger Week," Reidel used information from the Global 2000 Report to illustrate his points. That report, prepared by the President's Committee on Environmental Quality, says there will be a population increase of 50 percent and a 90 percent food production increase. However, with doubling food prices, declining per capita income, and the use of one-third of the world's grain for livestock feed, the hunger problem will only be worsened.

Reidel stressed the need for a "global perspective from the environmental approach to understand the complexity and unlikely connections involved in the hunger crisis."

The "forest connection" is the root of mass starvation, he said. According to the Global 2000 Report, the loss of world forests in the next 20 years will be tremendous, resulting in serious effects on food production. The report estimates that 40 percent of the remaining forest cover in the less developed nations will virtually disappear. Reidel explained that 90 percent of the less developed countries' wood consumption is used for cooking and heating. "Thus, a greater proportion of income and time will be spent collecting scarce wood rather than growing a food crop."

Reidel, a former President of the Society of American Foresters, added that the deforestation of the land will lead to soil erosion and a "serious de-stabilization of water supplies." The lack of trees will result in the loss of necessary soil nutrients, irrigation problems, and increased flooding, he said.

"Increasing use of fossil fuel also has a major impact on the agricultural problem," Reidel added. Sulfur and nitrogen oxides from coal burning produces harmful acid rain which has serious impacts on lakes, forests, soils and crops. There has been a 15 percent increase in carbon dioxide (CO^2) concentrations in the last century. Reidel estimated that there could be a 50 percent increase before 2050 due to deforestation and increased fossil fuel use.

Rising CO^2 concentrations from such burning can result in the "greenhouse effect." The greenhouse effect can lead to an increase or decrease in atmospheric temperatures, causing global climate change. "Major global climate shifts with changes in food production patterns will mean a disastrous hunger situation for Third World areas," he concluded.

Reidel also explained the "genetic connection," involving the loss of fruits, nuts, predators, subspecies, and cereal grains from the food production cycle. He told the group that Global 2000 projects that 20 percent of all plant and animal species could be extinguished by 2000 due to destruction of wild habitats caused by deforestation and pollution.

From studying this information, Reidel concluded that "we must learn to discover the unlikely inter-connections between the environment and the hunger situation." He explained that deforestation causes soil erosion, crop damage, flooding, climate changes, and species extinction, which in turn decrease food production and cause famine. "Forests, energy, air, plants, soils, and genetic changes all affect our biological potentials for meeting the hunger problem," Reidel explained.

Even though the faulty economic and political systems are worsening the food problem, Reidel said that we must enlarge these concerns to properly consider our energy consumption, land use, and agricultural and industrial pollutants.

He concluded that only through this "global outlook," connecting both issues of the political and environmental realm, can a positive solution result.

The Age Of Designer Genes

By Alfred Terry

Director of the Kennedy Institute on Ethics, Robert McCormick, warned Thursday at Trinity College about the dangers of combining the "consumer mentality" with the latest of man's technological breakthroughs in artificial childbirth.

The internationally known Catholic theologian cautioned about the social repercussions of the potential widespread use of artificial insemination, invitro fertilization, and cloning. He asked the audience to consider whether these new technological circumstances "do in fact promote life and the basic value of marriage around which we have established political and social protection."

McCormick said artificial means, what he called "reproductive intervention," might eventually replace the natural processes. The reverend noted that artificial insemination replaces intercourse, in vitro fertilization replaces tubal fertilization, and cloning replaces the partner.

During a lighter moment in the address, the reverend said he felt that "the 'urge to merge' would not disappear."

McCormick said that there is a "basic inseparability" between the unifying nature of love and procreation. But because "sexual intimacy is not the only act of love," the reverend said, "the mere artificiality in the reproductive process is not enough to condemn artificial means."

McCormick fears that just as man is able to "depersonalize death" with powerful machines that prolong life sometimes unnecessarily, man will also "depersonalize birth" with ever sophisticated childbearing technologies. In order to "contain these new techniques within marriage," the reverend proposed a guideline for offering artificial designs for couples: (1) the gametes should be only the husband and wife's; (2) the zygote loss be roughly the same as naturally occur; (3) the dangers to the child be no more than during an average pregnancy; and (4) the couple should not abort if the child is 'defective.'

The last criteria is designed to insure that risk remains a factor of the consideration, he explained. Concerning the notion of risk, McCormick said "we are surrounded by the mentality that we have 'the right to a healthy child'." He called that attitude "disastrous."

"We can see deformed children suing parents for not having aborted," he said.

Later in the address, McCormick characterized America as "schizophrenic" in its medical policies. He noted that five million babies are aborted every year, yet there is an ambitious development of artificial fertilization.

"The priorities of medicine have to be restated. What's really going on is a development of a sophisticated form of medicine whereby a doctor is asked to treat the desires of people... and to provide them with 'Heaven on Earth.' Eventually it develops into a consumer mentality towards the child. A mother will come in and say, 'Give me blue eyes this time'."

McCormick concluded that "treatment was moving away from the body and towards that of personal desires."

In a final note, the reverend said, "We must do something before the fun has gone out of it all."

Vietnam Vets

Burlington College offers a course entitled "Back in the World: Vietnam in Retrospect," taught by Louis M. Colasanti, a veteran of Vietnam. Aimed at developing an awareness of the motives and circumstances peculiar to our involvement in Vietnam, the course consists primarily of discussion using related texts such as Frances Fitzgerald's Fire in the Lake and Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness as references. Last semester's class was comprised largely of Vietnam vets.

Dave McPeak, a group counselor at the Pittsburgh Vet Center, recently issued a letter addressing common misconceptions regarding Vietnam veterans. Two-thirds of the men and women who served in Vietnam volunteered for duty and were not, as is commonly believed, drafted. Worth noting as well is the fact that more civilians were killed in the four years of the Korean War than during the eight years of the Vietnam War.

The recent conviction of Robert Garwood on charges of collaborating with the enemy during his 14 years as a prisoner of the North Vietnamese has brought mixed reactions. "It's a touchy issue. He can be compared with Calley, a scapegoat for collaboration. The only enemy in Vietnam were the Americans. The government owes Garwood $147,000, tax-free. They are going to find him guilty of something," said Howley. "Garwood was obviously insane while in Vietnam, but that doesn't make him any less sane than those who didn't collaborate or those in combat role. You can't be sane and play war."

Mention of the possible reinstatement of the draft brought a timely response by Howley: "If it is necessary to protect and defend the country, fine. But if we then continue to support countries like South Korea and El Salvador, then I disagree." Howley said that the defense of the country should be the responsibility of all men and women above a certain age, but that the age of eligibility should be raised. "I don't think it's fair to destroy our future."

Howley and Conway say they are encouraged by the increasing public awareness of the plight of Vietnam veterans. As Howley put it, "The people of the United States must learn to see the Vietnam vet as an asset, not a liability. In spite of it all, we're still here and we're still loyal to the country."

Holistic Health: From Chiropractic to the Cosmos

By Grove Potter

Holistic health care, or holism, approaches health problems from the standpoint that each individual has a variety of fundamental properties, physiological, psychological, emotional, intellectual, and spiritual, that must be considered when treating an ailment. According to this approach, illness can very often be caused by upsets in the intricate balance of these properties. Holistic techniques for treating a person vary to some extent, but certain common principles apply to all therapies.

Dr. Craig Barcomb of Burlington, a chiropractor, combines manipulative procedures, acupuncture, and vitamin therapy in what he terms a "conservative approach" to holistic medicine. Pathways to Well Being, an holistic health center, employs a staff of nine health specialists, including two MD's. Pathways utilizes rolfing, rebirth, meditation, transpersonal psychotherapy, t'ai chi, past lives experience, flower essence therapy and other unconventional health practices to help regain the innate balance of human forces.

Organized like a standard medical doctor's office, Dr. Barcomb's practice leans toward modern medicine rather than the total holistic philosophy. A modern office with the latest chiropractic devices, including two manipulative chairs and a postural orthopedic x-ray unit, gives the office a scientific atmosphere.

"This practice focuses mainly on pain and the alleviation of it," Dr. Barcomb said. Instead of just prescribing a pain killer for a leg pain (siatic neuralagia if it is caused by pressure on the nerves), for example, a chiropractor seeks to relieve the pain by removing pressure on the nerve by manipulation of the spine. Chiropractors believe that many of our common physical problems arise from non-alignments of the spinal column that put pressure on the nerves within.

Chiropractic was "discovered" in 1895 by Daniel David Palmer in Davenport, Iowa, when he corrected a neighbor's deafness by manipulating his spine. Palmer and his son, B.J., advanced chiropractic by establishing colleges to teach it.

Chiropractors have waged a constant battle for acceptance the medical profession since its beginning, and recently they have made progress. Chiropractic care is now covered by Medicare and Medicaid, and chiropractors are fighting for inclusion in a national health insurance program; if that led zepplin ever lifts off.

Dr. Barcomb follows the philosophy of "chiropractic first, drugs second, and surgery last." He says consultation is a primary ingredient in his treatments because he seeks to understand the causes of physical problems in order to treat them effectively. Barcomb noted that most of his patients come to him with back problems, but he often discovers other illnesses incidentally. If he comes across a problem he feels he can not properly treat, Dr. Barcomb refers his patients to medical doctors.

Pathways Staff

Chiropractors have not enjoyed good publicity in their history. Stories of poor treatment, too much use of the x-ray, and chiropractors over-extending themselves are common. Yet, with the increased focus on preventative medicine and the rise of holistic medicine today, chiropractors may be filling a needed spot in the medical network, that of a corrective option before surgery is needed.

Julie McLane, founder of Pathways to Well Being, said that many of their clients come to them after trying the regular medical model. Pathways puts more emphasis on intellectual insight into the total confluence of forces that combine to make a person sick, she noted. Using various disciplines that emphasize the individual taking responsibility for his own health, Pathways seeks to treat the entire person as an integral piece of his environment and the cosmos.

"We do not just pass out prescriptions here," June Aschenbach, a registered nurse, said. Noting the great progress in dealing with illness and disease modern medicine has made, Ms. Aschenbach added that medicine's traditions force it to ignore the individual's powers, the powers of nature, and the universal life force in the healing process. "We (Pathways) are at the interface between advances in western medicine and traditional teachings."

Michael Watson, a psychotherapist, noted that Pathways tries to present more harmonious and satisfying approaches to living. "It seems to me that today we all want to live forever, but in doing everything we can to live, we lose sight of the quality of life," he said. "Holism is a quest, and it has all the pitfalls of a quest." Taking responsibility for one's self is "awesome," but the benefits of increased awareness are great, he noted.

Charles Gilbert, a certified rolfer and elder statesman of the staff, placed holism in historical context. "Holism is an extension of what we already know... It's part of the revolution this generation has made in its approach to health, food, music, sex. It's a new, honest look," he said.

Dr. Steve Proskaver, a child psychiatrist, said that Pathways relies on functions of both the left and right sides of the brain in treatments. Discussing problems is a right brain function while the use of imagery (drawing), music, body awareness, movement, massage techniques are left brain functions. Meditation is a technique involving both sides of the brain, he said.

When Pathways refers patients to other specialists, Dr. Diane Pierson acts as a liaison to medical scientists when collaboration on a client's problem is necessary.

Ms. Aschenbach said that many of Pathway's clients are "not sick. They are perfectly well and working toward a greater sense of wellness," she said.

Some medical doctors feel that the holistic approach to health care is not based on the scientific method, and therefore lacks solid evidence on which to build. But proponents of the therapy argue that modern medicine treats only symptoms, without determining the root of medical disorders.

Holism, they maintain, seeks to understand the causes of medical problems and then moves to eradicate them. By removing the irritating factors from a sufferer or his lifestyle, the malady will not return in another form.

Security Seeks New Rapport With Students

By Jim Newman

I came back from downtown after a Saturday night of libation and relaxation, and pulled into the campus driveway. I gunned the accelerator, the car swung to the right, and then to the left. All the while, I countered the slide, impressed with my prowess behind the wheel. I passed by the parking lot, continuing to spin and slide. All of a sudden, seemingly from nowhere, a little white car with blue flashing lights appeared, and followed close behind me.

Ten minutes later I received a twenty-five dollar fine.

Now that I look back on the incident, I believe I could have avoided the fine if I had taken a different approach toward the situation. John Borthwick of UVM Security says, "No one enjoys giving a twenty-five dollar fine. That much money hurts anyone." A condescending attitude toward the officer exemplifies the root of a problem which exists in the relationship between student and security officer.

Mr. Borthwick, who has been with UVM for four years, defines the optimal interaction between students and security officers "as a two-way street, in which the officers realize that they are dealing with a select group of individuals in a certain age bracket, but the students must realize that the security officer is a professional and desires to be treated as such." He stresses that the officers working for the department are "only human," and attempt to perform their job in as professional a manner as possible. What Mr. Borthwick means by treating them as a professional is not a "One-Adam Twelve approach of yes sir and no sir" but that one attempt to establish a decent atmosphere under which both the student and the officer can communicate.

Mr. Borthwick claims that "most students do not know what the system is all about, and that can be bad." Most students perceive that UVM Security is a reactive-oriented unit, much like city police departments, which respond to troublesome situations, he said. This type of policy was typical of earlier security departments, but the present system is a more service-oriented organization. Borthwick defines the major responsibility of UVM Security is to prevent damage to University property, prevent any type of dangerous situation from occurring, and to ensure the safety of the students. As Mr. Borthwick puts it, "We are not out to get the students, but we want to help avoid the creation of safety hazards."

Mr. Borthwick said there has been a vast improvement in the present service-oriented

A Weight Watcher's Story

Over Zealous Dieters Beware

By S.K.

The problem I would like to share with you has to do with a plan I undertook to lose weight shortly after entering college.

Meal after meal of starchy cafeteria food, weekend partying, late night popcorn and pizza, etc. forced the scale needle up to what I thought of as an undesirable number (130 pounds). Shortly after Christmas break, panic struck when I was shown an unflattering picture of me. Results were needed immediately to correct this unsightly problem. (Now I admit I was not obese; I was just heavier than I ever had been.) That unbecoming picture froze in my mind for the next two and a half years, and it led me to endanger my physical and mental health. Disregarding baggy pants, smaller sizes, and steady weight loss which resulted from stringent dieting coupled with rigorous exercising, I refused to believe I wasn't fat.

graphic by Caroline Arlen

When I reflect on my sophomore and junior years of college, my thoughts are not too pleasant. My memories are of the nervousness and the compulsiveness with which I avoided food. What started as an abstractly defined goal to lose weight, transformed into an obsession.

My plan of attack began innocently enough by foregoing between meal snacks and high caloric foods. It wasn't long before I became a calorie expert, gauging how much I ate solely by the numbers of calories the food had. I could recite which lo-cal salad dressings and boullions had the fewest calories, and which diet sodas were no-cal sodas. Typical meals consisted of broth, lettuce with little or no dressing, and the lowest calorie drink available. The number of calories I injested all day was often less than the number many people consume at one sitting.

Every pound I lost made me all the more determined to control my weight and to attain a fashionable figure that I could be proud of. As my weight decreased, I felt a new sense of power over my body and over my life. It seemed that if I could control my appetite, I could grab a handle over other aspects of my life. Every tightened belt hole made me feel a bit more successful than my friends, many of whom gained the weight I lost. In order not to lose this sensation of supremacy, I vowed not to let the lost pounds reappear. I forced myself to believe I needed to remain on a stringent diet. Eating was like a game. If I ate a whole grapefruit one day (which was frequently dinner), I tried to cut down to half a grapefruit the following day. I felt defeated and depressed if the strategy failed.

I was a prisoner of my overweight body image and I refused to believe that I was becoming too thin, despite others' comments and despite the reflection in the mirror. Regardless of these hints, I believed there was no harm in losing another pound.

> I was incapable of seeing how my appearance had changed after rapidly losing twenty pounds through an unbalanced, unhealthy approach.

Being so absorbed with the static image I had of my body, I failed to analyze my changing (and shrinking) shape. The perception I possessed of my body was severely inaccurate and I was incapable of seeing how my appearance had changed after rapidly losing twenty pounds through an unbalanced, unhealthy approach.

I was at school, so visits with my parents were infrequent. But, when we did meet the encounters were quite challenging. They expressed concern about my quick weight loss and the last thing I wanted was for them to intervene and hamper my goal of having a svelte figure. I didn't let them know how little I ate. I recited false menus of what I ate, just to please them and let them think I was all right. Sometimes, when they were in another room, I made noise in the kitchen by rattling pots and opening the refrigerator to create the impression I was preparing to eat. We fought at the table when they insisted that I take and eat a decent-sized portion. A triumphant feeling reigned in me when I convinced them that I was full and was therefore allowed to leave the table without finishing my meal.

There were moments when I doubted what I was doing. My hair fell out much more than normal due to insufficient protein intake. My skin was dry and my nails were brittle. Depression set in after I indulged in fattening foods or between meal snacks. After I ate "too much," I punished myself by increasing my exercise routine; more situps and extra laps around the track. The passionate pursuit of thinness justified it all.

Gradually, I began to feel that my friends were acting differently towards me and I was puzzled as to why. That I seemed to disappear or was busy at the mere mention of parties, get togethers at favorite bars and restaurants, and the like never occurred to me. I associated social activities with food and drink, and excess calories were taboo. Rather than go out and be pressed into trying just one bite of Sheila's cheesecake or have one drink in honor of Leslie's birthday, I declined the invitations. Within a short time my friends labeled me as a loner and stopped inviting me to join them. Other than being a social recluse (which did wonders for me academically), I felt like the same person and thus was hurt deeply by my friends' lack of attention towards me. Or, was I really the person who I thought I was?

A few months ago I saw another picture of myself which was equally unflattering. Things weren't right. I wasn't gorgeous. My rigorous dieting didn't produce a slim, stylish silhouette as anticipated. My neck looked like a plucked chicken's. My pants hung limply around my legs. Dark raccoon-like circles surrounded my eyes.

Unfortunately, it was impossible to deny that this was my body; my head was attached to it. I stood in front of a full-length mirror and stared long and hard to make myself realize that just because Vogue's models were pencil thin and had only faint hints of curves, this didn't mean I was a failure if I didn't possess these same qualities. No, my figure was not comparable to a model's, nor would it be with the ghastly shape I possessed (rather, the lack of shape I had).

At this point I stopped associating the scale numbers with whether I was "good" or "bad," a "success" or a "failure." Instead I looked at the numbers as only digits. With this attitude a two-pound gain wasn't a depressing trauma. Despite the feeling of relenting control, I forced myself to eat more wisely.

The picture I saw a few months ago led me to observe and re-index my self perception, and thus stop clinging to my frozen self-image of yesterday. Presently I'm trying to attain an

The Energy Intensive Friction Burn

By Christopher Bray

The technique itself is simple. During any snowstorm, approach a hill that should only be attempted under ideal road conditions and bring the car to a complete stop at its base. Then, with zeal, plunge the accelerator to the floorboards. Provided that the road has a reasonable crown to it, you will soon be making your way up the hill in a manner reminiscent of Land Crab, using the most popular technique available: the energy-intensive friction burn.

Outside a car is slowly approaching our house, which is situated near the top of a long hill that proves the scourge of many a winter driver. This driver spins into the classic friction burn. The season of the Great Attempt is open.

Although the season is long and hard fought, the best friction burn battles always take place during the first snowfall. It is on such nights that the salt trucks are just a bit slow getting out, and all those drivers who attempt to limit the mileage on their snowtires by waiting until the first "real" snowfall, must pay the price of their frugality.

The physics of energy-intensive friction burn are complex; but can be placed crudely in this nutshell: The car's tires are spun fast enough to melt the snow beneath them. The melting allows the tires to contact the road directly and the increased friction sends the car ahead onto another patch of snowy road where the process is repeated. Unfortunately, this technique has only been proven effective in snow depths of 1/64 of an inch or less.

Despite the technique's widespread popularity, there are always inexperienced drivers who are looking for guidance. With them in mind, I have prepared a style sheet, with scoring subtleties, for winter hill maneuvers.

The first and most critical requirement for a good burn is that the differential between ground speed and speed indicated by the speedometer must be at least 30 miles per hour. Additional style points may be garnered for indicated speeds in excess of 85 miles per hour. The assault on the hill must be relentless and must not be abandoned despite warning signals from the oil light, engine temperature light, or ammeter. Electrical fires are encouraged.

If, at any time, you lose control of the car and it begins to make reasonable progress up the hill, putting on the emergency brake while simultaneously throwing the steering wheel sharply to the left will restore the car to a crawl.

On the other hand, if the vehicle becomes motionless despite sustained high RPM, a single passenger may get out to push without loss of style points. However, if this passenger has so little traction on the hill that he or she falls down and is left behind, points will be subtracted. Further points will be deducted if this member of the crew is not recovered within twenty minutes.

There are two general classifications for the cars that pass by our window on such snowy evenings: cars negotiating to come up the hill, and cars negotiating to descend. I still believe that in friction style scoring, the direction of travel, not intent, is the over-riding factor. Nonetheless, there is a proper low-friction descent form.

Again, speed is critical – the hill must be approached with sufficient velocity so that traditional methods of controlling car speed during a descent are rendered useless, or at least largely ineffective. In this regard, slamming of the brakes, not pumping, especially while turning, is the mark of a conscientious stylist. Yet we are not stuffy — spontaneous moves such as spins, whirlies and skids are rewarded.

Opening of the passenger's door in hopes of catching it on a passing mailbox or utility pole we have ruled unanimously to be a gaucherie. And, of course, style points are still subtracted for every shrub or hedge run over in an intentional attempt to rub off speed.

It should be emphasized that this sport, although tremendously popular and often highly competitive, is essentially a personal sport. I still get more satisfaction from watching some unknown and unpraised beginner seize up his engine on our hill than I have ever gotten from watching the "big boys" compete at the nations in Colorado.

One final word of caution to the beginner though: TRAIN, TRAIN, TRAIN – you've got to be in shape. Start early in the summer. Drain the oil from your transmission and take a long road trip. Listen to your car; it will talk to you. Or if you haven't got that much time, tear off your windshield wipers and try to get out on the freeway as much as possible during thunderstorms. And never give up – some of those champions you see in all the magazines used to be good drivers too; so stick with it.

Eye To Eye

By Sonny Valentine

Perched on the bowsprit of the tuna ship as she rolls gently over rounded ocean swells, our hero, Barry Cutlass keeps a sharp eye peeled for surfacing porpoises. Yellow fin tuna follow the dolphins, swimming deep beneath the marine mammals, and tuna fishermen use the technique of "fishing on porpoise" to take their catch.

Invited by the captain, his old surfing buddy Skip Brunner, to come along on a one month fishing voyage, Cutlass finds himself doing more work than he expected. They are fishing in the Pacific, from Baja to northern Chile. When his time on watch is over, Cutlass discusses the work involved in tuna fishing with Brunner.

"This isn't just sunshine and Miller Time out here Skip. You guys really work at this, don't you?" Cutlass asks.

"Work? We haven't started to work yet. Just wait until we start making some big hauls, then you'll see what work is. This is the best tuna fishing area in the world. We'll hit one soon. Netting tuna from underneath floating debris is easy. The tricky part comes when you work with dolphins," the young sea captain responds.

"What happens then?" Cutlass asks.

"Well, first of all we drop off the speed boats to herd them together. Then we draw the purse seine in a big wide circle around them. Once we've got the circle closed, we pull the draw string on the bottom of the net shut, hopefully trapping all the tuna below."

"But what about the dolphins trapped in the net?" the concerned Cutlass interrupts.

"There you go. That's the tricky part. The nets have a panel of fine mesh, called the Medina panel, on the end away from the boat. Generally the dolphins can't get tangled in this part. Once the net is taut, we reverse the engines and try to sink the panel. This is called backdown. If all goes well, the dolphins spill out of there like you turned on a spout," the bleached blond fisherman says.

"What if they don't?" Cutlass continues.

"Well, then the guy watching them from a raft inside the net signals us, and we back her down again," Brunner says.

"Whose job is it to get in the raft?" Cutlass queries.

"Since you ask Bear, it's yours," Brunner says chuckling. "You can handle it. It's easier than paddling a surfboard."

"Now wait a minute Skip. I'm on vacation here," Cutlass points out.

"Good. Now you'll have something to say on the postcards," Brunner quips as he turns to go to the bridge.

"What a pal. What a pal," Cutlass mutters.

Early the next morning, the crew is called away from the breakfast table by the watchman. "Dolphin surfacing," he shouts. In seconds every man is at his post. The speed boats are dropped and the roundup begins.

In ten minutes the purse string on the seine is pulled shut and Brunner signals Cutlass to launch the raft.

With his diving mask on, Cutlass watches the trapped dolphins crowd near the back of the net. When Brunner reverses the engines of the Lady Darkness, the back of the net drops and most of the dolphins pour out. The remaining stragglers dash through the opening as the net resurfaces.

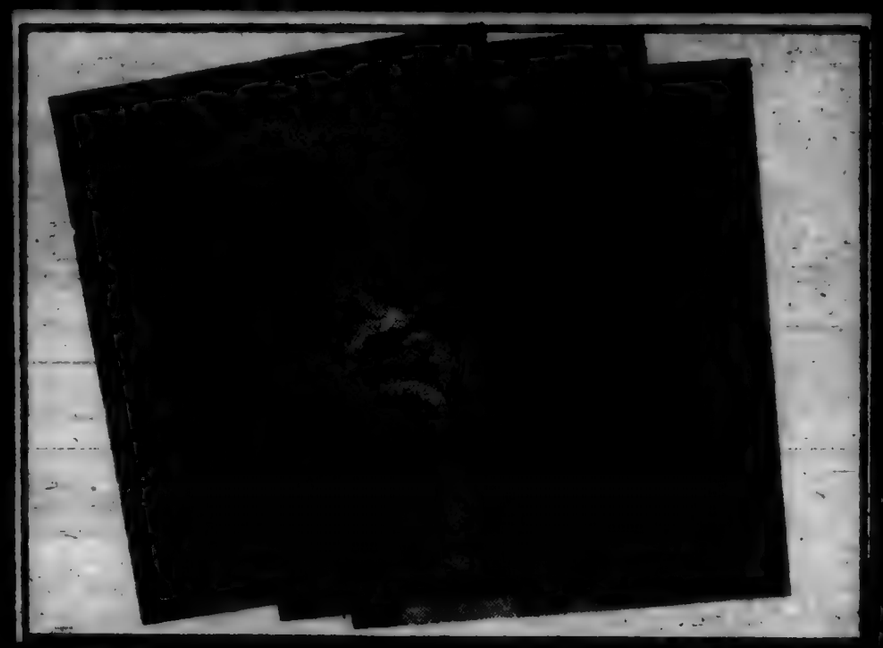
Just before Cutlass raises his head to give the OK signal to the boat, he spies one last dolphin snagged in a tear in the mesh panel. Knowing that backing the engines down again won't release this animal, Cutlass plunges into the blue water.

As Cutlass reaches the struggling cetacean ten feet below the surface, the beast suddenly senses his presence and stops fighting. Cutlass succeeds in untangling the porpoise, but to his surprise the animal does not bolt directly to the surface. Instead, the dolphin stares at Cutlass, eye to eye for several seconds, nuzzles his chest affectionately, and brushes softly by the surprised diver on his way to freedom.

Back on board, Cutlass explains what happened to Brunner.

"You are going to think I'm looney Skip, but when that dolphin was staring at me, I swear he was talking to me. I couldn't hear anything but his ideas seemed to enter my mind somehow," Cutlass confides.

"I've heard the exact same thing from several divers, Barry. Dolphins are very intelligent and their sonar is highly developed. Some scientists believe they are actually smarter than people. I don't buy that, but I do believe they're smarter than we give them credit for," Brunner reveals.



"I've read about dolphins being affectionate but I had to see it to understand it. You must feel awful when one drowns in your net," Cutlass says.

"I sure do. But we do a good job on the Lady Darkness. We average less than one dolphin per thousand tons of tuna. We can do much better though. A friend of mine is working on a sound device that will signal the exit to the mammals. There is a lot of work to be done on this subject," Brunner adds.

"Well, if I ever pass this way again, I'd like to see my dolphin friend. I know chances of that are slim, but who knows, we may be able to talk to each other by then," Cutlass forecasts.

While medical advancements soar beyond man's wildest dreams and the essence of life is nearly broken down into molecular formulas, most agree that the health programs in the U.S. are insufficient. On one hand, we have the technology to correct terrible illnesses. On the other hand, the expense and distribution problems render it useless to most people.

Holism aims at helping modern man deal with civilization's encroachments on well being, and reducing the need for extensive medical care.

department, over the "loose operations" of past reactive-oriented departments. "There is a new reporting system," Borthwick says, "in which all complaints are filed by the dispatcher, and this method forces all the officers to answer all complaints. They must finish the report, regardless of the outcome. Because of this new system, security has become a more visible operation, in which one can depend on a routine reaction by the force as a whole. If a complaint is registered by someone about a snowball fight, the security officers have to obtain a name and an ID number, just to complete the report. The student should not think this process means that he is in trouble, and Borthwick said a situation such as this one would end in a report such as "Talked to Joe Student and asked him to terminate his activities."

Traffic violations are a frequent place of student-security confrontation. "Though the normal speed limit on campus is twenty miles an hour, we normally let students have thirty," says Borthwick, "and much more than that and we feel it is a real safety hazard. Even then, eighty-five percent of the times we pull students over, it ends up in a verbal warning. But the most notorious task for the security officers is having to issue parking tickets." Borthwick's opinion about issuing parking violations is two-fold. He feels that most people realize that parking is a real problem on campus, but he says "most students are aware of the risks involved when they park illegally. It is kind of a game they play, seeing if they can park illegally without getting caught by us. There is a more serious side, however. Many times they can be blocking access to doors or driveways, such as the back of Mason, and there can be real problems in the case of an emergency."

The security officer represents the administration through the attempt to maintain a certain set of University policies. Mr. Borthwick acknowledges that "out of some 8,000 plus students, there are always going to be a few people who do not like us. Many who feel that way do so because being in a uniform means we represent authority." Mr. Borthwick feels that any animosity created by wearing a badge is part of the job, and anyone who works in a police or security unit must deal with this fact. It is in this aspect of his job that the security officer finds his work most similar to that of a policeman.

John Borthwick says he has seen a much better attitude develop in the student body, about respecting school rules and property, but feels that the students of UVM must continue to attempt to deal with the officers as human beings. He says that "the students' approach toward us will be returned in ninety-nine percent of the situations." Mr. Borthwick also hopes to promote improved relations between students and security, through programs such as ride along, which would allow students to see first-hand, what it is like to be a security guard. Also, students and officers can get a chance to meet each other and help promote better relations.

Zealous Dieters

ERSI (exceptionally realistic self-image). I admit it is no easy task. I'm still very conscious of what I eat and guilt pangs shoot through me when I feel I've overindulged. There still remains a discrepancy between what I consider overindulging – three square meals a day – and what most other people define it as.

When people (like my mother) insist it wouldn't be the end of the world if I gain a few pounds, and proceed to entice me with favorites like banana bread and buttercrunch ice cream, I can get angry and defensive. I still try to prove I don't need or want the extra calories (which is usually not true; I usually would love to sit down with a big bowl of ice cream). Now, I'm trying to make myself understand it is fine to enjoy foods in moderation, and I shouldn't see myself as a failure if I occasionally splurge. Binges need not be pursued with a guilt trip. Maybe there is some truth to the idea that food can be one of life's simple pleasures (yes, I am discovering this to be true!).

I am also trying to keep in touch with my body and use the mirror and my general state of well-being to judge my physique, instead of meaningless scale numbers. My mental health has greatly improved and I am not constantly devising ways to deplete my food intake or scheming on how to avoid confrontations with concerned relatives and friends.

Prior to this experience, I held the notion that a thin person was the same as a successful person, and in turn this quality constituted a main ingredient needed for overall happiness. My hypothesis was badly shattered. Instead of fighting and hating myself because of my "overweight" body, I'm trying to make peace with it and treat it with sensitivity and respect. After all, it is the only body I'll ever have. I'm lucky to have realized this before I did some irreparable damage.

Vermont Five Edges To Playoffs

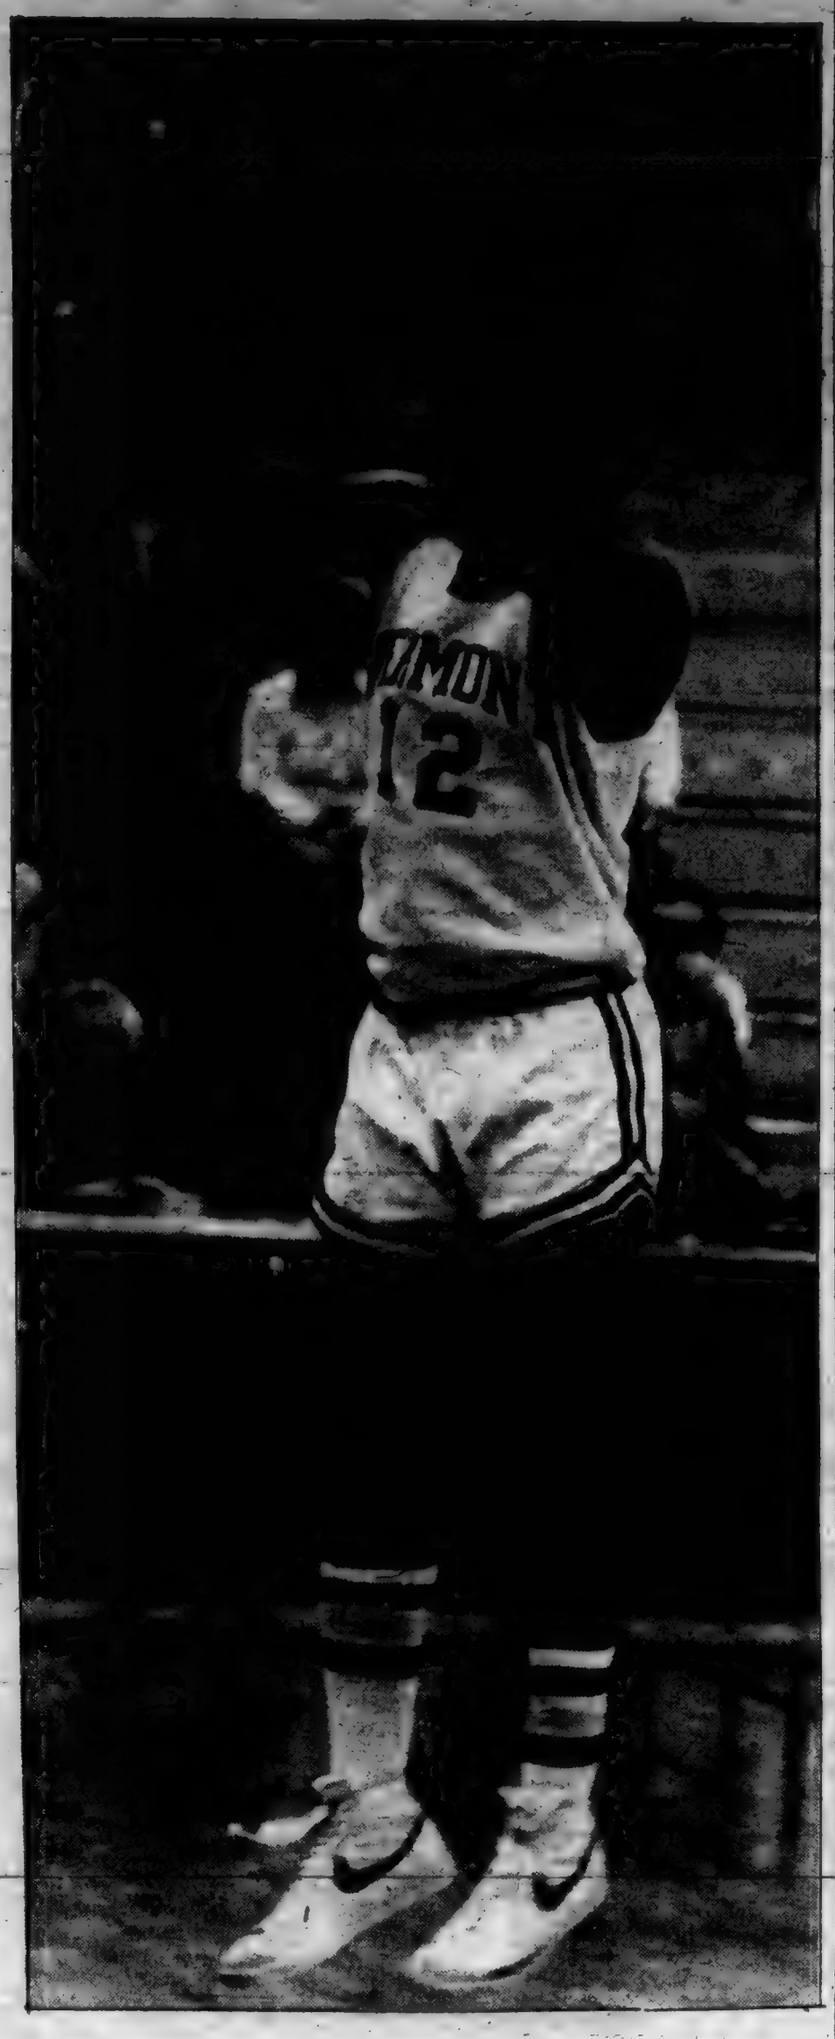
By Cristina Fiorini

This week, in a busy three-game schedule, Vermont rebounded from an unlucky Friday night loss, which ended the Cats' five-game winning streak, to beat Colgate Saturday, 67-60. This was an important victory in that it brought UVM closer to a home-court play-off spot in the first round of the ECAC tournament.

Vermont's defense faced the challenge of Colgate's key player, Mike Ferrara, who managed to chalk up 34 points, six assists, five steals and four rebounds. Usually the Cats rely on a fierce running game. On Saturday, however, they executed a powerful offense led by Mike Evelti and Jim Nocera, and managed to slow the game down.

"We made them play our game, by a controlled defense and a 3-2 zone," commented senior Dane Correll. "This was the key."

The start of the weekend didn't go as well, as the Cats suffered a 82-78 loss to Fairleigh Dickenson on Friday night. The first half opened, and Vermont soon trailed by a wide 12 point margin. UVM's Steve Thode was a major force in the Cats' comeback as his four successive shots narrowed the Knight's lead. Later, with four minutes left in the half, Vermont picked up the pace until with ten seconds left, Nocera, getting an alley-oop pass, stuffed the ball to tie the game.



Determined, the Cats pounced back in the second half, and with 10:30 to play, grabbed the lead with an eight point streak. The rest of the half, however, tumbled downwards, as with 2:44 remaining, Fairleigh Dickenson's Greg Foster scored, setting up a permanent lead for the Knights.

Earlier in the week, the Cats sliced their 5th consecutive win with a narrow 65-64 victory over St. Mike's. The game, which was Vermont coach Peter Salzberg's 100th win, was not decisive. As he stated, "there are 1000 ways either team could have won by a wide margin."

It was a rousing first half as Vermont maintained a steady five point lead up until the last six minutes. With the score 27-22, SMC opened up as Mike Olivieri scored twice to narrow the lead to 27-26. Olivieri was the Knight's key player, as he completed six baskets out of six shots, four of these resulting from offensive rebounds. Points rallied back and forth until the last minute when Correll and Woodlee both completed foul shots, to end the half in a 32-32 deadlock.

Vermont had the best luck at the start of the second half, as Nocera, getting an alley-oop pass from Wielgus, zipped the ball in, raising the score to 40-35. From then on, it was a tug-of-war as points went back and forth. With 7:26 left to play, the Cats inched ahead. Jeff Brown hooked the ball in to give Vermont a 60-55 lead. The Cats maintained their five point advantage, until with 3:34 left the Knights charged forward with two shots by Joel May and Steve Bourke, making the final score 65-64.

The last three minutes were dominated by Vermont's four-corner offense, as both teams missed scoring opportunities. "If we played the same game tomorrow," stated Salzberg, "the results could be different."

Icy Courses Can't Stop UVM Skiers

By Lon Bretell

The University of Vermont's ski team took a one point lead over Middlebury after the giant slalom event held Thursday at Cannon Mountain in Franconia, New Hampshire.

Middlebury's John Morrissey won the giant slalom with a combined time of 78.92, almost one second faster than second place finisher David Kent of UNH (79.81). UVM's Dave Bean finished in third, while Dartmouth's Mack Lyons was fourth and Middlebury's Mark Altmeyer was fifth. Vermont placed four other skiers in the top ten with Chris Mikell finishing seventh, Peter Murphy taking eighth, and John Teague coming in tenth.

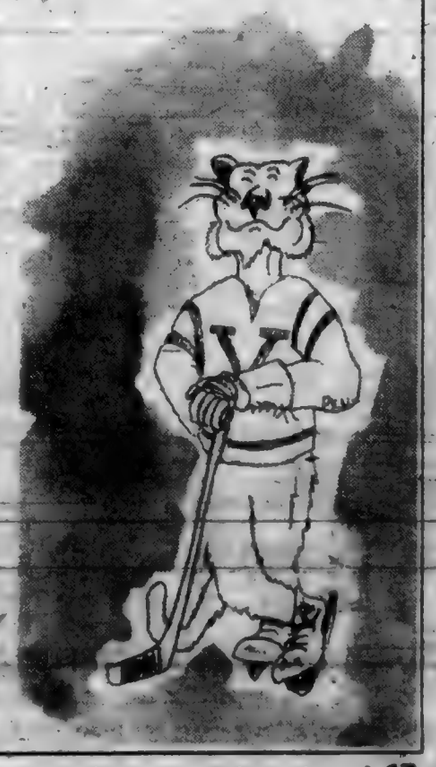
The slalom competition was won by Middlebury's John Morrissey (92.15) who had won the giant slalom the day before. Following Morrissey were John Teague (93.65) of UVM and Dave Kent (93.19) of New Hampshire. Jeff Peck of Middlebury was fourth, and Vermont's Dave Bean and Peter Murphy were fifth and sixth.

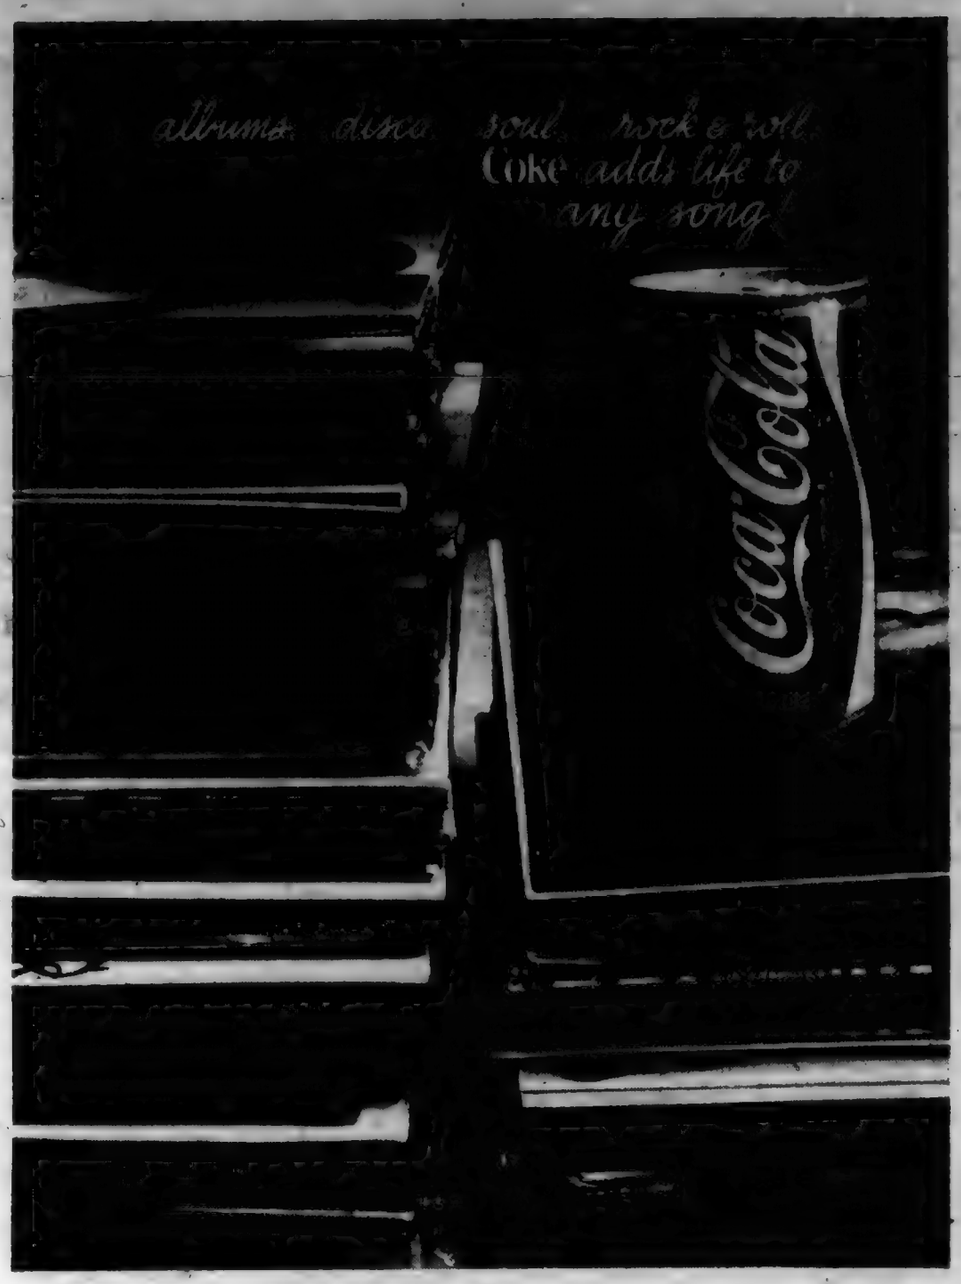
The two days of alpine competition were skied on icy courses causing trouble for some of the top skiers. UVM's Tor Melander, who had won three of the previous four races, had problems with his bindings and didn't finish the courses.

The cross-country was won by Vermont's Pal Sjulstad. He was almost two minutes ahead of the second place finisher, Todd Kempainen. Middlebury's Jim Renkert and UNH's Cory Schuartz were third and fourth, just ahead of Jon Zdechlic and Rick Solie.

The cross-country relay again was dominated by Vermont. Zdechlic, Lafortune, Solie, and Sjulstad defeated Middlebury by a close margin. Dartmouth, St. Lawrence, New Hampshire, Williams, Maine, New England, and Bates finished behind the two Vermont teams in that order.

Catamount Skaters Slide Past Middlebury





By John Howe

As an avid fan of the University of Vermont hockey team, I was glad to see some changes in the lineup against Middlebury on Tuesday night. After the team lost many games, I was wondering when Coach Cross would make some changes. It seems that Cross gave a few of the regulars a rest Tuesday night, and substituted them with supposed recruits, Brian O'Connor and Real Daigneault, as well as Ken Simon and freshman Tim Camissa.

All of the subs did well individually, and also fit right into the system. Simon netted a goal and had valiant bids for two others while both Daigneault and O'Connor figured in the assist column. But did this make any impression on the coaching staff? Obviously not. Thursday's roster, against Boston University, didn't include Simon, O'Connor, Daigneault, or Camissa. These four proved themselves against Middlebury, but will they ever get another chance?

Except for standouts, such as Homola, McKaskill, Crowley, and Kangas, not much separates the other skaters. However, it seems that some of them have fallen "victims of circumstance" and won't get the chance they deserve. The new faces had their moment of glory Tuesday night, but it was short-lived as the regulars routinely returned to the lineup on Thursday despite formidable performances by the "bench warmers." Spectators, including myself, were impressed by the Middlebury game and questioned, "who are these new guys wearing numbers 17, 18, and 26?" Well, it seems quite clear that they are wasted talent.

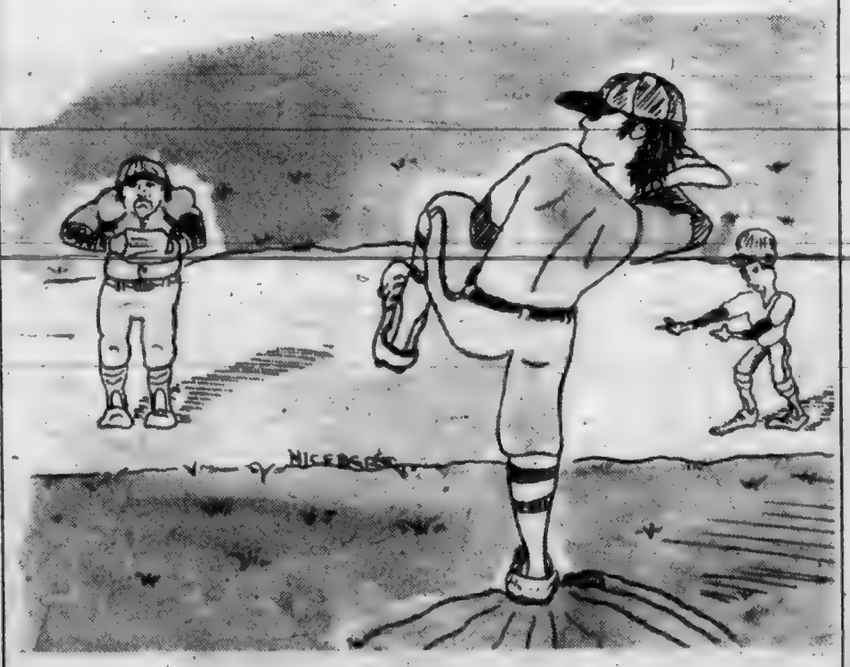
When Will Boston's Money Problem's End?

By Andy Cook



When the free-agent re-entry draft ruling was made in March of 1976, the Red Sox began to suffer, and they continue to suffer. After winning the American League pennant in 1975 – due partly to a tremendous pair of rookies names Lynn and Rice, but more importantly because of a well-balanced squad of pitching and hitting talent – Boston was confident about its chances of returning to the World Series the following year. But that next season, the Sox were never in contention for the crown. Not from the moment the team left Winter Haven, Florida for opening day at Fenway Park to the day the playoffs between New York and Kansas City began six months later.

In 1976, three players – Fred Lynn, who batted .331 and who became the only player ever to win the Most Valuable Player and Rookie of the Year awards in the same season; Carlton Fisk, who battled Johnny Bench for the claim to be the best catcher in baseball; and Rick Burleson, the consistent anchorman for the American League Champs – decided to play out their options and join other clubs at higher salaries. As history tells us, these men stayed with Boston until this year, but their flirtations with free agent status hurt their performance in 1976 (Lynn's batting average dropped twenty points, while Fisk's dropped eighty) and may have been a cause of the team's disastrous finish.

Since 1976, the Red Sox have signed several free agents, but when a quality player of their own attempted to play out his option, the team's front office has failed to renegotiate a contract successfully. Through free-agent and salary disputes, Boston lost Louis Tiant and Bill Lee in 1978, Bob Watson in 1979, and Lynn, Burleson, and Butch Hobson in 1981. Fisk is on the waiting list.

The fault for this mess lies not with the Red Sox themselves but with Ray Grebey, the man who has represented the financial interests of Major League team owners for the past five years. Boston can't survive under the present system because the team plays in a tiny ballpark that holds just 35,000 people. Even with sell-out crowds at every game, as was almost the case in 1978, the club still has smaller attendance figures than cities like Milwaukee, New York, and Los Angeles. The Boston management has a smaller financial budget to work with, and there just isn't enough money to sign many players to multi-year contracts.

Also, while the Boston owners are certainly wealthy people, none of them are copiously rich such as Ray Kroc, who owns McDonalds restaurants in addition to the San Diego Padres, or Ted Turner, who owns both a television network and the Atlanta baseball club, or George Steinbrenner, who owns a few race tracks in addition to the New York Yankees. Kroc, Turner, and Steinbrenner have the money to make huge investments into their ballclubs, while the Boston owners do not.

But more importantly lies the city of Boston itself. Although Red Sox fans are considered by many journalists as the most rabid baseball enthusiasts in America, Beantown is far from a performing paradise like New York and its "star" image, or Los Angeles, and its delightful climate. Certainly Lynn's departure had a lot to do with the desire of this centerfielder to play home in California, but not so much his desire to make more money. His refusal to consider being traded to the Yankees is a testimony to this. Let's face it, the bitter winters in Boston do not make the city the paradise of baseball careers.

With all things considered, the Red Sox had to pursue a system whereby most of their players would be derived from the team's farm system rather than from the free-agent market. The team stayed in contention for several years, but continued to lose to the Yankees in the standings. By 1979, several of the young players who had now become five-year veterans and who now could choose to play out their options, did so. Frustrated with a financially troubled and chronically second-place finishing team, many stars such as Carl Yastrezemski, Dwight Evans, and Jim Rice used their pull with the Red Sox to negotiate new, and sometimes outrageous contracts.

When these men took advantage of Boston's money problems, the free agent clause began to pinch the pocketbook in Beantown.

Ray Grebey's failure to stop the momentum that the players gained through their boycott of spring training in 1979, and their strike a few years later really didn't hurt Boston at first, because the financially hurting Red Sox had a hell of a farm system producing the likes of Yastrezemski, Petrocelli, Conigliaro, Scott, Lee, Fisk, Lynn, Rice, Evans, Burleson, and – oh, the list goes on. But when these men took advantage of Boston's money problems, the free-agent clause began to pinch the pocketbook in Beantown. Now with players like Lynn, and possibly Fisk, being dealt away in eleventh hour trades, the Red Sox must wonder if this mess could have been avoided had the owner's representative taken a firmer stand. If this happened, we might have had a player's strike for a year, but at least there wouldn't be that unfair axiom which states that the team with the largest stadium and richest owner will win the pennant. With the situation now, a fan watching a championship race is in the same position as a person who takes a sneak look at the last page of an Agatha Christie mystery before beginning the novel. Perhaps it would do Boston some good to hire a better lawyer, or resort to having fund-raising marathons on the radio!

Runners Advance to New England Championships

By Harry Eastman

In a performance described by Coach Ed Kusiak as "fierce," the University of Vermont's track team, with some outstanding performances at the Eastern Intercollegiate Athletic Association Track and Field Championships, qualified in six events for the upcoming New England Championships at Boston College on February 28th and March 1st.

The Catamounts, who scored 27 points and finished eighth overall in the event held February 14th at the Coast Guard Academy in New London, Connecticut, had several outstanding individual performances, including Steve Stebbins' record-breaking effort. Stebbins, who qualified for the New England championships with a seventh place finish, had a 9:09.76 time in the two mile run, which shattered the old UVM record of 9:14 set by Lynn Capen in 1975.

Joe McClallen, seeded second in New England in the 60 yard dash, took third in that event and third in the long jump. Charlie Claxdio finished fourth in the 35 lb. weight throw.

All three of the Cats' distance relay teams qualified for the New England Championships. The 4x 440 yard relay team finished seventh while both the 4x880 yard relay team and the distance medley team finished fourth. Though Coach Kusiak felt each member of the team gave his maximum effort, he singled out Steve Shead, Sam Davis, Terry Gilmore, Kelly Bartlett, and Tony Bates for key performances in their respective events.

Other strong efforts included those by pole vaulters Eric Stabenau and Dean Flanders, who finished fourth and fifth respectively. Randy Sighter, who finished tenth in the mile run, is described by Kusiak as "just about ready to explode, and come into his own in this event."

"This team has been one of the most pleasurable to coach," Kusiak said. "They were nervous and didn't perform well in our first meet, but in three weeks – due to their discipline and internal desire – they have turned things around."

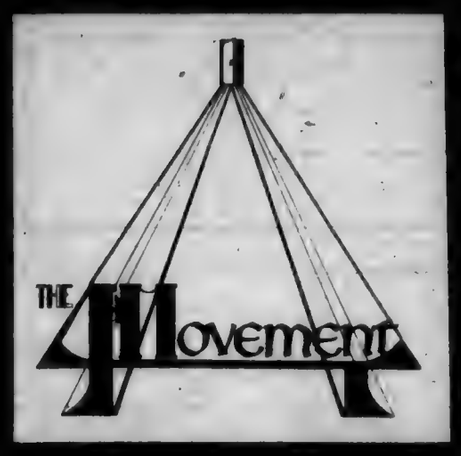
This Saturday, the Cats will host a tough University of Maine team at the Gardner-Collins Cage, the only home meet of the indoor track season.

Women Skaters Checked By Budget

By Celia Anderson

The Women's Ice Hockey team at UVM occupies a unique position in the web of regulations distinguishing varsity from club teams. Outwardly, the activity of the team most resembles that found at a varsity level, including regular practices and a full game schedule. Examination of the structure supporting these women athletes reveals a financial system characteristic of clubs organized within the University.

Over 25 players attend the daily practices scheduled at the Gutterson Rink, working to improve the skills needed for 13 contests against varsity teams and three played at the club level. Through the season stretching from November to March, the UVM women will have played local rivals from Middlebury, Dartmouth and Cortland colleges as well as more distant teams from McGill and Concordia Universities in Montreal, Clarkson, Potsdam and Skidmore from New York, and UConn and Northeastern.



The team's operating budget comes from donations by various organizations and individuals. The UVM Student Association contributes 46 percent of the total funding, while 24 percent comes from Family Associates, and 30 percent is from families of the players, past team members and alumni. According to club president Alix Manny, the small size of the budget places limits on the activity of the team. Expenses incurred in travel to nine away games account for most of the funds paid out for overnight stays in college recreation facilities and in homes of opposing team members.

The three men who share the coaching responsibilities of the team volunteer their time to organize the practices that have made a coherent, spirited and skillful team. Support from the Athletic Department comes solely in the form of ice time, while all the scheduling, travel and budget arrangements are performed by the students, with assistance from the Intramural office.

The student officers of the team have made several efforts to upgrade the status of the organization from club to varsity level. The UVM Athletic Council "defeated" the latest request in a letter to former team captain Sarah Dougherty, citing "fiscal implications" and an unwillingness to include women's hockey in a competition for funding with other varsity programs. Head coach Tom Halpin admitted after the decision that "It's a little frustrating to get the feeling that we're not very important to the Athletic Department." His disappointment is echoed by present team captain Mary Glowka, who noted that "having the full support of the school has made a difference in the spirit of other teams that we play." Praising the determination and commitment of the UVM players, she adds, "If the team members are willing to put this much (effort) into it, they deserve more backing from the school."

As the season nears its end, the players concentrate on the five remaining games, and hope for the chance to build a varsity program from its present enthusiastic base.

Havin' a Party With a Roomful of Blues

By Elise Brown

Roomful of Blues brought their hot swingin' sound to Hunt's in Burlington for two nights this week, treating their audiences to some bluesy jazz from yesteryear and contemporary rhythm and blues. The band drew from their large repertoire both nights, featuring tunes from their two albums and new material from their forthcoming LP.

Five members of the nine-piece ensemble are celebrating their tenth anniversary with the band, and their musical professionalism and spontaneity reflect their years together. In addition to touring, their recent recordings with Lou Rawls and The Fabulous Thunderbirds are bringing the group the notoriety it deserves. Their appearance at Hunt's is just the kind of club atmosphere they seem to shine in, and the interplay between the band and the audience was exciting.

From their first LP on Island Records, they did what pianist Al Copley calls a "patriotic swing number," otherwise known as "Red, Hot, and Blue," featuring Ronnie Horvath's guitar work. The crowd enthusiastically responded to the title song from their second album, "Let's Have A Party." "Sufferin' Mind," from their new album, showcased the fine alto sax of Rich Lataille, a ten-year member, and Horvath's bluesy guitar.

"Porky" Cohen stepped to the front for "Caravan" and "Fine Healthy Thing," which he must be in order to blow trombone the way he does at the age of fifty-seven (in between balancing glasses of wine on his forehead). Lataille's sax intro on "Alimony Blues," an Eddie Vinson tune, was especially memorable, as was Greg Piccolo's vocals on a Bobby Bland number, "Help Me, Somebody." The influence of Earl "Fatha" Hines and Fats Waller on Al Copley's piano playing was apparent while listening to two of his originals, "The Alby Boogie" and "The Big Fog."

The group's current lineup includes an amazing horn section : Danny Motta -trumpet, Porky Cohen - trombone, Greg Piccolo - tenor sax, Rich Lataille - alto sax, and Doug James on baritone sax. The rhythm section is composed of John Rossi on drums, Ronnie Horvath on guitar, Jimmy Wimpfheimer on stand-up bass, and Almon Le Grande Copley on piano. Their new album on their own label, Blue Flame, is entitled "Hot Little Mama," and should be available in March.

"Altered States": A Journey Through Inner Space

By Mike Hambly

"I hallucinated like a son of a bitch." – Ed Jessup, after an isolation tank session

Unlike 2001: A Space Odyssey, in which an alien intelligence assists human metamorphoses, Altered States shows man as altered by the latent powers of his own mind. Based on the novel by Paddy Chayefsky (writer of Network), the film is visually intoxicating due to the cinematic genius of director Ken Russell. Noted for his outrageously bizarre imagery, his credits include the top-notch Tommy as well as the loathsome Lisztomania.

The protagonist, Dr. Ed Jessup (William Hurt), bored with the routines of academia (he's a professor at Harvard Medical School) and people in general, engages in a monomaniacal quest for the ultimate truth via psychotropic drugs and isolation tanks (in which one's body is suspended in a saline solution amid total darkness, to simulate the womb). Jessup travels to Mexico, where an Indian shaman (straight out of Carlos Castenada's books) allows him to participate in an ancient ritual wherein a mind-expanding mushroom distillation is drunk. He brings some of the mushrooms back to America in order to synthesize their active ingredients. Against the wishes of his colleagues, he spends increasing amounts of time in sensory deprivation tanks while tripping on the drug.

His hallucinations, which send him hurtling through eons of collective race memory, eventually become so powerful that they are externalized. Jessup is temporarily converted into a prehistoric hominid. As an ape creature, he roams the streets one night and ends up in the city zoo, where he eats a young sheep alive. The next morning, a security guard finds him (in human form again) lying naked beside the carcass. Imagine trying to explain that one.

Jessup continues the experiments, and in an optically stunning sequence, he undergoes a matter-to-energy conversion. He teeters on the brink of what Buddhists term "nirvana." With the aid of his estranged wife, he struggles to return from his self-inflicted hell before the situation is irrevocable.

The hallucinatory sequences are packed with religious, psychoanalytic, and mythic symbolism. Crucifixes, sphinxes, human sacrifices, reptiles, icons (including the Shroud of Turin), scenes from "Dante's Inferno," and tableaus similar to surrealist paintings all flash by kaleidoscopically.

Russell has strewn symbolic touches throughout the film. Much of the action takes place underground, in basements and boiler rooms (a subtle allusion to the unconscious); one hears a sitar segment from the Beatles' "Within You Without You;" and of all the animals in the zoo, Jessup (in his simian state) kills a (sacrificial?) lamb. The observant filmgoer may note many others.

The hero is a Nordic-looking, emotionally compulsive (his wife says that he acts like a flagellant in bed), Ivy Leaguer who is hard for the viewer to empathize with to any great degree. Yet, Russell did not design the film to affect one emotionally; rather, Altered States is an intellectual opus and sensory feast. There's a smattering of humor, too – the sight of a matured preppie turning into an australopithecine is ironically comical, as is an eminent endocrinologist (Charles Haid) whose every other word is a profanity.

Though I found the ending unsatisfactory and a "willing suspension of disbelief" often unnecessary, I encourage movie enthusiasts to see this "breakthrough film." ½

The Outlaws' Guitar Explorations

By Mark J. Cadigan

The triple-guitar attack employed by many southern rock bands began almost a decade ago with Lynyrd Skynyrd. Since then, other groups have adopted it, using it like a sledgehammer to pound heavy riffs into the listeners' ears at ridiculous volumes. The Outlaws, however, have consistently used the three-guitar lineup with taste and skill. Their latest album, Ghost Riders, is testimony to this fact.

Original members Hughie Thomasson and Billy Jones and late-comer Freddie Salem comprise The Outlaws' guitar core. Drummer David Dix (who joined the band in 1977) and new bassist Rick Cua make up the steady rhythm section that provides the foundation for the trio's guitar explorations. Keyboardist Mike Duke appears on a few songs, and his light touch gives a nice balance to the band's powerful sound.

Ghost Riders features a combination of all-out rockers and slower ballads. The Outlaws excel at both, and it's to their credit that their music sounds just as good at lower volumes as it does at higher ones. "Sunshine" and "I Can't Stop Loving You" blend airy acoustic guitar strumming with sustained electric guitar lines to produce a lilting, dream-like aura. This quality is further emphasized through such lyrics as Billy Jones' "The sun shines when your heart's filled with love."

Of the many rockers on the album, "(Ghost) Riders in the Sky" is easily the best. Originally written in 1949 by Stan Jones, the song has been given The Outlaws' distinct treatment, making it as modern as anything else they've done. The tune begins with Thomasson's crisp acoustic picking over a background of howling winds and perks up with a pounding drum-roll. It then takes off when the rest of the band kicks in, particularly Billy Jones' melodious, reverberating guitar notes. The first line of the song ("An ole cowpoke went ridin' out one dark and windy day...") lets the listener know that he/she is in for a classic cowboy tale.

Similar cowboy imagery turns up in Freddie Salem's "White Horses," where his fantasy culminates in the words "We'll ride white horses..." The tune is full of crescendos and decrescendos, the former created by a wall of hot guitars and the latter by Mike Duke's soothing organ and piano playing.

The music throughout the record is high quality, and the vocals are strong and moving, especially the harmonies. The Outlaws have mastered their musical genre – you only have to hear Ghost Riders once to realize that. It's fine if the band gains impetus from new members, but let's hope that Hughie Thomasson and Billy Jones never leave The Outlaws, because they're the "ghost riders" who roam from concert to concert and album to album. "Their faces gaunt, their eyes were blurred an' shirts all soaked with sweat" describes hard-ridin' cowboys as well as this hard-playin' band.

The Fleetwood Mac Chronicle

By Mark Cahill

The live concert separates a good band from a great band. It displays the band's comfort and flexibility with their music, and at the same time tends to highlight the band's imperfections. Very few rock and roll bands have been able to reach the top without doing concerts, and doing them well.

Fleetwood Mac Live is a stunning example of the live concert experience. The album presents a fair variety of music from the albums recorded after Danny Kirwin and Bob Welch left the group and were replaced by Lindsey Buckingham and Stevie Nicks (just before the Fleetwood Mac LP). Only one tune from the earlier albums, "Oh Well," which was written by Peter Green (one of the former members) and appeared on the Then Play On album, is done on Live. This is symbolic, because many fans of Fleetwood Mac's initial albums became quite disenchanted with the band's rejection of their blues background in favor of the more commercial format of the albums from Fleetwood Mac on. In the form the song appears in, it fits perfectly with the newer material, especially since it is followed by three songs off the Tusk LP.

Fleetwood Mac Live starts off with a marvelous instrumental which leads into a very rowdy version of "Monday Morning," a tune that originally appeared on the Fleetwood Mac album. It is gripping and powerful, with Lindsey Buckingham's fierce guitar leads setting the tone. As anyone who owns a radio can attest to, this song was so overplayed that many people lost their interest in it. I once swore that if I ever heard it again, I would tear the radio out of the dashboard of my car. But when I heard this version, I found myself clapping and singing along.

Musically, Fleetwood Mac Live reveals the amazing versatility of the band members. "It's Not That Funny," a Lindsey Buckingham tune from Tusk, begins with a very coarse rock 'n roll guitar, and then softens noticeably while Mick Fleetwood carries the beat in a soothing drum interlude. John McVie slides in with a light, delicate bass, and Buckingham proceeds to scream into the microphone. He then plays a few short, clean guitar lines as the band returns to the steady bass/drums background. The guitar builds to a crescendo and then cuts out, allowing a short two measure drum roll-out to lead into Christine McVie's accentuated piano solo.

Lyrically, the song is a basic denial of love: "I don't wanna turn ya on/ All your hope is gone/ It's not that funny, is it?/ So don't blame me/ Please, please." Similar motifs can be found in all of the other songs as well.

I find this album to be musically exciting. Everyone should listen to it at least once. But if you're the type of listener who seeks to be enlightened by lyrics, don't expect any major gems of wisdom here. The words have all been sung before, and the listener will find the lyrics in different songs to be virtually interchangeable. Fleetwood Mac Live is a chronical of the band's concert experiences, and it should be taken as that. For those who haven't seen the group perform, this double album is an excellent substitute.

THEATRE

A Celebration of Seasons

By Lynn Cline

Burlington's seemingly endless winter months offer slight hope for the return of the celebrated season, Spring. This week, however, the snow has begun to melt into mud, assuring us that winter is not perpetual. Coinciding with this premature arrival of Spring is the UVM University Players' production, Celebration, which opened last night at the Royall Tyler Theatre. A modern musical-comedy based on the ritual of the changing of seasons, Celebration deals with an overwhelming number of themes and symbols. The most apparent is the triumph of good over evil, as Spring victoriously replaces Winter.

The play was written at the end of the chaotic, confusing 60's era, by the same team that co-wrote The Fantasticks (Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt). Perhaps this explains why there are so many themes and statements concerning society that are intertwined throughout the simple structure of the plot.

Melanie Comer and Christopher Hill

The play opens and closes in a ritual manner, illustrating one of the major themes: the different rites performed by all cultures to ensure the arrival of Spring. The narrative character of Potemkin (Greg Lesch) steps out onto a crude platform, wearing a Roman orator's gown. Addressing the audience, he explains how the coming of Spring was once celebrated by the ancient cultures and compares this to our modern-day society. The idea of this primitive period is further enhanced with the appearance of a chorus, an element of ancient Roman and Greek drama. Dressed in unisex black leotards, the members of this chorus constantly wear masks, which are representative of the origins of the theater.

After this introductory scene, the plot begins to unfold. The story-line is very straightforward, but encompasses such a mixed range of morals and messages that it is almost an overstatement. There is the naive young boy, who is known only as "the Orphan" (Christopher Hill). Personifying Spring, the future, and all benevolent qualities, he is in direct contrast with Mr. Edgar Allen Rich (Chad Tyler), who, as you may guess, personifies Winter. He is portrayed as a materialistic millionaire who struck it rich manufacturing women's "falsies." He has never experienced an ounce of emotion in his corrupted mind (can you imagine not having an erection for 25 years?) until the appearance of the "femme fatale" Angel (Melanie Comer), an aspiring rock-star/actress who wants desperately to "be somebody." This creates the inevitable "love-triangle," as our hero (the Orphan) is stricken at first sight, but compelled to compete with the dazzling fortunes of Rich, which are more alluring to our seductive heroine than Orphan's simple, natural love. The resolution makes no profound statements, but it does prove that the virtuous will conquer the evil, just as Spring will always cause the downfall of Winter.

The true comic character of this play is the cynical Potemkin, who manipulates and maneuvers much of the action. His appearance represents the thrust of reality into this "fairy-tale" plot, and his statements on society are painfully honest. All he's trying to do is survive, in any possible way he can. He attempts to "show the ropes" to the innocent Orphan, while still looking out for his best interests. In his own words, he is the "theatrical producer" of the play and indirectly responsible for what eventually happens to the other characters.

Members of the chorus ("revelers") set the mood for each scene. They constantly shift their characters as they change their attire from bright whirling ribbons and colorful masks to jet-black outfits and eerie metallic masks. Their movements are either synchronized dance steps or mime motions, and they add a deeper meaning to each scene.

Directed by UVM senior Cynthia Gould, the play is entirely student-produced, with the cast working together on almost every aspect of the performance.

"Celebration" can be seen through February 21st at 8:00 p.m. nightly at Royall Tyler Theatre, with a 2:00 p.m. matinee on Saturday.

LIVE ART

What is this man doing?

Coronary Art Attack

By Max Lesselbaum

Flames roared in a fireplace on the television. A lanky man with a Southern accent appeared on the screen. He proceeded to burn photographs and personal letters, all of which had something to do with someone named Joan. As the video recording concluded, artist Lance Richbourg removed his pants, shirt, and drawers and tossed them into the fire. Bone naked, he squirted Wizard charcoal starter into the garment conflagration. The TV was turned off, and the real show began at The Mill in Winooski.

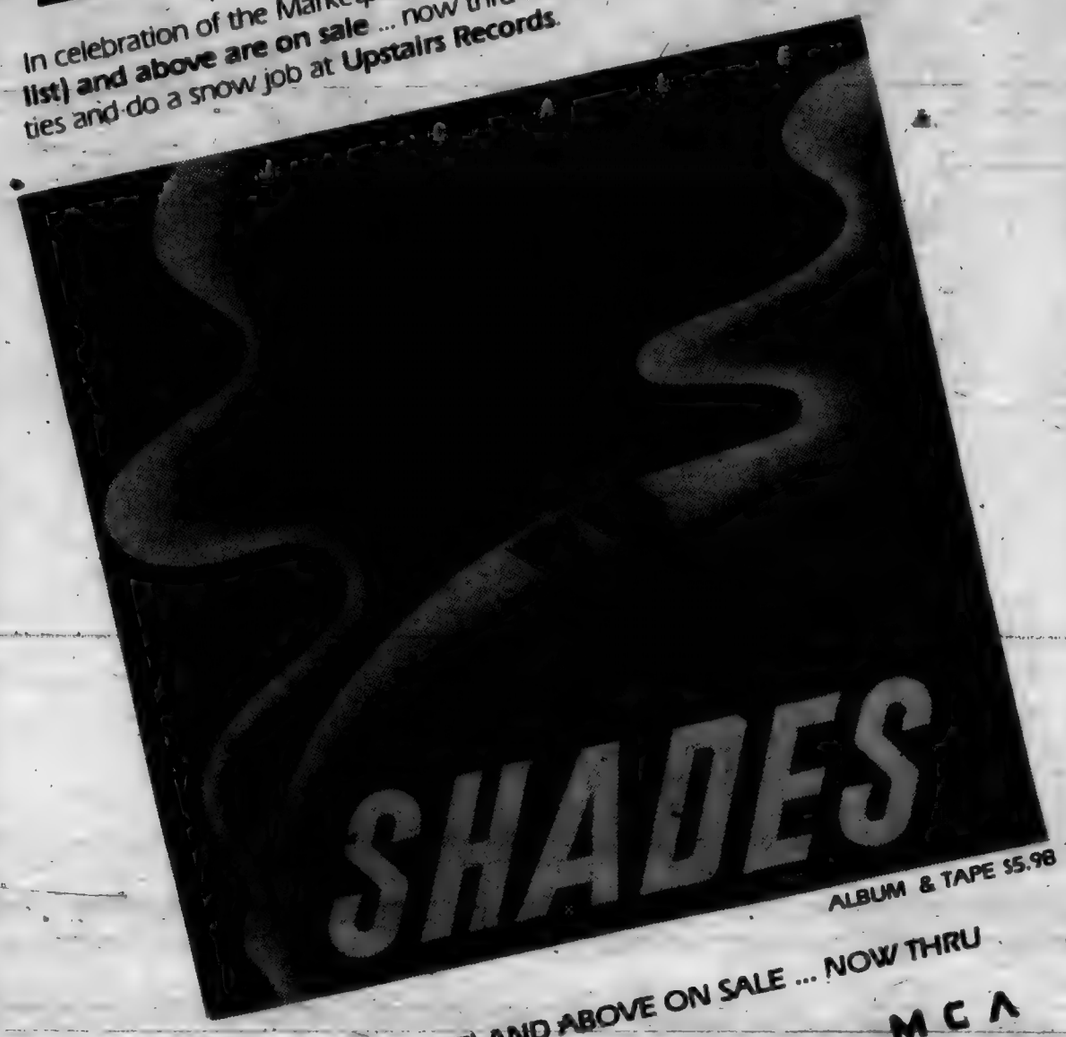
"Performance from the Heart" was the St. Valentine's Day production of an artiste group named The Oxymoronics. The same group that brought a "Russian Art Show" to Church Street on November 4 this time performed impromptu, with blood and explosives.

A country vocaliste began singing as Richbourg moved onto the center of the floor wearing a red-painted suit – on the front was a large heart and on the back a skull and cross bones. He was accosted by two "groupiettes" who popped and spurted cheap champagne all over his puss and suit. Members of the audience armed with water guns proceeded to soak the guy with a cataract of squirts. The paint ran from his suit into a bed pan on the floor. Someone then threw (with tongs) a white hot rock into the red liquid. It sizzled.

A performer then breathed some fire, and Richbourg moved to the right of the stage and hung a large pane of glass from a cross beam. He carefully, slowly painted a heart on the glass with orange spray paint. As soon as he finished spraying he shattered the whole thing with a hammer.

Preordained audience members moved onto the floor, which was covered with a 14' vinyl heart, and put their heads through holes cut around the perimeter of the heart. Richbourg moved "center heart," ripped open his surgeon suit, and gushed plastic blood all over the place. He then removed his heart (a Valentine candy gift box). Throbs of excitement filled the audience when a dog came on the scene and was presented with a 2 lb. steak inside the heart box. The hound split with the beef to end Part One.

Part Two commenced as a bow-and-arrow-equipped maiden fired an explosive at a large paper-covered plaque. With gun powder underneath the paper, the plaque burst into white flame, leaving the burned shape of a valentine which read "HEART ATTACK." Another plaque, lined with a slow burning fuse in the shape of a heart, was lit and then burned its course until it reached the central artery, which was loaded with dozens of firecrackers. They all blew up, leaving the place full of blue smoke.



The show ended as people milled around The Mill. The sequence of incongruous events was successful in its spontaneity and impertinence. The Oxymoronics (apart from Richbourg) are five women who are recognizable by their garish, glove-tight outfits and the same haughtiness characteristic of young and talented art students. These girls are similar in style to musician groupie-types who tell all their friends they "have backstage passes and have been partying with the band." Groupies following either artists or musicians range in obnoxiousness with the degree of their avidity.

Performance Art originated in 1909 under the impulses of a group of Italian Futurist painters. Notorious from the start, the Futurist performers were intent on shattering the complacency of their audiences. In any way they could, the Futurists would provoke, irritate, and deliberately annoy the audience. In this respect, The Oxymoronics seriously jolted the audiences' passivity. The show left an uncanny impression, not to be brushed off as a mere "pointless demonstration."

What Is Clean Water Worth To You?

by David Sperduto

Water is the most precious and valuable substance for virtually every form of life. Without it, wheat seeds would never sprout and the rose would never bloom. The Green Mountains would be as forbidding as the surface of the moon, and Lake Champlain no more than a dusty trench; life as we know it would not exist. Atoms of hydrogen and oxygen have combined, though, in an intriguing, wonderful way, in such great quantities that we often take the phenomenon for granted. We are reminded, during water shortages, periods of drought, or after spending a long summer day in a hayfield or corn row without a canteen, that water is an essential element in the pattern of things. And human standards of water purity are high. Unless stranded in a desert, most of us would pass up any glass of water much dirtier than one from a clear mountain stream.

Jim Howley, Superintendent of Burlington's Water Resources Department, hopes that on Tuesday, March 3, Burlington voters will opt for that cleaner glass of water by voting "Yes"on Question 2. By doing so they would approve replacement of Burlington's 73 year old water treatment plant.

Howley, a professional engineer, describes the waterfront plant as being in poor condition. "It is less capable each year of handling Burlington's need for large volumes of clean water." Robert Lemiux, plant operator, says that so much of the plant's equipment is deteriorating, and that,"it would cost more to replace it all than to build everything from scratch."

Originally built in 1908 in response to outbreaks of typhoid fever in Burlington, the treatment plant does nothing more than pump water from Lake Champlain, filter it through 30 inches of sand, and chlorinate it before sending it up to the city for public use. This minimal treatment leaves high levels of suspended solids (turbidity), bacteria, viruses, and other substances in the water supply, as noted by state and federal health officials.

The solution to these problems, as proposed by Howley and the Department of Wtaer Resources, is construction of a new plant that would include "sedimentation, coagulation, and floculation"cleaning processes before filtering the water. This would remove much of the solid matter, bacteria, and viruses, and along with other measures, would help reduce levels of all contaminants. The water would be cleaner and safer to start with, and would need less chlorine for disinfection. Right now, bacteria and viruses are destroyed with about 1.5 parts per million of chlorine as the water leaves the plant. Not only are Bob Lemiux and other plant workers exposed to additional chlorine hazard, but chlorine is known to combine with other substances in water to form chlorinated organics, some of which are suspected by scientists as being carcinogenic.

Burlington's water-volume demand is rising each year also. Already, there have been cases of water-conservation alerts in summer months. The present facility can only pump and treat 10-11 million gallons per day, less than the daytime demand in the summer. Water must then be pumped to the reservoir on upper Main St. at night in order to have enough for the higher daytime demand. "In five to ten years, though," said Howley, " Burlington's need will outrun its capacity to pump and store enough water." Part of the Department of Water Resources proposal involves covering the Main St. reservoir with a concrete "roof" to avoid accidental or deliberate contamination, also reducing the need for re-chlorination of the reservoir water. Although it has been chlorinated at the treatment plant, water that stays in the reservoir for a day or two loses much of the chlorine through evaporation.

Howley said that although the building of the treatment plant will increase water rates, it will not add a penny to property taxes. "The total cost for the treatment plant plus modifications at the reservoir is $12 million. That would mean a rise in the water rate from its present .60 per 750 gallons to $1.27-$1.46, or $180 per year for the "typical" Burlington family, instead of $80."

Howley claims that the new treatment plant will be capable of supplying nineteen million gallons per day, enough to meet Burlington's water needs to the year 2005, and possibly 2025.

A flyer printed by the Department of Water Resources asks the question which Burlington voters will answer on Tuesday: "What is clean drinking water worth to you and your family?"

Letters To The Editor

Those Who Complain Instead of Educate

To the Editor:

Frank Fellicelli complains (Cynic, Feb, 12) that the majority of nonukers on campus are, or were, hypocritical rich kids unwilling to engage in actual demonstrations. Rich kids do not have a monopoly on hypocrisy, however, and being an activist does not require taking a vow of poverty. I see nothing hypocritical about being opposed to nuclear power and driving a Saab, being a skier, or owning a second home. Furthermore, the majority of the students I've known at UVM in the movement have made great sacrifices for the cause, including facing arrest at Vernon and Seabrook.

I hate to think that my contribution to the anti-nuclear movement wasn't worthwhile because I never trespassed at a nuclear plant. Civil disobedience is an admirable thing, but it won't work without fundraising, leafletting, talkint to people, and being very vocal. These things I did in abundance, and wouldn't ask of anyone else.

I'm not worried about "phony believers," I'm worried about phony activists: those who alienate rather than unite, and complain instead of educate.

What's Happening to the Cynic?

To the Editor:

The other day I found an old Cynic from the fall of '79 and I had to ask myself: "What's happening to the Cynic?" The old 42 page, two section weekly is gone, kaput! Now I get 28 pages, and, if I'm lucky, 14 pages of actual writing (after you subtract advertising and table of contents). Quantity, though, is not my gripe. I mean, seriously, I wouldn't mind 14 pages of good solid writing, but frankly, I just don't get it. Sure the news coverage and commentary seem adequate, if not quite good. I acknowledge this and praise you for it. The rest is what bothers me.

Remember the "old days" when a separate Art section sported a sleek cover photo of someone like Pat Metheny? Where concert, record and film criticisms ran consistently? And remember when few local arts events went unnoticed? Now if I'm lucky enough to get an article on a new film or record release, it's nothing but a tribute to the band or film by an undaunted fan. Criticism? — Hardly. Local art coverage is sacrificed for an article on Jerry Garcia in Boston. I mean come on! As Sam Wear wrote in a week ago: "Just open your tunneled vision and pay the art around you its due respect." Journalism is not praising your favorite guitar deity for his n millionth concert. It involves responsibility to your locale and its readers.

One victim of the "new" Cynic is photography. Where are the photos? I see Nancy Early shooting every hockey game but you rarely manage to run any pics. I actually remember the Cynic running four photos for one soccer game two seasons ago, one game! Don't get me wrong. I'm not asking for another Daily News, but photojournalism definitely spices up a paper, especially in sports and arts (the areas you're weakest in). Speaking of art, what happened to the Gallery? It appears that one of the few places for UVM photo enthusiasts to express themselves is gone.

So what's the problem? Lack of support is my guess. It looks like you need more good, committed writers and staff. If you really do need people then seek them out! Just don't let the Cynic shrink into oblivion.

Peter Guyton

Behind the Scenes, Please

To the Editor:

In the latest edition of the Cynic, in the article on Vietnam Veterans, you displayed a picture of a sign which appeared on the front of the AGR house on South Prospect Street. The sign was suggested by the brothers as a reminder that the hostages weren't the only ones who spent time overseas against their will. The sign received many favorable comments from people in the community, including a letter from the Vet Center in Williston.

While we don't want to "blow our own horn," we feel that our brothers, especially Dan Cunningham and Kris Ballard, deserve some acknowledgement of their efforts in the design and construction of this sign.

We hope that in the future, your photographers will take the time to go behind the scenes and acknowledge the efforts of students to send a message to the community. After all, the Cynic, as our student newspaper, should try to present the whole picture.

Sincerely,
Peter P. Fitzgerald

★★UVM Catalog Sneak Peek★★

By Mike Hambly

Here's a sneak peek at the course catalog for next fall:

Anatomy 103: Human Anatomy – The human body and why it is good to have one. In order to compare the macroscopic and microscopic structure of other mammalian organ systems with those of man, cats, fetal pigs, and giraffes will be dissected. An autopsy of a Saga victim is planned. Prerequisites: Strong stomach and must not be a necrophiliac.

Art 16: Graffitti – Field trips to NYC subways and Bailey-Howe study carrels are planned in this examination of a worldwide spontaneous artistic and literary phenomenon. Emphasis on profundities like "Don't drop acid; take it pass/fail" and "To Be is to Do – Sartre; To Do is to Be – Nietzsche; Doo Be Doo Be Doo – Sinatra" as well as on pornographic illustrations. Cross-listed with English 19.

Biochemistry 298: Genetic Engineering – Analysis of attempts to prevent hereditary diseases via recombinant DNA. Life will be created in the lab. Cloning for fun and profit. Prerequisite: Must get security clearance.

Biology 3: Paramecia and You – Introduction to lower life forms for non-majors. Topics include the sex life of the amoeba; the AC/DC earthworm; planarians – nature's schizos; echinoderms – do they really matter?

Business Administration 231: Principles of Advertising – The creation of artificial demand for useless products. Topics such as subliminally seductive ice cubes in magazine liquor ads; the use of bogus statistics (e.g. 4 out of 5 dentists surveyed); effectively using financially desperate celebrities (Orson Welles, Robert Young, Natalie Wood, e.g.); case histories of successful ad campaigns such as those for Preparation H, Oil of Olay, and Slim Whitman records.

Economics 13: Introduction to Economics – Why money is good to have. Adam Smith's "invisible hand" and lesser-known "invisible nose." John Maynard Keynes – was he a genius or a jerk? Marx's dialectical materialism. Lenin's predictive pamphlet, "Designer Jeans – the Final Stage of Capitalism."

English 2: Literature of the Comic Book – A critical approach to an overlooked genre. Topics will include existentialism in Spiderman; the Hulk and the dualism of human nature; the scarcity of female superheroes, Superman and the American ethos.

English 3: Speed Reading – Recommended for English majors who wish to get the gist of a work quickly with details to be filled in during lectures. Speeds of 2,000 wpm are the goal. For example, "War and Peace" is compressed to the following: People with long names live in Russia. People marry. Napoleon attacks. Moscow burns. It's cold. People die.

English 167: Current Ethmology – The etymological origins of terms used by contemporary students, bureaucrats, mellowspeakers, et al. Included: "psyched," "intense," "faced," "brewskies," "preppie," "JAP," "to book," "munch out," "to impact," "feedback," "feasibility study," "into," "bums me out," "getting one's head together."

Home Economics 280: Advanced Sexuality – Grading based primarily on class participation. Field trips. Good for 3 physical education activity credits.

History 19: The Underside of History – Intriguing historical gossip for those bored with the conventional approach. Topics include how hemorrhoids hindered Napoleon at Waterloo; why Alexander was not so great; was Hitler a transvestite?

Math 289: Industrial-Strength Math – Prenex normal forms, Godell numbers, Markov chains, undecidable problems (answers will be penalized), recursive functions, the Laplace transformation, eigenvalue computations, Cauchy's Theorem, Galois theory, Fourier series, Householder upper triangular and tridiagonal reduction. If you know what all this jargon means, you shouldn't take this course. You should be teaching it.

Music 3: Modern Music Appreciation – An analytical look at contemporary music and lyrics in perspective. The musical techniques of the Clash, Gary Numan, Devo, and the B-52's will be compared to those of Beethoven, Bach, the Strausses, and Tchaikovsky. The complex lyrics of KC & The Sunshine Band and Lipps, Inc. will be studied.

Philosophy 273: Existentialism – Is God dead or just sleeping? Is there life after death or what? If nothing exists, who are you? Answers to these questions and more. Students who prove that the instructor is a mere illusion will receive extra credit. Attendance very important.

Political Science 10: Remedial Political Science – Who is the current President? What color is the White House? When was the War of 1812 fought? Who decreed the Monroe Doctrine? What country are you in? If you can't answer these questions, this course is for you. Hurry!

Psychology 154: Abnormal Psychology – Find out if you're psychotic or just a garden-variety neurotic. Manias and phobias galore. Why you should avoid people who foam at the mouth and speak backwards. How to classify your friends.

Sociology 178: Sexual Deviance in Society – A socio-cultural look at exhibitionism, voyeurism, sadism, masochism, and other assorted perversions. Nymphomaniacs and where they can be found. Prerequisite: Permission of instructor. Students must supply own leather and chains.

Being Destructive Of These Ends

By Bob Gale

The actions leading to the founding of the United States of America as an independent nation were actions of rebellion.

In the Declaration of Independence it is written: "...all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness... That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. – That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government."

The judicial system of the United States is established to accomplish this protection as outlined in the Declaration of Independence. If and when the authorized government blatantly and repeatedly pursues a course of action which no longer attempts to protect these rights, it may then be concluded that this government is "...being destructive of these ends."

The rebellion establishing this country was legitimized by this criteria.

Kidnapping and rape are clear violations of "...Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness." Any government functioning in a manner promoting, ignoring, or failing to prohibit these activities to a reasonable extent is, "...being destructive of these ends."

On January 17, 1981, an individual was arrested in Connecticut and charged with kidnapping and rape. While this is a serious crime, it pales in comparison with the apparent ambivalence with which the legal system of Vermont has repeatedly returned this individual to society to, allegedly, commit this crime again.

First arrested in 1973 on three charges, the accused plea-bargained with the State of Vermont and only one plea was entered: guilty. Other charges of kidnapping were never brought to court. Before being brought to court on this lone charge the accused was admitted to the state hospital in Waterbury. In 1975 he was brought to court, convicted, and sentenced to six to 12 years. He was released late last year.

On December 7, 1980, he was again charged with kidnapping and rape.

On December 31, 1981, he was released on $5,000 bail.

On January 17, 1981, he was arrested and charged with kidnapping and rape in Connecticut.

Why has this individual been returned to society repeatedly after extensive warnings by psychiatric personnel that his aggressive behavior would continue? This was the report from the psychiatrist at the state hospital. It is usually very difficult to obtain any predictive statement from a psychiatrist.

The legal system which has allowed this process to occur is not functioning in its duty to protect the citizens. It is functioning in a manner to promote, ignore, or not actively prohibit these activities that are "...being destructive of these ends." (Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness). This is the same type of conclusion upon which the American Revolution was built.

Unless there are improvements in the legal-judicial system of the State of Vermont, there will be massive dissatisfaction with the poor job done of protecting these fundamental rights. This dissatisfaction will eventually lead to action.

CLEAN DRINKING WATER
SHOULD BE BURLINGTON'S AND UVM'S MOST PRECIOUS RESOURCE

BUT,BURLINGTON'S WATER SYSTEM HAS THREE MAJOR PROBLEMS:

1. THE QUALITY OF THE WATER IS NOT AS GOOD AS IT SHOULD BE.LEAD AND OTHER METALS HAVE BEEN FOUND IN UNIVERSITY AND RESIDENTIAL WATER. THERE IS TOO MUCH CHLORINE. THE WATER IS SOMETIMES DIRTY AND FISHY-TASTING. SUSPECTED CANCER-CAUSING CHEMICALS HAVE BEEN FOUND.THE RESERVOIRS, NEAR UVM, ARE UNCOVERED AND SUBJECT TO CONTAMINATION.
2. THE TREATMENT PLANT IS 75 YEARS OLD AND DETERIORATING BADLY.
3. IT CANNOT PRODUCE ENOUGH WATER TO MEET DEMAND ON HOT SUMMER DAYS.

Burlington needs a modern water treatment plant

History Professor Jeremy Felt

The People, Not The Process

By Wendy Goodrich

Jeremy Felt has been a history professor at UVM since 1957. During this time he has been the Chairman of the History Department, Director of Area and International Studies, Director of the Scandinavian Seminar, has had a Fulbright Professorship in Finland, and in 1976 received the Kidder Award which is given annually to the professor who has most enriched undergraduate life.

"The sixties were a time of great expansion here at UVM. The student population started growing rapidly and the number of history faculty alone rose from 6 members to 21. Yet the University was not effectively expanded, instead it was overbuilt. Inevitably, unfortunate results have occurred: one was a rise in the number of tenured professors, thus the number of positions for new faculty has decreased, and two, a larger more complex bureaucracy was formed to keep pace with the increasing size of the University.

"Because all bureaucratic systems are complex they concentrate on processes rather than on people. I think some administrators here need to view professors as unique individuals and negotiate with them on that level. It's clearly understood that faculty members need recognition. Some older, tenured professors feel increasingly outmoded and disturbed that sufficient efforts have not been made to retain their interest and commitment to the University. We are here – but we aren't encouraged to remain vital. And some of the younger faculty feel that in order to get tenure they must rely heavily on publication.

"Publication may be important, but it's a false issue to oppose scholarship to teaching. It isn't easy for a person to function at top levels on both these things at the same time, and there are other matters that need to be brought up to par with scholarship. One of these matters is advising.

"Currently I work part-time in the Office of the Dean of Arts and Sciences. One of the things I'm involved with over there is the present advising system. It is in need of improvement and the heart of this problem stems from this issue of people not being treated as human beings.

"Individuals are important. This, in my opinion, is the importance of studying history. History gives one an invaluable perception of people. In order to fully understand a person you must get an idea of what they have experienced in life. Changes occur in people because of specific historical events they have lived through.

"In light of this, the students at UVM are very interesting. There is no such thing as 'the students.' Every student I've talked to here refutes any stereotype. I think there is a large degree of alienation nationally among young people, and I'm curious to find out the degree of alienation at UVM compared to the national level.

"Recently I've been invited to write an article on youth for a Carnegie/Mellon University journal. What I'll be researching is the historical basis for the present state of the young people today. I feel strongly about this because to preserve humanity we must recognize moral, and other problems, faced by youth today (by youth I mean the 15-25 year old age group). The change in the value systems has led to dehumanization, which, in turn, has caused the present state of alienation.

"I'm very interested in the ideas of modern America, and also how successful reformers have been historically in bringing about change. I think what's important today, in modern America, is to treat each individual as a person, not as a part of a process."

Reagan Drops Temperature Controls

By Russell Flannery

President Reagan last Tuesday lifted a Carter Administration restriction requiring all public buildings to limit inside temperature to no higher than 65 degrees in the winter and no lower than 78 in the summer.

The Department of Energy has estimated that since the Carter declaration in April, 1979, over $4.5 billion or 123 million barrels of oil have been saved.

Reagan, in a proclamation, said that while controls "may result in a reduced consumption of fuel, I have concluded that the regulatory scheme designed to accomplish that objective imposes excessive regulatory burden and that voluntary and market incentives will achieve substantially the same benefit without the regulatory cost."

On campus, UVM Energy Manager Larry Snyder said Thursday that the suspension of Carter's restrictions "is not going to have any impact on the University because they're now part of University policy."

The elimination of the restrictions is consistent with the Reagan Administration's stated goal of reducing Government involvement in the energy field. The move followed last month's price decontrol of all domestic oil production, and immediately preceded proposed cuts in the government-backed Synfuels program.

The temperature controls program, created during a world oil shortage in early 1979 and renewed twice since then, had been criticized by some as "a paper requirement" due to difficulty in enforcement and the presence of loopholes in the order. For example, in buildings where one unit heats more than one room, only one room was required to be in compliance with the regulations.

Snyder said that UVM had adopted stringent heating standards "two or three years" before the federal requirement, and explained that "like the University, most institutions will continue the controls as a matter of good economics."

Striking the same theme, Burlington City Treasurer F. Lee Austin said Thursday "we are doing everything we can to conserve the dollars the taxpayers are paying." Concerning the Carter standards, he nonetheless noted that "some standards are fine in warmer climates, but here in the North, 68 degrees is a little bit too cold."

Public Interest Research Continues At UVM

By Terri Johnson

Several members of the former UVM branch of the Vermont Public Interest Research Group have formed VPIRC, a club to be sponsored by the UVM Student Association.

The new club has no official connection with VPIRG but maintains many of the same goals, according to club and former VPIRG Board of Trustees President Kirby Dunn. As a club sponsored by SA, VPIRC will be able to keep the VPIRG office in Billings Center and can claim a connection to the University, Dunn explained.

The club will not have members on the VPIRG Board of Trustees, as the VPIRG branch did as a member of the state organization. Nor will it have the services of a VPIRG staff member. But the VPIRG headquarters in Montpelier will provide advice to the club on how to set up and deal with political and environmental issues in the area.

According to Dunn, VPIRC will "focus on student interests and issues around campus and in Burlington instead of state issues," she says. They will deal with issues that are "relevant to the community and the school."

Some of VPIRG's current concerns are rent control, water quality on campus and in Burlington, and campus energy conservation. They plan to sponsor films and speakers to present these issues to the UVM community.

Dunn says that a small group of club members decided on these issues, but they remain open to other ideas. "We want to do what students want," she says.

VPIRG has an action committee that focuses on the issues, outlining bills and alerting Vermont legislators to the issues.

The club held an all-campus meeting on February 12 to provide information to interested students and recruit new members. About 20 students attended. The club still welcomes interested students to join.

The loss of VPIRG's membership resulted last year when student support of the $3 optional fee on the tuition bill dropped below 50% of the student population. A pact with the University Board of Trustees held that if and when less than half the students gave VPIRG their support, the group would not be allowed to request money on the tuition bill.

Physical Education Department Seeks 400% Funding Increase

By Reed Dewey

"When a student pays for tuition, there shouldn't be any extra fees tagged on," says Charles Christensen, Director of the University's Physical Education program. The P.E. department has requested a $26,000 budget appropriation for next year, $20,000 more than they received this year. According to Christensen, it is hoped that the increased funding will wipe out all extra fees that students are now required to pay when taking certain P.E. courses. Presently, almost 25 percent of the courses offered by the department require some fee.

Christensen pointed out that there wasn't always such a large amount of courses requiring additional fees. The problem arose in 1973 when severe budget cuts were implemented. UVM's football team was dropped, and "we lost the whole football staff, all of whom were teaching courses in the activity program," said Christensen. To meet student needs for a diverse offering of physical activity courses, "we went to offering courses with an added fee."

The present budget of $6,000 for part-time faculty and staff keeps the P.E. Department barely in the black most of the time. In the past, when money allocated for labor ran out "we paid for some part-time people through our operating budget," explained Christensen.

The P.E. Department breaks down their 69 activities into more than 151 sections. In theory, 1700 students must take courses in the P.E. department each year in order to fulfill distribution requirements. Christensen said "Because we know some students have scheduling difficulties, we probably offer enough sections to take care of 1,900 (students), but this does not give us much leeway."

This leaves only 100 spots per semester left open for those students that want to take more than the minimum P.E. requirement, and causes long lines at P.E. registration every semester.

The department tries to spend its few dollars in areas that will aid the most students. Course costs for part-time P.E. employees run around $150 per semester. If less than 12 people sign up for a course, it is usually dropped, and the savings can be channelled to a more popular section.

"Certainly, Physical Education is not one of the highest priorities of the administration," explained Christensen. He said that the department's faculties were very limited compared to other schools and wished the department could afford to hire more full time instructors.

The physical education department's request for $20,000 would be used to pay for part-time instructors that presently require an extra fee in the courses they teach.

State Aid Cuts Could Close Lund Home

By Maggie Hayes

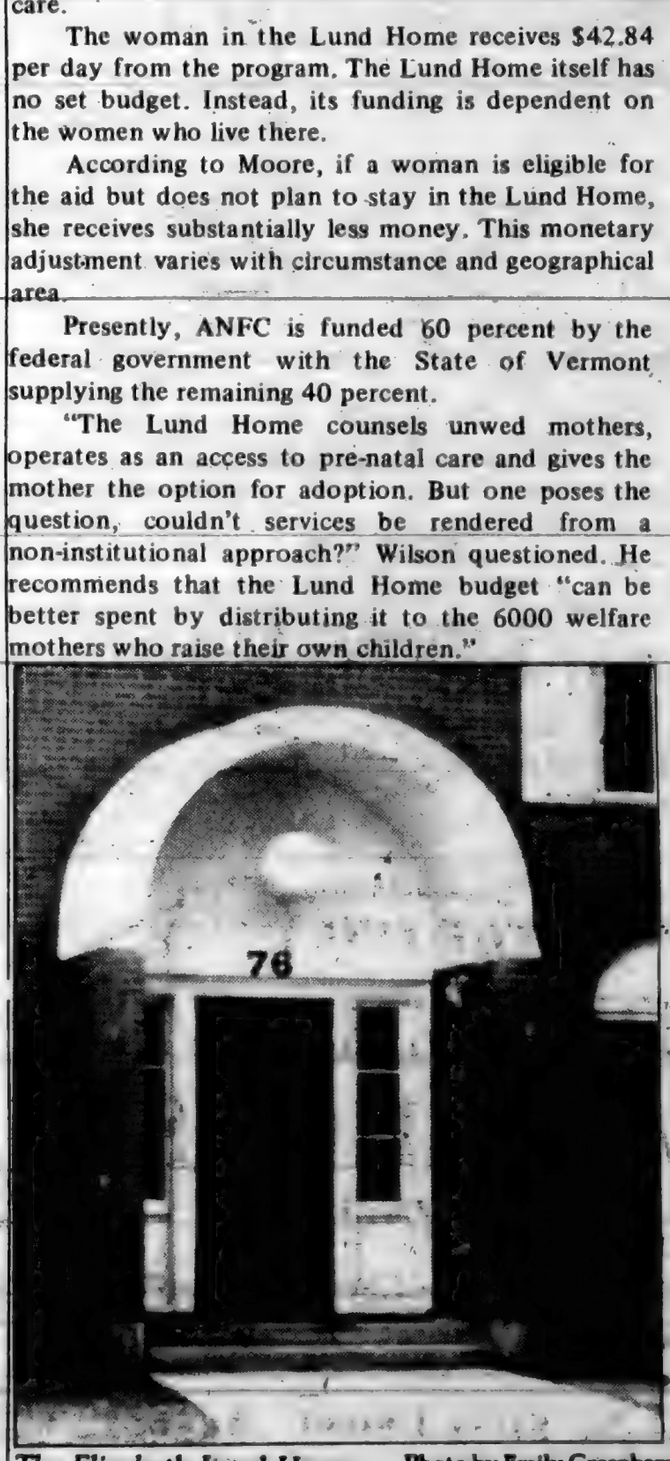
The termination of state aid to the unborn child, as recommended by David Wilson, Vermont Commissioner of Social Welfare, seriously threatens the future of the Elizabeth Lund Home in Burlington.

The Lund Home, established in 1893 as a shelter for unwed pregnant women, offers pre-natal care, counseling services, and tutorial programs. Recently, they have expanded to include the Residential Adolescent Program (RAP), offering group care to problem teenagers, and the Capital Resource Center, which contends with the problem of child abuse. Presently the home accommodates 25 women and approximately 40 staff positions.

The budget cut of Aid to Needy Families with Children (ANFC) program, presented to the Lund Home January 10, 1981, has been approved by Wilson, Sister Elizabeth Candon, Secretary of the Agency of Human Services, and Vermont Governor Richard Snelling.

"What we want to make clear is that there was never any antagonistic intention of de-funding the Lund Home," Candon said. The complication in the ANFC funding to the unborn child is that the money directly aids the mother and not the home itself, she said. Therefore, the mother can receive aid to the unborn child and decide not to use the facilities of the instutution. "So, in the whole perspective, pre-natal care may not be that effective," Candon said.

"We can't decrease the budget without hurting people, and the de-funding of the Lund Home was a difficult decision we had to make," said Wilson. But there are alternative methods of funding the pregnant mother and offering pre-natal care, he said.



Suzanne Moore, Executive Director of the Lund Home, explained that once the woman is admitted to the home, she applies to the welfare program, ANFC, for aid. If she is eligible, ANFC gives the money directly to the woman. She then turns it over to the home to cover all expenses of accommodation and care.

The woman in the Lund Home receives $42.84 per day from the program. The Lund Home itself has no set budget. Instead, its funding is dependent on the women who live there.

According to Moore, if a woman is eligible for the aid but does not plan to stay in the Lund Home, she receives substantially less money. This monetary adjustment varies with circumstance and geographical area.

Presently, ANFC is funded 60 percent by the federal government with the State of Vermont supplying the remaining 40 percent.

"The Lund Home counsels unwed mothers, operates as an access to pre-natal care and gives the mother the option for adoption. But one poses the question, couldn't services be rendered from a non-institutional approach?" Wilson questioned. He recommends that the Lund Home budget "can be better spent by distributing it to the 6000 welfare mothers who raise their own children."

Lund Home officials disagree. Alice Hobart, Director of Public Relations at the Lund Home, says, "The Social Welfare Agency does not seem to understand that pre-natal care is just as necessary as post-natal care." The healthy future of the unborn children born to a young teenager is a high risk factor because of poor nutrition, inadequate education about health, and the undeveloped physiological aspects of the young mother.

Hobart contends that the budget cut will not save Vermont any money because the lack of pre-natal care will only increase the cost of post-natal expenses, due to inevitable health complications of the infant as well as the mother. She said that the teenage mother can suffer from multiple health problems after childbirth that "sometimes even threatens her life."

"Without the services offered by the institution, low birth weights and abnormalities in the infant will increase sharply," said Hobart. Lund Home statistics show that of 244 women delivering there, only five babies weighed less than five pounds, well below the national average.

The proposed cut in the ANFC budget places the future in a "double bind" situation, Hobart said. Medicaid no longer funds legal abortion, resulting from a state decision, and now with the new budget cut there will be no monetary help for the pregnant mother to keep her infant. "Of course, the mother receives aid after the child is born," Hobart said, "but where is the aid when the woman really needs it, during pregnancy?" She concluded that this "double-bind" situation leads to unsafe abortion methods, or it narrows the possibility of the healthy future of the infant and mother.

The Lund Home emphasizes a preventive and curative approach, through counseling and pre-natal care. Hobart says that "the State has an idea that they can reduce pregnancy rates by de-funding aid to the unborn child." This is a misconception, she said, and "the extinction of the Lund Home will only result in many homeless mothers."

One of Wilson's main arguments for the cut is that the Lund Home is too expensive to run in comparison to other social programs. He said that the cost per woman in one year amounts to $14,000, while only $3,000 is needed to aid an unwed mother in a private home.

The statistics of the Lund Home disagree with Wilson's. "The average cost per girl is $3500 compared to $6000 for a woman and child on welfare," Hobart said. She said this difference in numbers may be the crux of the problem over the budget cut.

Hobart argues that the State does not realize the "dire situation" of the young mother. "The teenage mother comes to the Lund Home because there is no private home for them, but the State does not seem to recognize this factor." She added that women living at the Lund Home benefit from counseling services, after care, and foster care of infants waiting for adoption, which the pregnant woman outside the home doesn't receive.

In 1968, the Vermont Legislature appropriated $311,883 toward the cost of building the Lund Home on Glen Road. Cornelia S. Carpenter, President of the Lund Home Board of Trustees, stated in a public letter, "We would like to suggest that the State's considerable investment in our organization is in jeopardy if our funding is terminated." Hobart added that the RAP and the Family Resource Center programs will not survive without the continuation of the Lund Home program.

Pat Novotny, Public Information Coordinator of Planned Parenthood, supports the Lund Home. She says, "It is the only place to go to avoid abusive conditions." Last year, aid to Planned Parenthood was threatened due to the controversy over federally funded abortions, but the proposed budget reduction was defeated in Montpelier. Planned Parenthood has been asked to testify on the Lund Home's behalf, and Navotny said, "We have a great concern for pre-natal care and will work to maintain the valuable services rendered by the Lund Home."

Commissioner Wilson argues that the home only serves a small proportion of the population. Novotny says that is not "viable, because the fact remains – it is the only reliable source for infertile couples to go for adoption."

The Lund Home is an adoption agency licensed by the State of Vermont.

Candon pointed out that the Lund Home could find alternatives, either by changing the scope of the home or seeking direct aid from other state funds. She said, "However, I don't really think that State aid is feasible when you consider the inadequate size of Vermont's $92 million budget."

Due to the lack of alternative funding sources, the potential passage of the proposed budget cut inevitably will lead to the end of the Lund Home, the two co-existing programs, and the services it offers as an adoption agency. In reply to this outlook, Candon said, "money has to be prioritized and it was a painful decision – a very difficult choice. But, it can't be helped – the end is always less than you desire."

Abortion Rights Group Flexes Legislative Muscle

By Carol Hills

The two opposing camps in the ever controversial abortion rights issue are flexing their legislative muscles. This session of Congress may alter the 1973 Supreme Court Roe v. Wade decision guaranteeing women the right to choose abortion in certain cases. With 29 U.S. Senators having already given their support to some form of a Human Life Amendment outlawing abortion, and the introduction of a series of related bills at the state and federal level, a grass roots political organization is working frantically to maintain support for legal abortion.

"We're going to lose the right of abortion if people don't get involved in the electoral politics. It took a long time for us to realize it is an electoral issue," said Ellen Furnari, Campus Organizer for the National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL)/Vermont. "The New Right is organized and dedicated and they successfully sought out an electoral arena while the rest of us were busy holding demonstrations and signing petitions."

NARAL/Vermont is one of 34 statewide membership organizations affiliated with the National Abortion Rights Action League. Started two years ago by a seed grant, its membership has grown to 1000 with the largest membership residing in Chittenden County.

As a political organization its goals are to keep the choice of abortion safe, legal, and affordable for all women. "We're not here to argue or convince but to organize the majority who are pro-choice," said Furnari.

NARAL staff members inform and attract new members, keep abreast of state and federal legislation regarding abortion, and encourage pro-choice supporters to get involved in political issues directly affecting them.

Ever since Congress approved the Hyde Amendment in 1974 denying Medicaid funds for abortion, state and federal legislatures have introduced bills aimed at further undermining abortion rights.

Nineteen of the required 34 State Legislatures have called for a Constitutional Convention and 17 Anti-abortion resolutions have been proposed since the opening of the 97th Session of Congress. "I think that an anti-abortion Constitutional Amendment will come out of the House and Senate either this year or next," said Furnari. Because of the push for a Pro-Life Amendment, NARAL has targeted Vermont as among the 13 states that must maintain their pro-choice stance to prevent its implementation.

Fifty percent of all abortions in Vermont are performed by physician's assistants at the Vermont Women's Health Center on North Avenue in Burlington. Founded in 1972, it was the first clinic of its kind in the United States. Its aim has been to provide as broad a range of gynecological care as possible within a community health care setting.

As a collectively organized, non-profit, tax-exempt organization, the Center gets its primary source of income from patient fees. Twenty percent of the patients' fees are covered under Medicaid. A sliding scale based on a woman's ability to pay exists for those not covered by Medicaid.

While this protects them slightly from the effects of federal budget cuts, Furnari said, it does not make them immune to legislation pending in the Vermont State Senate that would require a licensed physician to perform an abortion. Another bill under consideration would require Physician's Assistants to be trained in medical schools, as opposed to the present training they receive by other Physician's Assistants at the Center. If approved, both bills would adversely affect the cost and availability of an abortion.

To alert the UVM community of the threat to legalized abortion Furnari has set up post card tables in Billings urging students to write their senators and representatives.

She said that many men have stopped at the table to express their concern. "Although it is a woman's issue, if you're a responsible male it's your problem too. Men will certainly be challenged if abortion is no longer available."

Professor Beth Mintz of the Sociology Department is particularly alarmed over the situation of low-income women seeking abortions. "I think it's unconscionable that women who can afford it can and women who can't are prevented. Legislating abortion in any form takes the issue out of women's hands." It is a personal, not political, issue, she added.

Peggy Stevens, Assistant to the Director at the University Health Services, said, "The Burlington area is fortunate to have the services of the Vermont Women's Health Center and the University Associates in O.B.G.Y.N. It would be a hardship if abortions were outlawed."

Linda Beers, Nurse Practitioner at the University infirmary, added, "It's important that the UVM community know that its right to choose is being threatened."

Abenaki Indians Want Native Land Returned

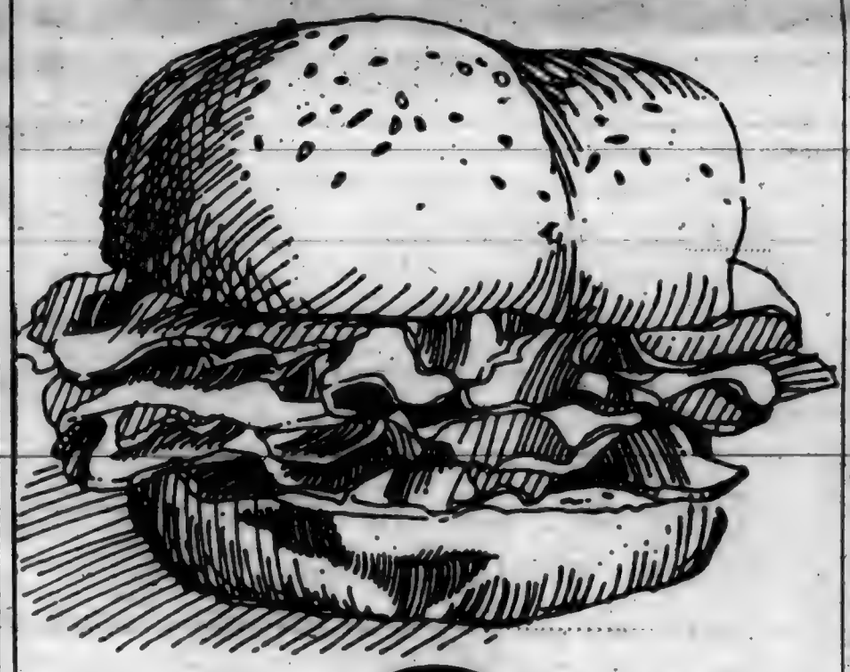
By Amy Revelt

Abenaki Indians, or "People of the East," have lived on the banks of the Missisquoi River in northern Vermont for several thousand years, where they prospered hunting and fishing, but were forced to end this subsistence lifestyle when Vermont began to develop in the 1800's.

Today, the Abenakis want to be granted Federal recognition as a sovereign Indian tribe, and are petitioning the government to get back their native land, which now lies completely within Missisquoi National Park.

Miles Jensen, the Director of the Abenaki Self-Help Association, Dr. John Moody, a researcher on the Abenaki, and Homer St. Francis, a former chief of the Abenaki tribe, chaired a discussion last Thursday on the tribe's problems.

According to Jensen, "the United States government has over 200 definitions of what an 'Indian' is, depending on which government agency one is dealing with." The petition being worked on now will have to meet seven basic criteria, including a complete tribal geneology, a tribal history, a history of tribal government and proof of political continuity.



The research being done now to meet these criteria is being done by Dr. Moody, a native Vermonter and a graduate of Dartmouth College. The biggest problem, Moody said, now is that the Abenaki Indians do not have many records of their past, because they rely on the spoken word throughout generations to record their history. The federal government, however, requires more concrete evidence. To this end, the finished docu-

McNeil, City Attorney, Scans Issues

By Bill Hall

Proposals that will appear on Burlington's March 3 ballot were discussed by City Attorney Joseph McNeil in an interview this weekend. McNeil, 36, would not publicly align himself with any candidate for office. However, he did comment on such issues as the 65 cent tax, the Fair Housing Commission, and the Kill-A-Watt Conservation campaign.

The question of the formation of a Burlington Fair Housing Commission will go before Burlington citizens on a special ballot in April. McNeil acknowledged the need for some form of rent control in the city. "The commission under the proposed draft would have authority, upon complaint, to consider any rent increase and make a judgment as to whether it was fair and equitable... if it found it wasn't, then it would have the authority to roll back an increase," explained McNeil.

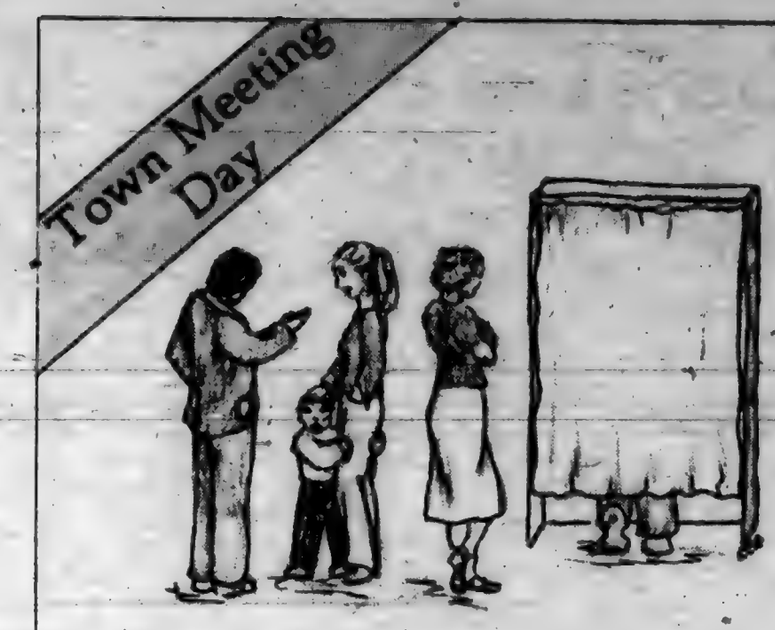
"That's where the Mayor jumped ship. He supported a housing task force but would not support autonomous financing." - McNeil

The commission would consist of seven members, who would sit in a "quasi-judicial" manner. They would take testimony on individual cases and hand down decisions as in a regular court.

An annual budget has not yet been planned, and McNeil admitted this has been a source of some dispute. Originally, it was proposed that the commission would be self-sufficient, receiving operating costs from a charge levied on landlords of 10 dollars per living unit. The budget was planned to be autonomous from City Hall, making it independent of fiscal controls. "That's where the Mayor jumped ship," said McNeil. "He supported a housing task force, but would not support autonomous financing."

A 65 cent tax increase proposal will appear on the ballot March 3rd. One of the things this 30 percent increase over the present tax would do is allow for the hiring of eight new men each in the city's police and fire departments. Opponents of the tax have questioned such rapid expansion of the departments, claiming that two or three men could be hired at a time. McNeil felt that was a possibility, but pointed out that the recommendation for eight policemen came from the Police Commission. "They convinced the City Council that the need existed," explained the City Attorney of 11 years. McNeil went on to say that during two or three public meetings last summer and fall, citizens testified, and expressed a desire for better police protection, especially with regard to more police walking beats.

The eight new firemen would be hired to staff an ambulance which is located at the city's North End station. "The concern is that just utilizing the ambulances at the central station might create a situation where the ambulance is down at the South End and something occurs at the North End," McNeil said.



Also on the March 3rd ballot is a two million dollar bond proposal designed to increase energy conservation. The "Kill-A-Watt" conservation program would be provided by the Burlington Electric Department (BED) to interested homeowners. The utility would equip each home with insulation for hot water heaters and wall sockets, flow restrictors for shower heads, and a system which would shut off hot water heaters by radio control at peak hours. "The program is optional," explained McNeil, "but if you did take it... then you could not get the water heater insulation and the flow restrictors and not agree to the control over your water heater."

A 12 million dollar bond for renovating Burlington's water system will appear on the ballot as well. McNeil, whose brother-in-law is Water Resources Superintendent James Howley, pointed out that "Burlington is running out of capacity. Its existing system will not supply the needs of the city, given its current growth, by the end of the 80s." The bond proposal would include provision for rehabilitating the city's water treatment plant, covering the reservoirs on Main Street, and enlarging the pumping capacity of the system. The renovation will be expensive, and the average annual water bill is expected by some to more than double.

Recently, McNeil has been involved in testimony concerning the amount of control the State Agency of Development and Community Interest can exert over the Burlington Planning Commission. There has been an effort by the state to enact two provisions, an administrative audit and an administrative challenge, into the local zoning and planning laws. The audit would allow the agency to review any ordinances made by the Burlington Planning Commission. If not in agreement, then the state could challenge those decisions in court. "Our feeling is that this is simply unnecessary and unwarranted state interference in local matters," said McNeil.

Before his appointment, McNeil held the position of Deputy State's Attorney, and he practiced law privately.

Mayoral Forums Produce Heated Debate

By Richard Hyland

Two forums held in Burlington last week, sponsored by the League of Women Voters and the Center for Research on Vermont, enabled voters to hear for the first time all four mayoral candidates answer specific questions on the issues. The forums appeared to have narrowed the race into a contest between incumbent Democratic Mayor Gordon Paquette and Independent Coalition candidate Bernard Sanders, as questions were directed to these men.

One issue which arose frequently concerned the proposed development of the city's waterfront. Sanders decried this prospect of the Pomerleau real estate agency as being beneficial only to business interests and the wealthy. "I think there's something wrong with building expensive condominiums on the lakefront when five blocks away on Front St. and North Ave., there are elderly people who are cold because they can't afford heat," he said. Paquette defended the construction project, saying that low and medium income housing could not be built on the lakefront, given the high cost of the land. He maintained that since a project like this would increase the city's tax base, property taxes would be held down for all residents.

Richard Bove, of the Taxpayer's Party, said he was not opposed to the luxury condominiums, but he expressed concern about the shortage of housing that was created by the urban renewal of the early 1970's. He cited overcrowding in the North End as a result of this shortage in the central city.

Another independent candidate, Joseph McGrath Jr., who has maintained a strict platform calling for more police protection, stated that he was in favor of more housing also.

Objections to Mayor Paquette's support for a 65-cent tax boost were varied.

Bove stated that the budget could be cut in many places including the 80,000 allotted for aerial maps, and he questioned the value of the additional 8 cops and firemen. "If you call the Burlington Fire Dept., does it take them two hours to get there?" he asked rhetorically.

Bove believes that any tax increases should have come piecemeal in the last several years. Sanders did not disagree with the necessity of the proposed allocations, but he criticized Paquette for relying on the property tax to finance them. Sanders called for a "junking of the property tax system" in favor of more progressive measures such as a city-wide personal and corporate income tax. The candidate also stated that he would seek $250,000 from UVM and the MCHV in compensation for their "drain of city resources" as tax-exempt institutions. McGrath said he too was opposed to the additional taxation except to finance a new police radio system and the hiring of more cops. Paquette maintained his support of the increased tax rate and insisted that it is to pay for services which the citizens have asked for. He also said that the "increase would be 3½ times what it is now" if he hadn't pursued his programs for commercial development.

Thorny issues, such as the decaying Lakeside Ave. underpass and the proposed Southern Connector, were carefully avoided by Paquette and exploited by his opponents in front of a large contingent of South End residents at one forum.

Sanders said he "could not see why 16 million was being spent to ruin a beautiful neighborhood," and Bove questioned why Burlington could condemn property for the Southern Connector, but not for the waterfront property.

The forums were not without a display of verbal jousts among some of the candidates. Mayor Paquette suggested that Mr. Bove was "too busy making spaghetti" to attend public meetings concerning city development and denounced Sanders' progressive tax proposals as a "Robin Hood" scheme. Sanders responded with an allusion to "Mayor Pomerleau" controlling the city's development and Bove joked about the Jordan Marsh Dept. Store that has been perennially "coming to Burlington." McGrath, who has maintained a low-key public image throughout his campaign, did not participate in the repartees.

Sanders Envisions New Influence For UVM Students, Faculty

By Jonathan Goodspeed

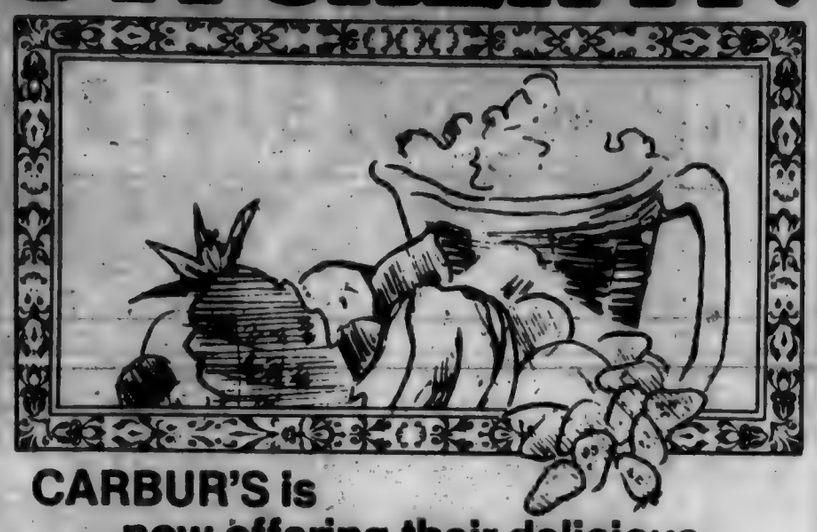
In a casual interview at the Oasis diner Tuesday, Independent Coalition mayoral candidate Bernard Sanders outlined programs to allow UVM students to actively participate in city affairs and for the city to raise revenue from the University.

The emphasis of his talk was on "a totally new relationship" he foresees between the students and the town. "It's a student's city too, and I would be delighted to have student representation at city hall," Sanders said.

Sanders said he wants both faculty and student involvement in Burlington's affairs. "I want to get support from the best socially-oriented faculty members. The faculty has been quiet for too long, and they need to be involved," he said.

Sanders said also that he "wants to tap the students' idealistic feelings." He said this would involve many things, such as having UVM students tutor younger students in the community or providing for more active student participation in housing problems, and possibly giving students a formal voice at city hall. "Students have a right to contribute and to make amends," Sanders explained.

"I have been to campus and talked to a number of faculty members," the Independent Coalition candidate said. He has met with Professor George Albee of the Psychology department several times. "We've got to tap Albee's expertise," he said, referring to Albee's experience as a social psychologist.



"Support on campus has grown. I've talked to faculty members in the departments of English, Agriculture, Religion, Art, History, and Nutrition," Sanders said. With the support of these UVM faculty members, he is certain that a good University-city program could be developed.

"Consider housing, for instance," Sanders said. "Students are now being made the fall guy. They are being ripped off, and then also being used to evict others." To help prevent this "rent gouging," Sanders supports formation of the Fair Housing Commission. His plans include having landlord and tenant representatives testify before that quasi-judicial board, in the event of disputes.

"Essentially I want better communication between students and the city," Sanders said. "There is a wide gap between the two which has to be bridged. For instance, consider the 'spring fling,' which the students have every spring. The taxpayers do not want to have to pick up this burden every year. The students have to show some respect. On the other hand, if done properly, I could see closing down Church Street for a concert some afternoon."

If elected, Sanders said he would also like to raise revenue from UVM and the Medical Center. "The students receive city services," he said, and for these services he feels the business community should in some way be paid back. He said approximately $250,000 from the university and $250,000 from the Medical Center would be used as general revenue for the city.

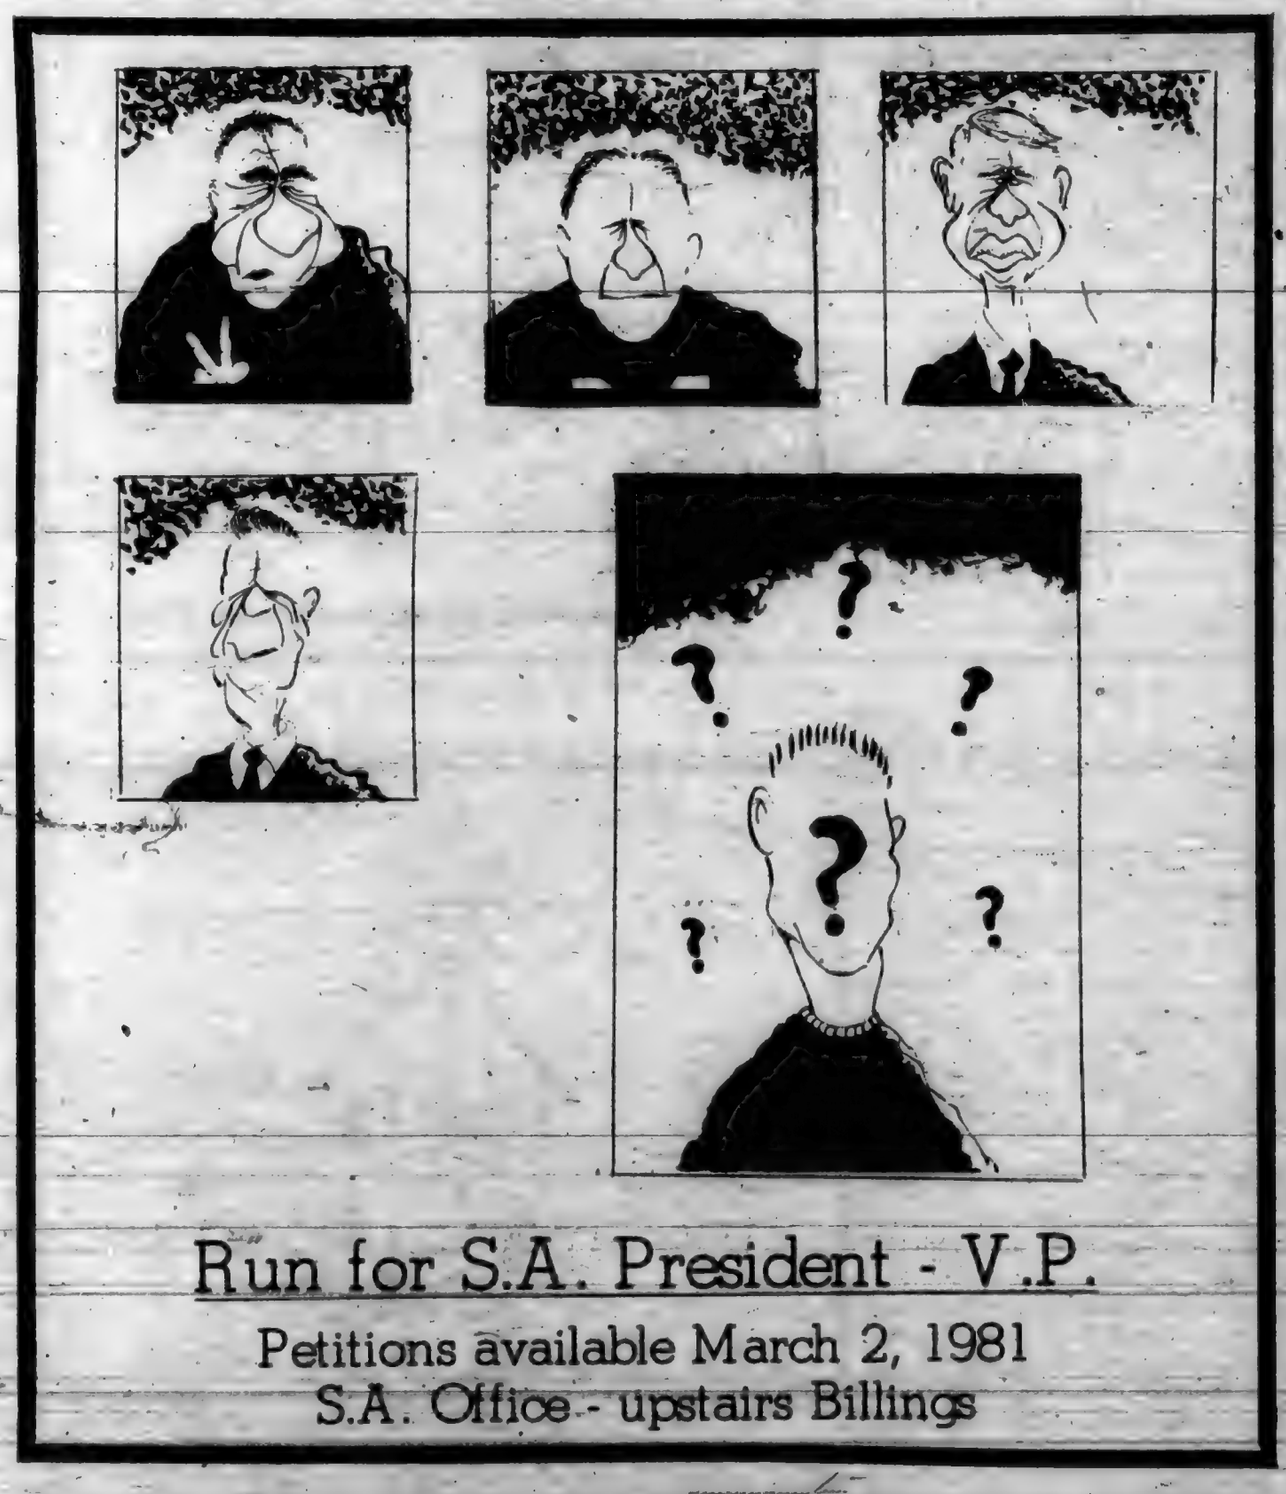
ment, to be completed within a year, will be an estimated 10,000 pages.

Dr. Moody explained that ten years ago there was not one account of the Abenaki tribe in the history of Vermont. "I was a native of Vermont and a Vermont ethnographer and I had never heard of the Abenaki." According to Moody, Homer St. Francis and others began to organize the tribe in 1974, by forming a tribal council. Through this group the 1500 Abenaki Indians in Swanton began to assert their Indian heritage. "These people have had to be white, look white and act white in every aspect in order to survive," says Moody, "but they've kept their culture... and turning back history to find this is the challenge ahead."

"If the U.S. enters war, why do our people have to fight their wars?"
-St. Francis

When asked why the Abenaki people want recognition, St. Francis said "We're living in a white man's world... we've been submerged for over 200 years." He explained that the goal of the Indians was to establish a reservation, which would be located on their native land. Here the Indians would be a sovereign tribe, and would enjoy unlimited hunting and fishing privileges. "But," St. Francis added, "an Indian takes what he needs and only what he needs."



According to Jensen, there are three goals to the recognition plan – farming, raising bait fish, and commercial eel fishing.

As it stands right now, Governor Snelling has refused to give sovereignty to the Abenaki, although he does recognize them as an Indian tribe. With recognition the Indians are receiving federal funds, but these have always been of a precarious nature, and President Reagan's new budget policies potentially worsen the situation. The receipt of funds, however, does not give them the fishing and hunting privileges on the land that recognition would: "If the U.S. enters war, why do our people have to fight their wars?" says St. Francis about the sovereignty issue. On Thanksgiving Day 1976, then Governor Thomas Salmon granted both sovereignty and state recognition to the Abenaki Indians. When Governor Snelling came to office, however, he rescinded the sovereignty, allegedly under pressure from fishing and hunting groups.

In 1978 the Abenakis went to their regional Fish and Game warden with a petition of 1500 names, but the warden never turned it in. When the Indians went to the banks of the Missisquoi to fish shortly thereafter, the warden made several arrests, while the Abenakis gave him a citation for trespassing on their land. The issue is still undecided by the courts.

Jensen describes the struggle for recognition in Congress as one of "a lot of underground issues." For example, he says that one papermill is lobbying to use the trees on the land. Also, many recreation groups, mainly the hunting and fishing interests, don't want to lose the real estate.

But the Abenakis are still claiming their rights and right now are in the process of gathering the research to petition the government. "It's not a legal decision now," says Jensen, "it's a political decision to be made in Washington."

Enrollment Increases Catch Colleges Off Guard

By Susan Calhoun

(CPS) – In defiance of worries that drastic enrollment drops in the 1980s would tempt colleges into trying to lure any old warm, tuition-paying bodies to their campuses, a large number of schools are actually starting to limit their enrollments in the face of what one university business manager calls "the budget squeeze of the eighties."

Unexpectedly large enrollment increases – national enrollment is up 3.2 percent over fall, 1979, according to the National Center for Education Statistics – have gravely strained campus services across the country, exacerbating housing shortages, classroom overcrowding, and understaffing problems.

But the money pools where colleges would ordinarily go to help pay for expanding campus services have largely dried up.

Doug Norman, information director at the University of Tennessee, says the money simply isn't available to alleviate these problems, especially at state universities which rely most heavily on state funding.

"The cost of everything – library materials, utilities, faculty – is going up, but state funding is not," Norman explains. "The only way we can cover our costs is to have less students, which theoretically means less costs for the university."

Indeed, Tennessee's Board of Trustees has decided that Tennessee's Knoxville campus should cut enrollment by 1000 students by the fall of 1981.

Norman adds the trustees made the decision only after the state assured them that the university's appropriations would not diminish along with enrollment. As at most state schools, Tennessee's appropriations were based on enrollment until last fall.

State funding also became a particularly bad problem last year for Cleveland State University, says Admissions Director Richard Dickerman, when his office misjudged fall enrollment. The state based its appropriations on CSU's enrollment predictions, as it has done every year, but when a record 19,250 – over a thousand more than CSU had predicted – showed up, Dickerman says, "we knew we goofed."

M.A.S.T. Choppers Save Lives

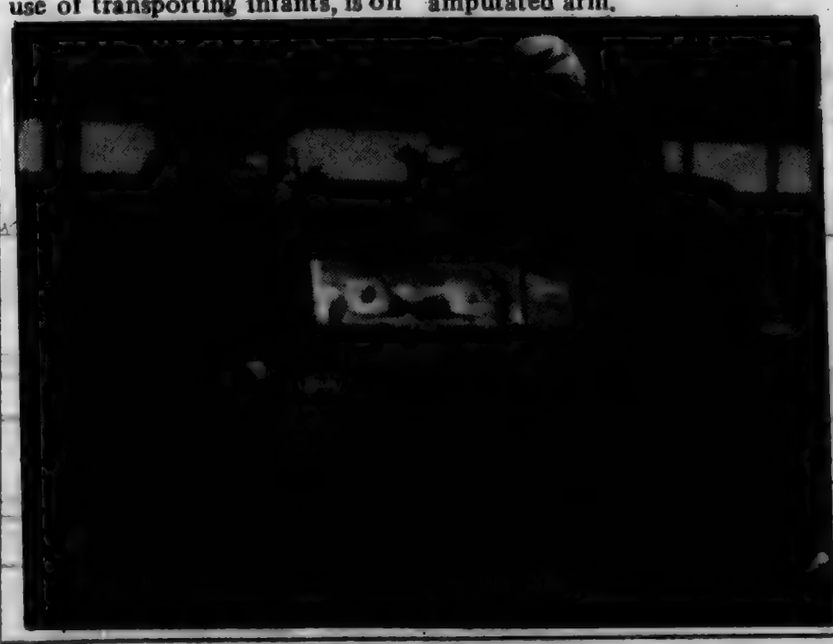
You are driving on back roads in northern New York or Vermont, and you fall asleep at the wheel and crash. A police officer arrives at the scene and determines that your condition requires immediate medical attention and technical equipment which is hours away by ambulance. A call is relayed to Detachment 18, 40th Aerospace Rescue and Recovery Squadron at the Plattsburgh Air Force Base. In ten minutes a UH-1N helicopter is on its way.

Medical missions such as this are authorized to Detachment 18 by the Military Assistance to Safety and Traffic (MAST). MAST is a program initiated in 1970 with the cooperation of the departments of Transportation; Health, Education and Welfare; and Defense. Charted by congress as a military expenditure, MAST is no added expense to the government. And it does not cost the patient a cent. Detachment 18 is a volunteer public service, and is the only service of this type in New England. Six other Air Force bases and eighteen army posts make up the nationwide MAST network.

Detachment 18 trains primarily for combat rescue missions, which have priority during war time. At other times, these men respond to emergencies in a 100 mile radius of the Plattsburgh Air Force Base. These "Hueys" (nickname for the helicopters used) can be seen and heard landing and taking off from the landing pad behind the shoeboxes, just outside the emergency area of the Medical Center Hospital.

Most of the "saves" are infants rushed to Mary Fletcher's intensive care nursery, unique in Northern New England. That Vermont has the lowest infant mortality rate in the country, according to the Department of Health, proves success. A piece of equipment known as an "isolette," for the use of transporting infants, is on board at all times.



MAST has responded to farm accidents, heart attacks, gun shot wounds. They can transport blood, medicines, and human organs for transplant. Members of Detachment 18 are also trained for mountain rescues, ice fishing accidents, and small airplane crashes.

A normal crew consists of a pilot, a co-pilot, one pararescueman (PJ), and a flight engineer. Most of the men in Detachment 18 have seen combat duty.

The PJ's are highly qualified in scuba diving, mountaineering, parachuting and survival. They can diagnose spinal injuries, chest and head trauma, stroke, and hemorrhaging. They can also perform minor operations such as catheterization, emergency childbirth, and tracheotomies. If necessary, they may administer fluids, shots, and certain pain killing drugs. Unlike paramedics who must consult a doctor before taking any action, PJ's make many of their own decisions.

Next of kin will sometimes ride with the patient to comfort him and to be available at the receiving hospital. If the patient's condition is deteriorating, a doctor or nurse may fly with the patient. Dr. Heidi Root, a resident doctor at Mary Fletcher Hospital, has flown with the MAST unit on a few occasions. She appreciates the service offered by the Air Force. "I think it's terrific having it (MAST). It has saved lives." As a cardiologist, Root's experiences with MAST have been transferring heart patients who needed the technology provided at the Medical Center.

In 1977, a Vermont teenager needing a cornea transplant was notified of a donor. Such an operation must be arranged within four hours of removal from the donor. A MAST crew flew the patient to Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston within an hour after notification. During the Lake Placid World Cup skiing championships, Italian racer Leonardo David was flown to the Vermont Medical Center after a severe fall in competition. A five-year-old girl was flown to the Medical Center in time to reconnect her amputated arm.

Penny Carter, almost seven months pregnant, gave a premature birth to a two pound, two ounce baby at the Champlain Valley Physician's Hospital in Plattsburgh. The umbilical cord was wrapped around the newborn's neck, choking him.

"I was very upset, frightened, and couldn't stop crying," Mrs. Carter said. "But I felt my baby had a fighting chance to hold on to life."

The special intensive care nursery at the Medical Center in Burlington was one chance for the tiny infant. At best it was an 80 minute ambulance ride plus a 10 minute ride on the ferry. Detachment 18 arrived in Burlington with Seth Adam Carter in less than 15 minutes. After three months he was released from the hospital.

From Plattsburgh to Burlington it's usually a three hour drive if one chooses Rouses' Point Bridge at the Northern tip of Lake Champlain near the Canadian border. That time may be cut down by riding the ferry, but that presents hazardous conditions to a critical patient. Winds may reach speeds up to 75 mph causing waves as high as 15 feet.

Some smaller hospitals in the area are limited in certain fields and lack equipment which can be provided by the Medical Center in Burlington. Residents in the area concerned with emergency transportation began looking for alternate ways to rush patients to hospitals. Detachment 18 of the MAST unit supplied this need, especially crucial to backroad areas. 480 rescues have been made since 1976 when the MAST unit at the Plattsburgh Air Force Base first began.

When emergencies arise, the attending physicians request MAST service by contacting the receiving hospital and the helicopter rescue detachment. Detachment 18 then contacts the Plattsburgh AFB wing commander to get their request approved. They must seek approval because they are stationed in Plattsburgh to support the 380th Bomb Wing and train for rescue missions in combat.

The PJ's are informed about the patient's condition by a doctor as the pilot and co-pilot are briefed on the location, weather and flight plan. Meanwhile, the flight engineer prepares the aircraft, equipping it with cargo slings, rescue hoist, and search lights. They must also check engine performance gauges and scan for low flying aircrafts. The receiving hospital must be prepared at the landing pad with fire trucks, emergency vehicles, and security. Although this process may seem complicated, ground time usually does not exceed ten minutes.

The cruising speed is approximately 100 kilometers per hour, but the helicopter can reach a maximum speed of 130 kph.

The UH-1N helicopter is manufactured by the Bell Helicopter Company and weighs 10,500 lbs. Its length is 57 feet 3 inches and width is 9 feet 1 inch. A "Huey" can stay airborn for three hours. The aircraft's cargo sling has a capacity of 5,000 pounds and litter capacity is three persons. The cruising speed is approximately 100 kilometers per hour, but the helicopter can reach a maximum speed of 130 kph.

The members of the flying ambulance service find more satisfaction in this type of lifesaving rescue than routine training programs. They reap the personal satisfaction of tangible human benefit. The patients are grateful for this service and so is the administration at the Medical Center in Burlington. Herluf V. Olson, president of the Mary Fletcher Hospital, wrote in a letter to Lieutenant Colonel Forest Kimsey, former MAST Military Coordinator, "Our hospital and the people in Northern New York and Vermont owe you and your men a debt that can not be paid in material terms." Thomas J. Riley, Director of Public Relations at the hospital, stated in reference to the men of Detachment 18, "They really deserve a lot of credit, these highly trained individuals are doing a great job."

There is a civilian committee which is essential to the organization of the MAST program at the Plattsburgh AFB. They conduct meetings to discuss and improve the program, and raise money for its benefit. The U.S. Air Force, medical people, and civilians cooperate to facilitate a program which no city in this region could afford. At the same time, the Air Force becomes closer to the community and vice-versa. No one can appreciate the dedication of Detachment 18 more than the 480 rescued patients.

We, the following faculty members at the University of Vermont and others, support the candidacy of Bernard Sanders for Mayor and call for a new mutually beneficial relationship between the University and the City.

Basic Training And Back

One Flew Over the Chicago Nest

By Bob Devost

During the past 45 days I entered active service and basic training in the Navy, was then Honorably Discharged, and, upon leaving the Navy, flew to Los Angeles, California on a small commuter flight to Visalia. After one week in California, I took the Greyhound "Express" along Highway 80 back to Vermont.

I am very much aware that I may be writing for a favorable audience, that many of you (the vast majority of you being students) look upon military service as a necessity in the real world, yet more than willing to let that task fall on someone else's shoulders.

This is not an anti-military piece. Its only purpose is to share with you my personal insights into the Navy which I gathered in Basic Training.

On April 26, 1980 I signed with the Navy as an enlistee instead of seriously attempting Officer Candidate School (OCS). As an enlistee, I could be guaranteed my area of interest — journalism. My goal? To perhaps become a military spokesman during a foreign conflict, masterfully using words like "incursion" and "Vietnamazation." I should note here that straight out of High School in '72 I tried the Navy and served slightly longer than Mark Twain did in the Confederate Army (2 weeks)... I was then Honorably Discharged.

On December 1, 1980, I entered active duty. After taking basically all of 1980 off after college and meeting a woman that gave me the world, I thought I was more than ready for round two in the military.

The story really begins in Manchester, N.H. at the AFEES (the Armed Forces Entry Examination Station). Declared fit for duty, I was driven with several others by a cab-limo service from Manchester to Logan Airport outside Boston.

Arriving in Chicago at approximately 8 p.m. (after being up since 5 a.m.) dozens of peons-to-be awaited the military buses. From the first moment on the bus, conventional freedom no longer existed.

As we debarked the bus at the Great Lakes Recruit Training Center, the classic cold Chicago wind was spitting snow.

At the gate, after only a minute or two of confusion, our "welcoming" party arrived.

Graphic by Caroline Arlen

After being taken through a barbed wire maze between buildings, we arrived at the Induction Center.

"Move you FKG Dickheads!!" "What the FKS wrong Recruit?" From 9 p.m. to approximately 3:50 a.m., we were harassed severely while filling out forms. Finally to bed, we slept one hour. At 4:30 our day began.

Chow at 5:30, then our chemotherapy haircuts at 6:00. Our last contact with whatever normal world we left behind was a dawn phone call to loved ones. One call, no more than five minutes.

In basic training, you are at best one of the happy people in the 1930's film Metropolis, walking drones. For the first few weeks, we were not permitted to hear outside news. What we were allowed to read, Navy manuals, are written on a sixth grade level. After learning for four years to question absolutes and think in the abstract, this "Dick and Jane" material initiated my downfall. Another major reason for my rapid loss of interest in basic training was the requirement of learning how to fold my T-shirts and underwear in forms only Frank Lloyd Wright would appreciate.

The major reason I took action to begin my discharge was that I thought, at least once, my Constitutional rights had been violated along with others in my Company.

THE LAW

In some areas, military and civilian law differ greatly. The basic articles of law governing military personnel are written in the Uniform Code of Military Justice. In the armed forces, routine and "shakedown" inspections are normal and often practiced as a precautionary measure against soldiers harboring weapons or contraband. Article 31 in the military code guards against "inspections" as an excuse for illegal searches.

Each company of men lives in their "home," the barracks. Your bunk and locker are your castle. In your locker you have two approximately 8 by 11 inch drawers, each three inches high that is yours and off limits to everyone. This drawer can not be searched unless there is probable cause and/or a search warrant issued. But "probable cause" is wide open for interpretation. The odds are heavy that any argument or charge you may file can be turned against you. If in any way you appear to be disrespectful, or if you, in their view, "fall out of line," you open yourself to counter charges.

ARTICLE 134

Under the Military Code, I came face to face with Article 134, known as the General Article. In brief, it states that you can be charged with a crime or offense under Article 134 that may not be covered under any other article.

Before what I still believe was an illegal search, I had on one occasion refused to sign my "hard card," a record kept by the Petty Officer of your Company. I refused to sign because under the Military Code, as in civilian law, I understood that you do not have to sign anything that will incriminate you. This is true, I was told, except that it only applies to "formal charges." After these two events, I told my company commander that I questioned my choice to join the Navy. Such thoughts are normal and there is a major lesson to be learned here. The two words that are mortal sins in the military are "I think."

I was punished and sent to the Positive Motivation Unit, known as PMU. By punished I mean heavy verbal abuse. Any wrong move or imperfection resulted in point blank verbal abuse followed by punitive exercises. I think it's important to note that in the Navy, boot camp is 99 percent a mental, or head game. Physical exercises can be rough. One always saw the ambulance coming and going on base, yet exercise helps release the stress, and it numbed my mind. In PMU I was in phase one of leaving the Navy.

Since day one I was marked as a potential leader in my company and was transferred to an honor company at basic training. This is a company for individuals with high test scores, advanced education, and for height and appearance. I was put on the drill team, much like the Marine Corps TV advertisement where a crack team performs at ceremonies.

FROM PEAK TO VALLEY

First, I had to take a psychological evaluation and was found sound and sane. With me here were the ex-cons of the Navy, all those either one step from the brig, those who had gone AWOL or punched someone out, those who were medically unfit, and those of "CooCoo Nest" fame who had lost a few marbles by Navy standards, or were faking it.

I love this country and believe in it, but it is not a blind faith. Democracy can only be

Primal Screaming Relieves Exam Stress

St. Louis, MO (CPS) – If nothing else, December, 1980 exams helped push a somewhat new campus fad half way across the country to St. Louis, where thousands of Washington University students joined a mass Primal Scream during exam time.

Developed over a decade ago by Dr. Arthur Janov as an individual therapy, Primal Scream has become a popular exam-time means of venting frustrations among groups of students. Until recently, most of those groups had been at eastern schools.

A college Scream consists of anywhere from two to thousands of people gathering together, usually at night, simply to scream away their bottled-up anxieties.

Over 2000 students and faculty members gathered in Washington University's common square in St. Louis during last December's finals period, and sustained their screams for half an hour. Dr. Max Okenfuss, a Russian history professor at Washington, told the Associated Press that he hadn't witnessed such cohesive action in a campus situation for over a decade, but back then the issues were not as self-directed.

"Involvement in their own examinations is to these students what the war was to the generation of the late '60s," he commented. "This is the kind of self-generated therapy that's been missing from campuses since then."

Not all onlookers take such a cheery view of the activity. Nightly screams involving an average of 500 participants at Cornell University prompted charges of harassment from dorm officials and threats of further legal action from townspeople.

Cornell's Scream began with only seven freshmen leaning out of their dorm windows and yelling to relieve their anxieties. Within a few days, a Primal Scream Club had been formed with a few dozen members. After that, recalls David Bremner, one of the original seven, "things got out of hand."

Soon 500 people were raising their voices in scream for two minutes beginning at 11 p.m. Bremner described the event as "an occasion for crazies to yell out anything they wanted," including racial slurs and obscenities. Screamers were charged with harassment, and Ithaca residents threatened worse if university officials did not put an end to the practice.

Other organized screams have remained a bit more tame. Colgate University students have established a practice of screaming for about one minute on each night of the three-day reading period that precedes finals. Informally organized by use of mimeographed announcements, Colgate's Scream usually involves from five to a few dozen enthusiasts. No formal complaints have been made to the university, however, and no action has been taken. In fact, Colgate students encouraged their neighboring school, Hamilton College, to take up the practice.

Involvement at Hamilton has been minimal, as at Colgate and a few other smaller eastern schools, but to the dedicated screamers, nothing does the trick quite like the Primal Scream.

"The Scream is terrific," said an Indian student now at Washington University. "I wish everyone could get their frustrations and their misunderstandings expelled in this way."

Flying The Coop . . .

preserved through peaceful confrontation of ideas. Change and dissent are vital ingredients. When you suffer a loss of personal freedom, you value freedom more. I was having 'sixties flashbacks,' thinking how I could not kill or maime, and that I just wanted to remain a happy hypocrite, supporting others in military practices by sending a generous donation to the IRS every year.

TO THE "HOLDING COMPANY"

For two weeks we were marched only to chow under guard. We would awake at five, eat by six and again at 10 a.m., dinner at 4 p.m., all to insure no contact with the regular recruits. There was some verbal abuse by the regulars, but only when provoked by those among us that lacked maturity.

All day nothing, nothing but sitting, and then only on the floor waiting 17 hours a day; a few games, TV three hours a day. Use of the phones was often promised and revoked. Even if you could not buy anything, the ten-below-zero march to the Navy Exchange offered movement, activity.

HUMAN LIBRARIES

I was very fortunate. Under these brief and restrictive conditions I met extraordinary people – and assholes. "Mike" from Pennsylvania wanted to stay in but at night he would awake at attention. He could not understand what was happening. He would talk to himself, answer, nod, and smile. "Tim" from Kansas City, at eighteen, married his seventeen-year-old sweetheart who died less than a year later. Tim thought war was imminent, and wanted the Navy to do what he could not do but wanted desperately, he wanted to die.

CHRISTMAS

In the week before Christmas, all of us were given two to three hours of work a day. I was again fortunate. I was picked, along with another peon, to help two attractive female petty officers deliver the sacks of mail around base. Mail was gold. Not many Santas running around with chemotherapy haircuts, but I felt like one. Christmas dinner, for GI food, was very good, complete with decorations.

Phase three brought word that processing was starting. We were being moved again, this time to the transient personnel unit (TPU) building.

At the TPU we were again confined to the third floor, curtains closed, no one allowed to enter or leave. Again, chow at 6, 10 and 4. Seventeen hours a day we did nothing. Most would sleep like derelicts on the floor, four to a room with no others allowed in.

Finally, word of our release arrived. When signing for our honorable discharges, we had to sign and initial a statement that we were either "burdens to the command or unable/unwilling to adjust to military life."

woman I had hoped to marry.

I flew into Los Angeles the evening of January 2nd, connecting on a flight to Visalia (200 miles NE of LA). There I discovered that dreams can raise hope from the ashes to begin again.

THE GREYHOUND MIGRANT EXPRESS

After mending but not ending affairs of the heart, I had to bus it East. The fare was cheap, approximately $98, less than 3 cents a mile! (Pack food and books folks, the food stops are adequate but rip offs.)

I left Fresno at 11 p.m. on January 9, taking Interstate 80 to Vermont. I arrived in Vermont after four "beautiful" nights rotting on a bus.

BACK IN MOTHER RUSSIA

I am now back in the arctic green mountain state joining the hundreds of college graduates who stay in or return to Vermont and end up working full time at their minimum wage jobs while collecting 5 and 10 cent returnables to supplement their incomes.

THE END

Boot camp is not the real Navy. In the end, those who serve are there for you. I challenge George Plimpton on this experience folks.

Boxed In

By Sonny Valentine

Our hero, Barry Cutlass, sets his private jet down lightly on the landing strip in Leon, Nicaragua.

Cutlass is visiting his old friend, Dr. Carlos Valdez, Professor of History at the National University in Leon. Valdez contacted Cutlass two days before with a telegram that read: BARRY-NEED YOUR HELP LOOKING INTO SOMETHING-IT MAY BE BIG-COME AS SOON AS POSSIBLE-ARMED.

As he taxies his jet to the hangar, Cutlass wonders about the telegram. "Its not like Carlos to sound so alarmed. He must have stumbled onto a land mine to set him off like that."

The customs officials are very reluctant to admit Cutlass as a visitor. Since the Sandinist takeover, Americans are scrutinized carefully before being allowed into Nicaragua.

"He does not look like a professor to me," a wary customs official says. "He looks like a spy."

"Carambal His papers are in order, let him go," another official orders.

The curious official squints angrily into Cutlass's eyes before letting him pass. "Watch yourself American, I'm watching you," he says.

After an abrupt greeting from Valdez at the airport, the two friends drive to the university.

"I have much to tell you, Barry. I'm sorry to be so brusque at the airport, but we are constantly watched," the professor says while nervously fiddling with the crucifix hanging from the mirror.

"Near my house in the north, there has been much activity. Planes and helicopters are always heard. I have friends at the docks who tell me secretly that many heavy crates with Russian printing on them arrive every day," Valdez whispers. "Barry, I think the Russians are building a military stockpile here. With tensions as they are, this can only lead to trouble."

"Well, what do you think we can do alone?" Cutlass whispers back.

"We must have proof. Pictures, we need pictures of the stockpile. Then we can get help."

"But you don't know that there is a stockpile."

"We will go to my house and go hiking and find it!"

Later that afternoon, the two investigators are hiking behind Valdez's house. A low flying chopper circles a large area near them and lands behind a ridge.

"O.K. Carlos, let's go check this one out," Cutlass declares.

In twenty minutes, the two men are on top of the ridge, looking into the valley below. Cutlass shouts: "That's impossible. The forest is so thick down there, a chopper could never land. Let's have a closer look."

The two men push their way through the thick tropical vegetation. As they near the valley floor, Valdez makes a shocking discovery.

"Look, there is a big green net covering the whole valley! It looks like a forest from above."

The two men scramble down below the net and gasp at the massive storage area beneath. Crates of all different sizes stretch out for hundreds of yards in each direction. Forklifts can be heard moving the heavy boxes.

"Quick, snap some pictures Carlos," Cutlass says as he pries one of the crates open.

"Well, well, looks like we've got some Russian implements of war here, Carlos," Cutlass says as he pushes the package stuffing aside and pulls out a new machine gun. "Check that crate."

Just as Valdez gets the lid off the crate, a forklift is heard approaching.

"Get in the box and hide, quick!" Cutlass whispers.

As the lids close, a forklift swings around the corner and picks up the crate Cutlass is in.

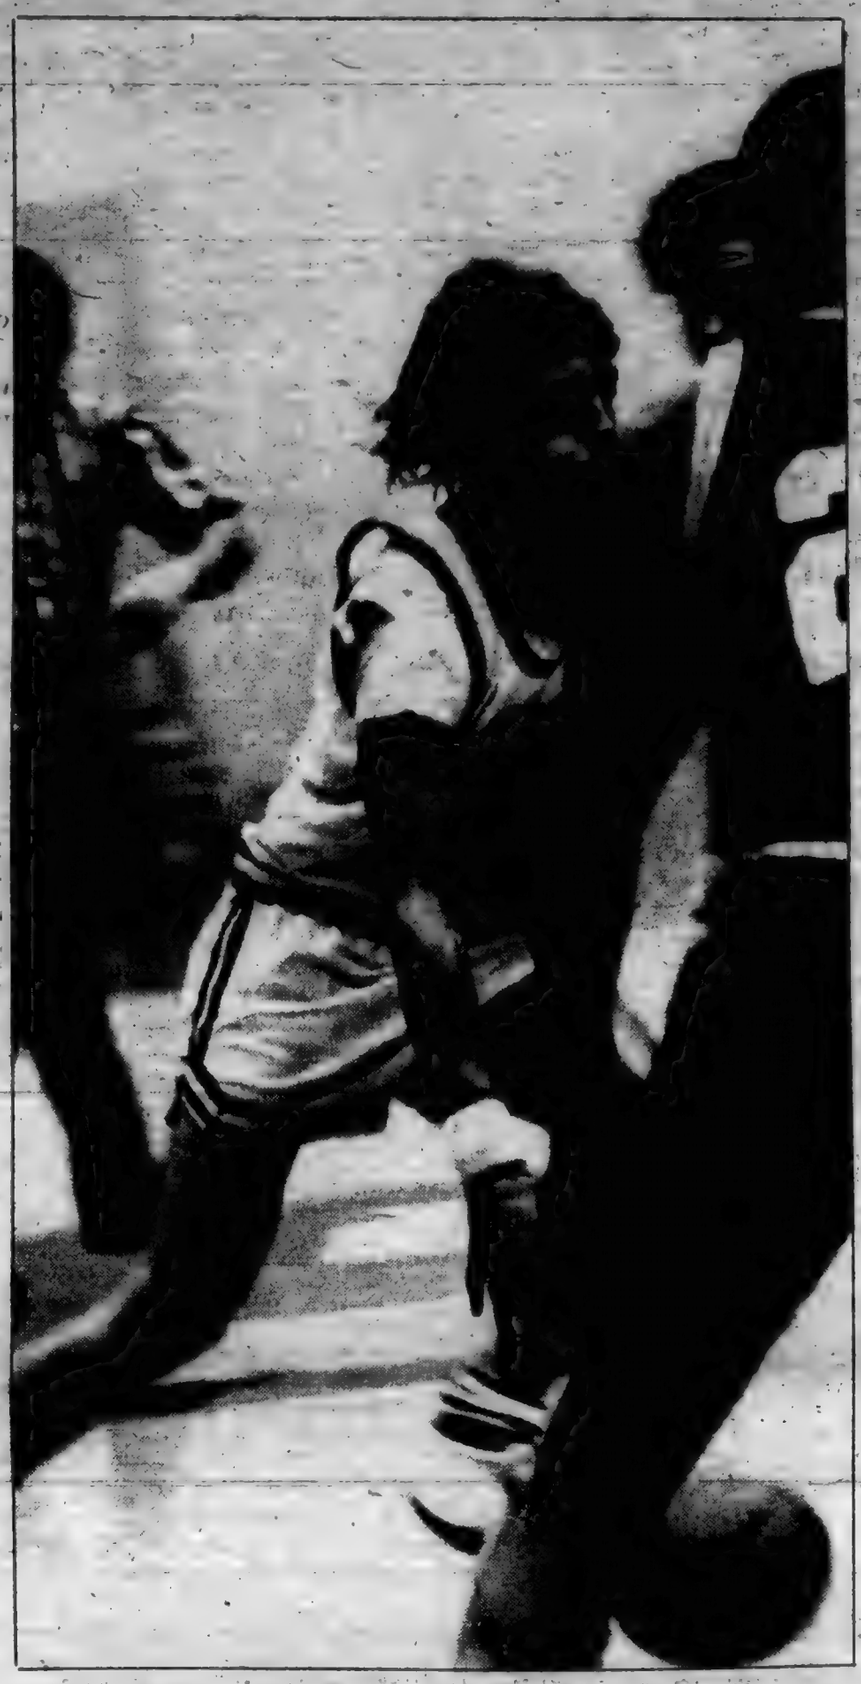
Claudio, McClallen Run Cats To Moral Victory

By Harry Eastman

"Although we were beaten in terms of the score, this was more of a win for us," said Coach Ed Kusiak, after the University of Vermont's men's indoor track team was defeated, 78-58 by a deeper University of Maine team in a dual meet held at UVM's Gardner-Collins Cage on February 21.

"In a dual meet against Maine last year, we scored only 30 points," said Kusiak. "This year we had a very respectable performance, and if a couple of events had turned out differently, it could have changed the outcome."



The Catamounts took a 14-4 lead after the first two events. Joe McClallen won the long jump with a distance of 21'6", and Scott McDonough finished third with a 19'10" jump. UVM dominated the 35-point weight event with Dave Swan and Charlie Claudio finishing first and second, each with a throw of 50'7". After Ed Fenton placed third in the shotput (42'8"), and Kelly Bartlett (4:26.5) and Steve Stebbins (4:27.8) finished second and third respectively in the one mile run, UVM still maintained a 19 to 17 lead. Maine, however, took the first two places in the 45-yard hurdles and in the triple jump, to take the lead for the remainder of the meet.

There were several other outstanding Catamount performances. Eric Stabeneau finished first in the pole vault (13'6") and Dean Flanders finished second with 13'. Steve Shead took second in the 440 yard run with a time of 52.4 seconds. Randy Sightler had a time of 2:20.2 in the 1,000 meter run, and Tony Bates took first in the two mile run (9:38.9).

Co-captains Claudio and McClallen again showed why they are two of the top rated performers in New England. Claudio gave an outstanding performance in the high jump, winning that event with a height of 6'6", and barely missing on three attempts to tie a UVM indoor track record at 6'8". McClallen, who won the 50 yard dash with a time of 5.4 seconds, turned in the most exciting performance of the meet. Going into the anchor leg of the 4x440 relay, McClallen was a full four yards behind Maine's runner. McClallen exploded by his opponent in the first corner, and finished a full second ahead of the Maine runner. This was a very emotional moment for UVM.

"We're a young team with certain weaknesses," said Kusiak, "but we run as a team."

McClallen, Claudio, Steve Stebbins, Bill Newberry, Sam Davis, Randy Sightler, Tony Bates, Steve Shead, Lucas Peluffo, and Steve Wechter are the men's team members, who will be travelling to Boston to compete in the New England Championships on February 28 and March 1 at Boston College.

Hoopsters Split 2, Get Set For Playoffs

By Cristina Fiorini

Saturday, spirited fans hung on to their seats as Vermont hosted Colgate here at Patrick gym. The game was a familiar nail-biting situation and the outcome of the event was a disappointing 60-58 loss. The game was dominated by what has been the Cat's traditional pattern of having control and establishing a lead in the second half, yet letting it dissipate in the last few minutes to produce the loss. "I told the team to forget about the last three or four minutes," said Coach Peter Salzberg. "That's not where the game was lost. We lost the game as we were consistently flirting with them. We get ahead, get a lead, then let the other guy back in the game by letting the lead fall apart."

The game all boiled down to the final 12 seconds when Colgate called a time out. The Red Raiders got the ball to Mike Ferrara, who threw it to his teammate Bill Halbran for the winning shot — an 18 foot jumper in the last three seconds of the game.

"We were running three men outside," commented Colgate coach Mike Griffin. "We wanted to give Ferrara the ball with the knowledge that he'd have to throw it off."

Earlier in the week, the Catamounts traveled over to New Hampshire where they hung the Wild Cats in the last few seconds with a 66-64 victory. It was one of Vermont's better shooting games as 58.3 percent of UVM's shots were successful. UVM scoring was led by Jeff Brown with seventeen points, followed by Mike Evelti who had 14.

During the second half, Vermont was catalyzed by two steals by Corey Wielgus which led to scores by Dane Correll and Mike Evelti. Jeff Brown followed with three points to put UVM ahead 64-60. This was short-lived as two free throws and a shot from the outside by UNH tied the game, 64-64. The outcome of the contest depended on pressurized efforts. The Cats stalled until the last ten seconds before Brown received a pass from Correll and shot the ball to give the Cats the victory 66-64.

During the first half, points waved back and forth as the period ended with UVM on top 35-32. In the second half, the Cats picked their way to establish a lead. With 11:50 to play, a Jim Nocera hook shot, a Bruce Beynnon score and an Evelti lay-up produced a ten point Catamount advantage.

As in other games, the pattern rapidly changed as the Wildcats bounced back, holding Vermont pointless for seven minutes, with the exception of two Brown free-throws. Highlighting New Hampshire's scoring were Bob Neely, Randy Finzly and Jack Burns.

The past week of action sets Vermont's record at 14-10. The victory against New Hampshire assured the Catamounts of their first winning season since 1976. The loss to Colgate hurts, yet as Salzberg stated, "I told the team, you're not going to win every close one!"

The coach also noted that a loss to Boston University today would hurt a lot more. A loss against the Terriers would cost UVM a home court spot in the first round of the ECAC playoffs.

Trailing by 4, BU Licks Skaters In OT

By Greg Weimer

After two periods of exceptional hockey and a 4-0 lead, the UVM hockey Catamounts finally yielded to Boston University pressure and were forced to accept a disheartening 5-4 loss in overtime.

With only 50 seconds left in the sudden death period, Boston University's Daryl MacLeod lifted the game-winning goal over Sylvain Turcotte who had fallen to the ice during a scramble in front of the net.

The game seemed to feature late period scoring as well as some outstanding goal-tending by Turcotte, who had 47 saves on the night and even managed to force Mark Fiddler to shoot the puck wide of the net on a O.T. penalty shot.

John Leavitt started off UVM's scoring 58 seconds into the first period by slapping a rebound past BU goalie Clean Daskalabis to give UVM a 2-0 lead. Yves Robitaille tipped in a Billy Kangas shot at 19:20 of the period.

In the second period, UVM had to fight off four BU power plays and still managed to score. Matt Winnicki scored a power play goal with only one second left in the period and gave BU the hard task of coming back from a 4-0 deficit.

The Cats, who were playing their third game in five nights, began to get a little weary and despite shorter shifts, BU was able to take advantage of the situation. At 46 seconds into the third period, Todd Johnson skated past Mark Brown and scored BU's first goal. The Terriers continued their assault, and Mark Fiddler scored at 4:47 with a turn around slap shot. At 6:49, Mark Pierog's centering pass found Tom O'Regan who slipped a backhander inside the left post. BU was able to tie the game up and send it into overtime at 8:34, when Bill Whelton flipped a shot high into the net from the slot.

Vermont had some good scoring chances early in the overtime. Billy Kangas just missed tipping in a feed from Kirk McCaskill. Then BU goalie Cleon Daskalakis managed to stop a tricky McCaskill tip-in attempt at 7:08. Finally, with under a minute left MacLeod scored, to hand the Cats the disappointing defeat.

Middlebury Jumps Over UVM Skiers

By Lon Brettell

Middlebury defeated Vermont 287.5 to 286 to win the Williams Winter Carnival, which was destined for confusion from the beginning. Due to lack of snow, the Alpine portion of the competition was canceled. From fear that this might be the last possible weekend for a race, the alpine events were rescheduled at Loon Mountain, New Hampshire. The cross-country portion was held on the snow and water in Eden, Vermont.

The competition got underway Friday morning with Mark Lyons of Dartmouth finishing first, followed by John Morrissey of Middlebury, John Teague of Vermont, Mark Altmeyer of Middlebury, Bob Hill of Dartmouth, and UVM's Tor Melander, Chris Mikell, and Dave Bean.

The men's 15 kilometer cross-country was won by Vermont's Pal Sjulstad. Jim Renkert at Middlebury placed second and Jon Acechlik of Vermont took third. Vermont and Middlebury controlled the top ten spots as Middlebury's John Tormondson and his teammate, David Bockius, finished seventh and eighth, while Greg Cress of Vermont finished ninth.

The slalom was won by Vermont's Teague. He was followed by Jim Taylor of Middlebury, Dave Beam of Vermont, Rick Makin of Middlebury and Eric Klaussen of Harvard.

When the results were posted, UVM had won by one-half of a point over Middlebury, 286-285.5. It was later discovered that an error was made and Middlebury received two more points and the Williams Carnival title.

The Catamount Court

By Art Cunningham

BU invades Vermont tonight, with the winning team grabbing the home court advantage when these two clubs meet again Tuesday night in the first round of the ECAC North playoffs.

UVM has ached to claw the Terriers since they lost a hotly contested game at BU early last season, 87-78. The Boston crowd saw a heavily favored Terrier squad tested by an inexperienced Vermont team which succumbed to the depth of the opposition.

In that contest, UVM dominated the boards with Mike Evelti, Bruce Beynnon, Joff Brown, and Jim Nocera combining for 50 rebounds. But BU forced a furious tempo, sending 12 players full speed for 40 minutes.

Victories in the final two regular season games would match the best record of a Salzberg-coached team, the 1975 squad which won 16 and lost 10.

Camisa: Icemen's First Vermont Goalie?

By Jim Painter

While the UVM hockey Catamounts finish up a disappointing season, many people have started to look towards next year, when the Cats will once again try to bring a winning season back to Gutterson Field House. One position that will be up for grabs is that of goalie. With the loss of seniors Sylvain Turcotte and Andy Ashforth from this year's team, coach Jim Cross will be looking for a goalie that will keep the puck from the net.

The top prospect for the 1981-82 season is freshman Tim Camisa, who has risen from the streets of St. Albans in an attempt at becoming the first Vermonter ever to play goalie in Division I. Although he's had to sit in the shadow of both Turcotte and Ashforth this season, he has worked hard in practice and is ready to make a shot at becoming UVM's number one goalie next year.

Starting out as a forward in the St. Albans youth program at the age of ten, Tim became a goalie after three weeks because, as Tim puts it, "We didn't have a goalie and I couldn't skate." Attending high school at Bellows Free Academy, where he also played tennis, Tim was the goalie for the BFA Bobwhites, a perennial hockey power in Vermont that had won the state championship eight straight years before losing last year in the finals. He had aspirations of playing hockey for UVM when at BFA, but it wasn't until he received a letter of recruitment from Cross that he thought he could make the team. It's tough for Vermonters to make the team because UVM is in Division I and the caliber of hockey in Vermont hasn't reached the level that is apparent in such states as Massachusetts or Connecticut. But Tim sees hockey improving in Vermont. "Teams are becoming more and more competitive these days and I think in five or six years UVM will be able to field a team consisting solely of Vermont skaters."

Having come from a winning team, Tim knows what a little pressure is all about and he has felt the pressure that the UVM team has undergone this year. "Because we're a Division I team, people have high expectations. When we started slumping, people started getting down on the coach and the team and it made things tough. The captains have done a good job keeping the spirit up and the attitude is very good. We've got a super bunch of guys. Very close."

A civil engineering major, Tim has had two appearances thus far this season. Playing about 10 minutes against Yale, Tim had 6 saves without allowing a goal, and against Division II rival Middlebury, Tim played the entire game, registering 18 saves in the 6-2 Catamount victory.

In an interesting living situation in which all the freshmen on the team live on Tupper 2nd, Tim has enjoyed college life as well as playing hockey. I asked him how they all got psyched up for the games and he informed me that the team has a mascot, a tarantula. They have a pre-game ordeal of watching the tarantula devour crickets. I'm not sure that's how the U.S. hockey team did it against the Russians, but if it will help Tim Camisa and his teammates have a winning season next year, maybe the Friends of UVM Hockey could help supply crickets.

UVM's Splash Landing

By Tom Olivo

Last Saturday, University of Vermont divers, Brian Shimel and Cary Clark, stood out in an 81-31 UVM swim loss at Boston University, the number one team in New England.

Junior Brian Shimel set a UVM record with a second place finish in the one-meter dive by scoring 459.45 points. His outstanding performance advanced him to the NCAA Division I meet, making him the first swimmer or diver from the University of Vermont ever to qualify. Brian has now earned the honor to compete in the NCAA Region I and II pre-qualification championships which will be held at Cornell University on March 13 and 14.

Sullivan's Policies May Bring Bosox To Disaster

By Rich Bateman

During a season when Boston failed to capture the pennant because of inadequate pitching, Haywood Sullivan – the Red Sox' co-owner and General Manager – promised there would be major changes for 1981. His solution: trade for quality pitchers. And trade he did! The recent trades of Fred Lynn, Rick Burleson and Butch Hobson add yet another chapter to Boston's history of lousy trades. Despite Sullivan's claim that these deals were in the best interest of the team, they will cause a lot of friction between players competing for the same position. In one month, Haywood Sullivan has narrowed if not eliminated Boston's chance of taking this season's American League pennant.

The Boston Red Sox ended the 1980 baseball season in fourth place, far behind the New York Yankees, and it was obvious that if Boston is to have a chance in 1981, changes would have to be made. And the off-season has brought an alarming change for Hub area fans. Red Sox announcer Ken Harrelson recently predicted that the team would probably finish in sixth place this year and Fred Lynn expressed his view that Red Sox fans would have to regard 1981 as a rebuilding year.

The dismantling of one of baseball's most powerful hitting teams began late last December when gold-glove shortstop Rick Burleson and power hitting third baseman Butch Hobson were traded to the California Angels in return for Carney Lansford, Rick Miller and Mark Clear. Before Red Sox fans could fully accept the departure of Burleson and Hobson, Sullivan engineered yet another surprising deal with the Angels. This time, he dealt All-Star centerfielder Fred Lynn and veteran pitcher Steve Renko (the Red Sox' player representative last season) for pitchers Frank Tanana and Jim Dorsey, and outfielder Joe Rudi.

While it's true that Sullivan strengthened the Sox in an area that badly needed help – pitching – he weakened the team in two other areas – hitting and defense. With the firing of manager Don Zimmer and the hiring of ex-Yankees skipper Ralph Houk, Sullivan promised Boston fans major changes. So far, these alterations have done nothing to establish the Sox as serious pennant contenders in 1981, and controversy remains over why Lynn and Burleson were traded.

Burleson was dealt simply because Sullivan refused to pay the shortstop a higher salary. Burleson, the team's Most Valuable Player for the last two years, was happy in Boston and only wanted a contract extension with a pay increase that would make his salary comparable to other top-rate shortstops. His demand was justifiable because he is considered among the top shortstops in major league baseball. Since 1981 is the option year of Burleson's contract and Sullivan would not give him a raise, the choice was either trade him or lose him to the free agent market. Fearing the loss of Burleson without any compensation, Sullivan took the Angels' offer and unloaded him along with injury-plagued Butch Hobson. Since the Red Sox received Rick Miller in this deal, a trade involving Fred Lynn seemed inevitable; Miller would not want to return to Boston only to platoon in the outfield as he did in his first stint with the Sox. Also, the problem between Lynn and the Boston Management resembled Burleson's, but was much more complex.

Lynn, along with catcher Carleton Fisk, is also in the option year of his contract. Both stars, like Burleson, sought salary hikes and contract extensions. It became obvious that Sullivan would not comply with their requests when he failed to mail the two players 1981 contracts before the December 20 deadline. Under the Basic Agreement, Lynn and Fisk may now be eligible for free agency before the 1981 season begins.

The belated contracts were intentional as Burleson received his contract shortly before the deadline, and Sullivan claimed that a valid contractual agreement was still intact. Fisk and Lynn thought otherwise and filed a grievance with the Major League Players Association which, if won, would make them eligible to sign with any club this spring. Sullivan would have to trade at least one of the players before the decision was made because losing both to free agency would be disastrous.

An attempt to trade Lynn to Los Angeles fell through when Lynn and agent Jerry Kapstein rejected the Dodgers' contract proposal, thereby killing the deal. At the winter meetings in Dallas (the first of two inter-league trading periods) Sullivan offered Lynn to any team interested. His effort to trade Lynn has been great and although he insists on making a deal "for the best of the team," desperation became more of a factor.

In a desperate attempt to trade Lynn, Sullivan began talks with George Steinbrenner, owner of the arch-rival New York Yankees. Steinbrenner, knowing Sullivan's dilemma, decided that the Yankees would have to have a pitcher – either Dennis Eckersley or Bob Stanley – along with Lynn in return for pitching ace Ron Guidry and outfielder Ruppert Jones. As further proof of desperation, Sullivan was still willing to make the deal despite the fact that Guldry had commented that he would only play 1981 in Boston and then take the free agent route. The talks quietly ended since Steinbrenner did not feel that he was "getting a good deal!" The rumors died and Sullivan still had Lynn.

Just when it seemed that Sullivan would have to pay Lynn or lose him, the California Angels, in an attempt to rebuild themselves, made an offer. Since the Sox were in desperate need for pitching and the name Frank Tanana came up, Sullivan grabbed the opportunity and dealt his centerfielder. Shortly after Lynn signed with California at $4.1 million over the next four years, he mentioned that if Boston had made a similar contract offer, he would have signed. It was not as if he was only seeking free agency, as Sullivan insisted, because he signed quickly after the transaction was complete. The reason for Lynn's trade as well as Burleson's is an overall unwillingness, on the part of Sullivan, to pay high salaries to established stars.

In the past two years, Sullivan has lost Bob Watson, Lynn, Burleson, Jim Dwyer and now faces the possibility of losing Fisk. In these days of high salaries and free agency, a baseball team cannot compete if management is unwilling to sign players. An example of this in modern day baseball is Calvin Griffith and the Minnesota Twins. Over the years the Twins have lost such stars as Lyman Bostock, Dan Ford, Rod Carew, Larry Hisle, Dave Goltz, Bill Campbell, and Tom Burgmeier because they too refused to pay high salaries for quality players. A consequence of this frugality was very low attendance in 1980. With the deals that Sullivan has made thus far, he can expect the 1980 attendance total of 1.9 million to drop in 1981 and television ratings, which have already dropped from 17 to 5 in the last two years, will probably sink even further. If Fisk is lost to free agency, these totals may plunge even lower.

Another conflict created by the two trades is where to play Dave Stapleton (.321 batting average in his rookie season last year). With a healthy Jerry Jemy returning to the lineup this spring, Stapleton has little hope of playing second base. A possibility is moving Stapleton to first base, but with Carl Yastrzemski, Tony Perez and Joe Rudi all vying for the first base and designated hitter jobs, the bench is where he might find himself. Stapleton is much too talented a ballplayer to be used as a utility infielder! Oh well, we have another episode in baseball's newest soap opera.

Local Favorite Pat Metheny Returns to UVM

Pat and Friend

By Jennifer Weiss

"Pat Metheny is playing UVM?!" exclaimed a student. "That's excellent!" Thursday, March 12, Pat Metheny and his band will perform two shows at Ira Allen Chapel, 8:00 and 10:00 p.m. Metheny leads the group on guitar, with Lyle Mays on piano and electric harp, Mark Egan on electric bass, Dan Gottlieb on drums, and Brazilian percussionist Nana Vasconcelos.

Pat first picked up the guitar at 14. When he was in high school, he did some studio work and played a few nightclubs. He attended the University of Miami on full scholarship; after only one semester, he was asked to teach on the University faculty. During Pat's teaching career, he was given the opportunity to perform with some jazz greats such as Pearl Bailey, Louis Benson, and Marilyn Maye.

In April of 1973 at the Wichita Jazz Festival, Pat met a musician he greatly admired, Gary Burton. After hearing Metheny perform, Burton arranged a teaching position for him on the Berklee College of Music staff, where Metheny had the honor of teaching the top 30 out of 800 musicians. At the age of 19, Pat was the youngest person ever to teach on the Berklee staff. A short time later, Pat joined the Gary Burton Quintet, playing 12-string guitar. He was featured on some of their albums, including Ring, Dreams So Real, and Passengers.

Bright Size Life, Metheny's first album, in which he composed all of the music, was released in May of 1976. Since this first record, Pat has formed his own band with Lyle Mays, Mark Egan, Nava Vasconcelos and Dan Gottlieb. They have recorded about six albums, including Watercolors, which received a Grammy nomination, Pat Metheny Group, American Garage, and their latest release, 80/81.

Reviews of past concerts promise the upcoming one will be dynamite. "A simply overpowering performance," Record World wrote of a concert. Larry Waggoner of The International Talent Weekly wrote, "Guitarist Metheny's band stirred the audience with its artful blend of jazz, pop, rock, classical, folk forms, and a little of everything else." If you like a well-rounded band, this is one not to miss!

It sounds like it's going to be an excellent performance, so get psyched!! Tickets went on sale February 25 at the Campus Ticket store (x3085) and Pure Pop Music. Prices are $7.50 for general admission and $6.50 for UVM students.

The 4th Movement Confronts A Religious Barrier

By Mark J. Cadigan

When I reviewed The 4th Movement's debut album a few weeks ago, I ended by saying: "Nevertheless, they'll have to confront the large barrier between them and possible fans due to their religious orientation (of their music)." That barrier was in evidence last Sunday afternoon at Hunt's, as a small group of friends and curious onlookers watched the band perform.

About half of the audience left after the first set, prompting bassist/vocalist Bobby Hackney to say good-naturedly, "Glad to see so many of you out there!" The dwindling crowd was typical of the band's luck that afternoon — their sets were marred by false starts ("Guitar players are never ready," Bobby explained.), broken picks, falling cymbal stands, and faltering guitar solos. Nervousness and an overeagerness to please the audience made The 4th Movement play hard — maybe too hard.

Noticeable tension caused the abrupt tempo changes that they so frequently employ to sound awkward at times. Yet, their amazing energy also spurred them on during some songs, particularly "Always At Your Door" and "When the World Comes Together." These tunes featured some fine guitar playing, pumping bass lines, and powerful drumming. In fact, Dannis Hackley's percussion was consistently good throughout the concert, and in conjunction with Bobby's funky bass, provided a steady beat to their music.

You might think that with such a solid background, guitarist David Hackney would be able to experiment and let loose. Yet, he chose to stick with a speedy rhythm guitar sound for the most part. Electric rhythm guitar, no matter how fast or how well it's played, gets tiresome to listen to after a few songs, particularly if there isn't a lead guitar to add some variety and spontaneity.

If The 4th Movement had a lead guitarist and possibly a keyboard player, their music would sound fuller and livelier. I feel that they have a lot of potential, but they need that added instrumentation and someone to mix their sound better (Bobby's vocals were too loud and David's guitar was often inaudible). They certainly have the energy and the will to succeed — it's just a matter of working out the details.

One of the details that the group might consider would be interspersing a few secular songs with their religiously-oriented repertoire. I know that some people will disagree. Most concertgoers, however, don't want to be preached to for a few hours when they go to hear contemporary music at a club like Hunt's.

The 4th Movement can do exactly as they please, but unless they broaden their musical and lyrical perspectives, their audience may never get very large. I sincerely hope that the band reaches its goals, but I don't think they can accomplish them without some basic alterations. If they put their talent to use, they may be able to change their luck.

Celebration: Youthful Energy and Fading Dreams

By Beth Rosenberg

It really was a "Celebration."

The University Players beamed with pride at their opening night reception. That evening's audience was equally exhilarated. If you missed the performance of Celebration at Royall Tyler Theatre that ran from Feb. 18-21, don't hesitate; kick yourself.

The play was set around a rather primitive looking cave. It was New Year's Eve and winter was about to become spring. Potemkin (Greg Lesch) set the initial mood of the play from the cave's lofty peak, explaining that the story paralleled the ancient rites of the changing seasons. Lesch was especially believable in his portrayal of Potemkin, a haughty, confident survivor. His initial presence commanded the stage and captivated the audience.

As Lesch broke out into a song, the revelers came on stage. This assortment of twelve singers and dancers (one for each month of the year) continued to delight the audience throughout the production. Clad in head-to-toe skin tight black costumes, it was impossible to tell one reveler from the other until they exposed themselves to a hearty round of applause at the play's finish. Their dance steps and mime acts were consistently magnificent and special acknowledgement must be given to Jennifer O'Rourke for her brilliant choreography.

Christopher Hill entered next, as the idealistic Orphan who wanted his garden back. Hill's performance was magnified by, of all things, his eyes! Deliberately or not, the Orphan's hopes and dreams were vividly displayed by his starry-eyed expression. The power of his eyes was also evident in the Orphan's ability to catch the first glimpse of the beautiful white Angel (Melanie Comer).

Comer literally jumped into the scene (and into the arms of the Orphan) and shed her white robe, revealing an aspiring actress faced with the conflicting choice of love or money. In addition to their singing talent, Comer and Hill both showed an ability to arouse real emotions in the audience. Their love scenes looked genuine.

Chadwick Tyler portrayed Mr. Edgar Allen Rich, an aging man unable to find happiness despite his wealth. Tyler's characterization of Rich was a clever mixture of sensitivity and humor. He deserved both the sympathy and laughter that the audience provided. One especially amusing scene was during one of Tyler's dance antics (surprisingly reminiscent of Gene Kelly), when the revelers sported tophats and canes in a parody of high society.

"Celebration's" Revelers

The stage was used effectively and in accordance with its simplicity. The significance of certain props was extremely apparent, since they had to be carefully introduced and utilized in the context of the set. For example, the mirror was used in a humorous but touching episode in which the aging, overweight Rich saw the reflection of the youthful, handsome Orphan, as his own. Lighting helped to set the prevailing mood of the stage with vibrant, changing background colors. Costumes revealed the situations in which the characters found themselves. For instance, the Angel emerged in a dazzling gown and fur after a few minutes away with Rich.

Celebration was a musical, and its musical score turned the performance into a sensational sound spectacle. The melodies were appealing and the lyrics were humorous and powerful. Potemkin's song about his devious scheme for survival, Angel's song about her desire to "be someone," and Rich's song about his inability to feel emotion, are all excellent examples of the use of music to communicate ideas as well as to provide pleasure. Joanna Hood and her orchestra deserve special recognition for this feat.

Celebration was about the changing seasons of the year, about good and evil, and about youth and old age. The most powerful scene in the play involved the duel between the Orphan, symbolizing energy and hope, and Mr. Rich, symbolizing the stagnant lack of vitality that comes from the fading away of dreams. This duel was a metaphor for the simultaneously occurring battle between Fire of summer and Ice of winter. Suddenly, it became clear that the phases of life were themselves parallel to the changing seasons of the year. The players' performances celebrated the endless, ever-changing affirmation of life.

The audience that left after each performance carried with them a legacy of hope. The final message of the play proclaimed that even though everything in life is not always good, the joy of being alive makes it all worth it.

ALBUM

Anderson Goes For Heaven On "Song Of Seven"

By Robert Mady

Song of Seven is the second solo album from Jon Anderson, former lead vocalist and co-founder of the progressive rock band, Yes. More importantly, it is his first album since leaving the band last spring. This album marks a change in direction for Anderson, a change in his music and lyrics that has only been hinted at in recent Yes works. But with the release of Song of Seven, we can now see his full progression as a song writer and singer. In these new songs we find Jon, the lover, the thinker, the believer, the dreamer, and of course, still the mystic. He has also created some very fresh musical setting on this new album, incorporating rock, pop, folk, and classical music to create various musical moods. Song of Seven is a masterful collection of mystical thoughts, set to melodies and music in the way only Jon Anderson could attempt and achieve successfully.

For the music fan looking for that classic rock sound of Jon's former band, it is surely not to be found on this album. Most of the songs found here are set at a much slower and quieter pace than Yes fans have grown accustomed to on past Yes albums, where rock 'n roll was the driving force. Instead, Jon is now using a less rocky, more folkier, pop sound. Yet, he has still maintained that classical feel which he and Yes brought to the rock world in the late sixties and throughout the seventies. This time the music still has that classical, perfectionist feel, but it is employed in the mellower setting of his new songs.

This classical mood is best reflected during the three song, eighteen minute set which concludes the album. The first song of this set, "Take Your Time," and the middle tune, "Days," both depend on the softness of Ian Barinson's acoustic guitar strumming, as well as the quiet smoothness of Jon's voice. The former song shows Anderson slowing everything down: "Tempers in the air, I'm told to slow down, ease back, by the fire, feel free, feel free." It's the slowness of the way he sings it which mesmerizes the listener. In "Days," Jon offers his mystical view of a day, singing of the evening, the morning, and concluding that the "days are blessings." Jon reveals another talent when he finishes off the piece with a neat harp solo-dub.

The last song of the set and the album is the title track, "Song of Seven." This eleven-minute masterpiece is the focal point of the album. It reveals Jon's mysticism in full form, as he expands on his fascination with the song's namesake — seven. It seems Jon somehow closely relates the number seven to heaven, or the concept of heaven. Nevertheless, the mystic sings of belief, imagination, and "the strength of dreaming," and of course, love to get us by: "In the seventh dream to stand alone/ But not without the strength of love/ To guide our way, everyday." The lyrical beauty of this song is incredible, and Jon even goes as far as letting his children lend a hand. His sons can be heard in the background adding sets of numbers which equal seven, and his daughter of no more than ten or eleven adds harmony vocal right along side of her daddy for a couple of verses.

Along with his children, Anderson has assembled an eleven-man band to work on his songs. Throughout the album the instrumentation is more than adequate, but in some spots it is excellent, almost hot, as a matter of fact. The title song is a musical production within itself, and in "Heart of the Matter," found on side one, Jon displays a little of the rock 'n roll that's still in him. The title song slowly builds out of the classical sounds of a string quartet, moving into the chords of Ronnie Leahy's piano, then swiftly into the strumming of John Giblin's bass and Clem Clemson's electric guitar work. It is no small task to keep up with Anderson's stirring vocals, but the "boys in the new life band" accomplish it throughout the album.

Anderson in his Yes days

In "Heart of the Matter," Jon makes use of some more familiar names from the rock world to achieve an almost heavy rock sound. Simon Phillips, Jeff Beck's present drummer, handles the percussion, while another of Jon's friends, Jack Bruce (formerly of the rock band Cream), adds some neat bass runs. Clemson once again picks some clean rock 'n roll guitar. On most of the songs on the album, as well as on this one, Chris Rainbow, a vocalist for the Alan Parsons Project, adds choruses and backing vocals in harmony with Jon.

As on side two, Jon's vocals lead the way on the five songs on side one. Each song creates its own style of instrumentation and lyric. Jon uses the electronics of Leahy's keyboards and Barinson's guitar while questioning the meaning of our existence. His answer: "To which the world offered a home/ Once made for love/ And love alone/ For you, for me."

"Some Are Born" and "Hear It" reflect Jon's folkier influences. When Leahy's electronics are added, a sort of classic-folk effect arises. The two other songs on side two are probably the catchiest on the album. "Don't Forget" and "Heart of the Matter" jump at you with Anderson's melodies and memorable love-phrases. Hooks and riffs abound in both songs and in the latter he reaches his most sexual: "Submit me baby/ you can do what you want to me/ As long as we can get inside the back of your car."

On these songs, as well as the songs on side two, it becomes apparent that Jon's voice is growing addictive; the more you hear it, the more you want to listen. He uses it as an instrument, singing along and meshing with other instruments at times. It's not only the highness of the pitch and the resonance of his voice, but also the melodies and hooks he puts to his lyrics that make his songs so distinct. After only a few listenings, you may find yourself humming or singing the memorable melodies from the album.

Song of Seven, which was written, arranged, and produced by Jon, is an optimistic record. He must have been at peace with himself, his wife Jennifer (for whom he wrote the title song), and the rest of the world. The album is very personal — another fine chapter of music from Jon Anderson, and it should gain him an even wider audience than the one he held with Yes, because of its varying styles of music.

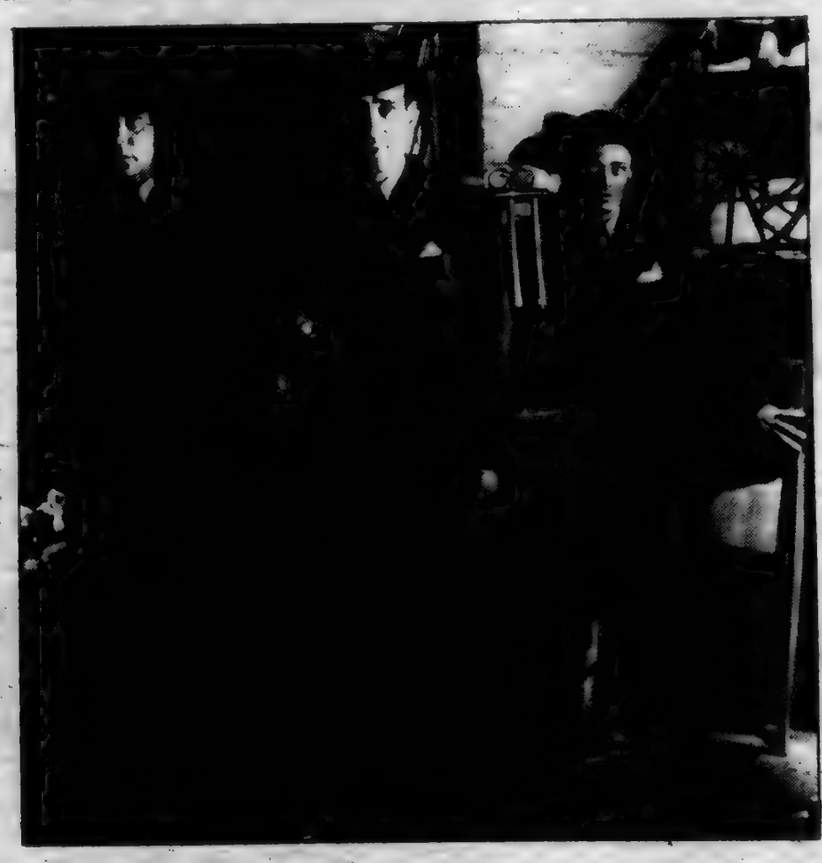
TELEVISION

Snowflakes, Woodstoves, and Bogey

By Ed Stearns

Do you ever get the feeling that everyone attending UVM is from another state? Does Burlington ever look like Anywhere, U.S.A.? If so, now you can get a taste of what Vermont is really like. Best of all, you don't even need a car. All you need is access to a television.



"Television," you may say. "I can't stand being bombarded with all of those ridiculous commercials. Besides, television is such a wasteland."

But wait, haven't you heard of Vermont ETV? It's not only commercial free, but interesting and entertaining as well. And now there's a new show devoted exclusively to Vermont called Crossroads: Vermont's Public Television Magazine.

This month's edition covers a variety of interesting subjects, including the pioneering work of Jericho's "Snowflake" Bentley, the first man to compile a detailed photographic study of snowflakes. Crossroads also visits Vermont Castings in Randolph, Vermont, the first totally new foundry to open in New England since World War II. They are currently pouring 60 tons of cast iron a day in the manufacture of woodstoves. This rate is soon to increase with the addition of a third furnace in March. For those of you in the market for a stove, Yankee humorist Danny Gore offers some wry observations on heating with wood and coal.

Find out what's happening in Vermont, Tune in this Thursday, February 26, at 8:00 p.m. to Vermont ETV/UHF channel 33 or cable channel 10. If you've already missed this month's edition, be sure to watch for Crossroads next month.

Also appearing this week on Vermont ETV is the 1942 Humphrey Bogart film, All Through the Night. Bogey portrays an ex-gangster, "Gloves" Donahue, who learns that his friend Miller has disappeared. Gloves and his henchmen, Sunshine (William Demarest) and Barney (Frank McHugh), find Miller's body in the cellar of his bakery. At the shop, Gloves catches a glimpse of a beautiful yet mysterious woman (Karen Verne) and trails her to the Duchess Cafe. He arrives in time to hear her sing one number before her piano accompanist (Peter Lorre) runs off with her.

Bogey in rare form

The plot becomes more complicated as one of the club's bouncers is shot. Gloves hears the man gasp that "Fivers" shot him, as his life quickly fades away. He chases the fleeing couple to an old warehouse, which he discovers is also the headquarters of enemy agents (Fifth Columnists), otherwise known as "Fivers." He soon finds out that the woman and his friend Miller were working for the spies, because both had relatives overseas who were being held as hostages. Gloves and his shady friends take on the Nazi spies in a sequence of events sure to please any Bogart fan.

Be sure to tune in this Saturday, February 28, at 9:00 p.m. to Movie Greats on UHF channel 33 or cable channel 10. All Through the Night is only one of the great movies to appear on Vermont ETV. Don't miss out.

The Immediacy of Life

By Max Lesselbaum

Whistler's Mother is one of the best known images in Western art. James McNeill Whistler, mostly known for his paintings, was primarily involved with graphic art and etching throughout his life. The drypoints and etchings of Whistler are now on exhibit at the Robert Hull Fleming Museum until March 27.

The early style of Whistler embraces an intimate involvement with portraits. In the piece Bibi Laloutte, the etcher has paid fastidious attention to the finest facial features. The portrait was rendered at a time when Whistler was introduced to the etching style of Rembrant. The influence of Rembrant is most noticeable in the etching Drouet.

Realism captures the scenes and events of everyday life; moral and political statements are not part of this art. Whistler's fidelity to Realism is clear; his "journalism" remains within the day-to-day scenarios of 19th century European city-street life.

Progressing through the exhibit chronicles the life travels of Whistler. The "Thames Set" is the artist's view of the London river and dockside. The detail of this series emphasizes the effects of light and shadow on the reflective qualities of water. A departure from the consistency of these works is seen in Chelsea Bridge and Church: 1859, where a lack of definition and irregularity of line-makes for one of the more unusual, memorable pieces in the exhibit.

The dark mood of pre-industrial London is contrasted by Whistler's etchings of Venice. The backstreets and canals of Venice are created with the same clarity of vision as in the Thames Set, but without the somber dankness the city of London emanates. The etchings reveal an artist who has a sharp sensitivity to the varying cultural atmospheres of different European cities. Nocturne: Palaces captures the effect of how the light on buildings reflects in the water of a Venetian canal. In contrast to this, Long Venice: 1884 projects the open calm of the city from a distant view.

Whistler's butterfly

Intriguing the viewer is Whistler's personalization of his work by an omnipresent butterfly signature. Introduced in the late 1870's, this fluttering trademark can be seen in almost all of his later works. This random, out-of-context application throws the viewer off balance by creating a distance between the viewer and the scene depicted.

The final etchings move into Amsterdam; Whistler's impression of the alleys and alcoves is more informal than earlier city-scapes. Always capturing the immediacy of ordinary life, Whistler finds the mundane nuances of each setting through an ever-close attention to textural feel. This spontaneity of vision captures the ephemeral, subtle reality of everyday life.

By Carol Arns

Carol Arns of Shelburne has been appointed Chittenden County chairman for the 1981 Vermont ETV Auction. She will head a team of volunteers who will be approaching area businesses for merchandise and services. Items donated are auctioned off during the televised event April 2-11, and are a major source of funding for the state public television network.

Arns, who worked in the warehouse in the 1978 auction, says, "Television is here to stay. To make it worthwhile, Educational Television is the answer. Vermont ETV has a lot of potential. If we had remote broadcasting facilities, much could be accomplished." She is the President of the Women of UVM.

Anyone wishing to help the auction effort by donating an item or becoming a volunteer, may call 985-2006.

The Comm Before the Storm

Awards Offered

The student-faculty-staff committees are accepting nominations for the Class of '67 and Mary Jean Simpson awards to be presented to the outstanding senior and senior woman, respectively, at Commencement. The Class of '67 Award is presented to the outstanding senior who was a campus leader and achieved two of the following minimum levels: active membership in three recognized student activities, University recognition in a varsity sport and/or election to an office in a recognized student activity. The Mary Jean Simpson Award identifies "the senior woman who best exemplifies the qualities of character, service, and constructive influence which Mary Jean Simpson strove to set before the women of the University of Vermont. For information call Jeff Milem at 3380.

Learn How to Protest the Yankee Way

The Rising Sun Coalition is sponsoring a workshop to unite and organize the people of Burlington and UVM students toward staging formal and continual opposition to Vermont Yankee. The main intent of the workshop is to serve as a focal point for the building of a campaign and the teaching of skills to organize against the state's lone nuclear reactor. Skills covered during the workshop will include: canvasing, working with the media, public education, creative conflicts with the power company, music as an organizing tool, ways to hold a campaign together, fundraising and more. The workshop will be led by two members of the Vermont Yankee Decommissioning Alliance (UYDA), Ginny Callan and Al Giordano. It will be held on Saturday, March 7th from 9-5 in the Living/Learning Center Commons, Rm 216 UVM campus. This is a FREE workshop and all people with a sincere desire to use these skills in a campaign are encouraged to come. For registration and information call Paul M., 864-9839 or Jenni, 658-5783.

"The devil made me Jewett"

THE VERMONT CYNIC

VOLUME XCIX NUMBER 6 MARCH 12, 1981

"Bernie" The People's Mayor

By Nelson Hockert-Lotz

A three month insurgency by self-styled radical Bernard "Bernie" Sanders set local politicos and pundits upon their ears ten days ago, scuttling "invincible" incumbent Mayor Gordon Paquette's bid for a sixth term at the Queen City's helm. Pending Friday's aldermanic recount — Sanders' victory floats upon a thin margin of 22 votes, out of 9,000 cast — Burlington sits in the eye of national klieg lights. An avowed socialist gadfly of the seventies, as a founder, chief officer and frequent candidate of the state's radical Liberty Union party, Sanders has never strayed far from Vermont politics: but never before had he come close to winning. Sanders is the first socialist to head a New England city since the onset of the Cold War a generation ago.

The Mayor-elect met with about twenty students, some of whom had worked on his campaign, in Slade Hall Wednesday evening to lay the groundwork for "a new cooperation" to bridge the gap between University of Vermont students and the city.

"We are alone. What we are doing, and what we will be doing is unique," Sanders told the students. "If we fail, a lot of people are waiting to say, 'I told you so.' "

Sanders' message to students boiled down to: "We want your energy, your input, your contribution. This is your city, too. But we also want your respect. No more 'Spring Fling', no more tearing up the city. The door to city hall is open to you. I'm your mayor, too."

Areas of the city need to be cleaned up, low income children need remedial academic help and role models, Sanders said, and suggested efforts to improve the city. Only then will university students win the respect of thier neighbors, he said.

"We can tap the best entertainers in the state, for a joint, joyous celebration of Spring," he said. "But let's push Spring Fling in to the past where it belongs."

"We need you. We can help you. The eyes of the country are upon us now, we can have a national significance."

STUDENT EVALUATIONS ARE COMING
March 16-20"

*S.A. is conducting course evaluations in all undergraduate intro courses up to 100 level and some up to the 200 level in the some up to the 200 level in the school of Arts and Sciences and EMBA.
*Volunteers URGENTLY needed to help distribute evaluation forms in classes (especially morning).
*For those interested in helping organizational meeting to be held Thurs. March 12 at 6 pm in North Lounge-Billings

Please take these evaluations seriously.
We need your help to make this work.

Benevolent Belligerence

New York's Guardian Angels are among America's most visible vigilante groups. Apparently these Angels won't russle up an armed posse for businesses or other special interests. To date they have concentrated their efforts solely on public causes, such as à patrol of New York City streets, particularly in the Bronx, taking their cue from another established renegade called the Rock Brigade, which stations itself for the most part in New York's subway system. Perhaps, though, the Angels worship our greatest contemporary militarist, Secretary of State Haig. We're not sure. Nor is it clear whether or not the Angels will contract out.

At any rate, these champions of an American tradition — benevolent belligerence — flew to Atlanta yesterday. Their mission? To teach Atlanta's black children how to defend themselves in the midst of the reign of terror in that city. (The Angels will not engage in combat. They are there as advisors.)

The Guardian Angels are as American as apple pie and military aid to oppressive regimes. Clearly they are part of a larger phenomenon in modern American life, something the press is calling "survivalism." A great number of American citizens, like the young Angels, are taking what they see as a not so rosy present and future into their own hands, by stockpiling weapons, dried fruits, meat, and vegetables, and by building bombshelters: its a Darwinian struggle out there for the survivalists. They prepare for the apocalypse, which they plan to survive.

A recent television feature on survivalism was absolutely incredible. Children, eight years old, filling sandbags, digging underground trenches, firing weapons. "We wish this wasn't necessary, but it is," one housewife said as she lead her young son by the hand to a backyard firing range. The mother said she sleeps with a magnum under her pillow. Her husband peered down at their son with a 'that's my boy' gleam, turned to the camera and said that there was a growing feeling in America that the world was facing imminent holocaust.

Survivalism is a domestic militarism, but that certainly shouldn't take us by surprise. Big money is at stake here. One of the strongest forces behind survivalism is the National Rifleman's Association. Two of the healthiest American industries fuel the movement's fires, the weapons and dried food industries. Perhaps the most influential man in Washington right now is General Haig, who every evening tells us that the military way is his way. The U.S.-Soviet arms race steams full speed ahead, and the defense department is popular again. Violence is in.

By most reports, the survivalists are the rich as well as the middle and lower income. Apocalypse Now.

Enquirer Up The River

Carol Burnett is suing National Enquirer for $10 million, and her case is going to court, the first against the Enquirer to go to court in 28 years. She joins the ranks of several other entertainers who have been the subject of the paper's sleeze journalism and are now taking the tabloid to court. More power to Burnett and her colleagues. We hope they screw the Enquirer to the wall.

Given the sanctity of the printed word, the Enquirer's circulation of five million casts a pervasive shadow over the world of print journalism. The crap that the Enquirer prints is, for millions, God's honest truth. And though the Cynic has not been known over the years as the bastion of credibility, we're affected nonetheless. National Enquirer has damaged journalism irreparably.

Its easy to understand how the paper gets away with what it does. Take Burnett's case as an example. She's suing the Enquirer for a story it published about an alledged fued between the comedienne and then Secretary of State Henry Kissinger. The Enquirer's headline read something like, "Burnett Fights With Henry K. In Washington Bar, Spills Drink On His Suit Purposely." If Burnett really was sitting with Kissinger in a Washington bar, and they did disagree over something on the menu, for instance, an Enquirer grunt calls in the "story" and they inflate it to libelous proportions. The victim, Burnett, one of the few who can afford the tremendous expense in time and money to take the creeps to court, has to prove injury and the defendant's intent to injure. That's hard to do. And as the Enquirer's lawyer said yesterday, a "retraction" of the "error" is most often enough to clean the legal slate.

Burnett said yesterday that the healing effect of the Enquirer "retraction" on her personal life and career is nill, or like a hit-and-run victim receiving "a bouquet of crabgrass."

Best wishes to Burnett and her lawyer. It's in every responsible journalist's interest to send the Enquirer up the river.

Letters to the Editor

A Very Disturbing Irony

To the Editor:

There is a disturbing irony in the Reagan Administration's arguments for increasing military aid to El Salvador. In an interview with Walter Cronkite, President Reagan said that El Salvador was in 'our' hemisphere and that 'we' will not tolerate 'outside' interference in 'our' hemisphere. The State Department's official response is that it is in the best interests of our 'national security.'

The irony of this logic was recently made clear to a large audience at St. Monica's in Barre. Two nuns of the Maryknoll Order told of their personal experiences in El Salvador. Sister Mary Duffy reminded the gathering that we, as Americans, must be very insecure to justify military build-up for reasons of security in a small Central American country so engulfed in internal turmoil, torture, violence, and murder that it could hardly be a threat to the U.S.

That has not stopped the Reagan Administration from recently sending $25 million more in military aid to El Salvador's ruling junta – an unpopular and undemocratic government actively engaged in terrorism. The Reagan Administration fails to accept the democratic rights of a foreign people to change their conditions of life in a manner unlike 'ours' (non-American – that is unless you go back to the American Revolution). Perhaps that best explains why U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Dr. Jeane Kirkpatrick says the problem is not that the Salvadoran armed forces are killing their own people but that they are not killing them the right way – with American weapons in the American manner of warfare so as to root out the leftist opposition in a more cost-efficient, effective, and civilized way.

It is frightening that our American leaders are thinking such 'civilized' thoughts. How do they respond to a conservative Roman Catholic priest in El Salvador who has said, "The difference in the violence is that the left kills selectively – members of ORDEN (the armed and dreaded Democratic Nationalist Organization) and government security forces. Killing by the right and the army is more indiscriminate. When they sweep through a village looking for leaders and leftist sympathizers, they kill a lot of innocent peasants."

Need a Strong Military

To the Editor:

I find it interesting that two of the cartoons in this week's Cynic (2/26/81) satirically criticized the strengthening of our military at the expense of the poor and yet another article in the same edition lauds the services of that evil defense dept. "M.A.S.T. Choppers Save Lives."

There can be no freedom and consequently no valuable social programs without a strong military.

I have confidence in the Reagan Administration to reduce government spending by cutbacks and reducing government waste (Defense Dept. included), without significantly affecting the needy. We have to realize that a $1.00 from Washington is only a percentage of what we send down there. There is no question in my mind that the most efficient social programs are those locally run and in many cases privately funded.

An economic collapse which is exactly where the fiscal policies of the last two decades would have taken us would mean a much greater deprivation of our poor and indeed all Americans.

Pay Oxymoronic Dues

To the Editor:

Max Lesselbaum's Live Art article, "Coronary Heart Attack," in the Cynic's February 19 issue flattered me but at the expense of my collaborators. I do relish the fantasy that I can inspire a following of tantalizing and arrogant groupies. The oxymoronics indulge this fantasy and act it out ironically creating yet another layer confusion in our performance. Lesselbaum, who has always seemed an astute and observant critic, should be able to see through their glove-tight outfits and read this parody of my archaic sexism burning through a decade of consciousness-raising veneer.

The oxymoronics, Shirley Reid, Mary Blazine and Jessie Reid, are co-conspirators with me on every level of our performance from conception through production. Shirley Reid alone was responsible for the Russian Art Show and the Valentine's Performance from the Heart ever seeing the light of day. These energetic and motivated people deserve credit for what they do.

Sensitivity

To the Editor:

Under the heading "The Binge-Purge Syndrome," I submitted an announcement to "Random Notes," to be published 2/19/81. Unfortunately, someone who did not understand the seriousness of this syndrome assigned it what could be taken as an accusing, flippant heading, "You Make Me Sick."

I would like for your readers, especially those with bulimarexic symptoms, to understand I am sorry about the heading substitution and do not share the attitude it implies. Bulimarexia is a compulsive behavior that has come to plague the lives of many people on our campus and across the nation. The burden of guilt and shame they so often carry can be crushing; hopefully we can learn to be of help, rather than to add to their already awesome burden.

Sincerely,
Midgie Elam

To the Editor:

I was outraged and sad to see the title you gave to the advertisement for the support group for Bulimarexia. As a member of the group, I was offended to see the ignorance that surrounds the issue. We need support and understanding instead of ridicule. I am sad because the title gave the issue such a negative connotation that I think many people who might have reached out, now will not. I think we deserve an apology.

Reverend Jerry Falwell and His Legions

By L. E. Lassiter

The sociologist Max Weber identified three basic governmental orders: the traditional (based on the "Divine Right of Kings"); the charismatic (characterized by ideological fervor and/or the "Cult of Personality"); and the rational-legal, exemplified by America (among others). Theoretically, the latter two models are mutually exclusive, inasmuch as the inhabitants of a stable, prosperous social order are not generally susceptible to demagoguery. The Reverend Jerry Falwell and his legions defy such smug, tidy reckoning, however. Indeed, such idealistic zeal, such holy wrath and indignation, have not been seen since the so-called "Shaker" sect disappeared in rather untimely fashion during the 19th century.

Falwell and cohorts seem to have taken very much to heart (and soul!) the admonition, "nothing is so powerful as an Idea whose Time has come." I've heard estimates which place the membership of the Reverend's "Moral Majority" at 50,000,000 or more. Lacking as I do the demographic – or even the demogogic! – means with which to obtain an accurate tally, I am resigned to accepting the figures on "Faith" (appropriately enough). If the reliability of such numbers appears dubious, then the reader should take care not to dismiss them out of hand; there exists the possibility that Divine Intervention may be a factor here!

One is sorely tempted to make an analogy between the "Moral Majority" (hereinafter referred to as "Double-M") and the previously-mentioned "Shaker" sect. Like their predecessors, "Double-M" seems determined to take up the relentless crusade to "Stamp Out Fornication in Our Lifetime." Unlike the Shakers, however, "Double-M's" battalions show no signs of diminishing in number. Furthermore, the number of people who can be proselytized is finite. Therefore, if Falwell and "Double-M" are unwilling to sully themselves through the squalor of "original sin," it presumably stands to reason that the God-fearing Brigade becomes progressively larger through the efforts of the Good Lord Himself.

Let us be open-minded to such a prospect. Is it not possible that the well-being of America is in the offing? Surely we cannot deny the grass-roots appeal which Falwell and "Double-M" engender amongst our fellows. Perhaps you and I will be so fortunate as to see the righteous legions of the Reverend Falwell inundate our communities, shouting euphoric Hosannas in their inimitable fashion, and bearing placards and hand-painted signs proclaiming "God is No. 1," or some such articulate sentiment.

If nothing else, please be mindful of the Reverend's political sophistication. The notion of his congregation being 17,000 in number is itself absurd; the very credibility of the 50,000,000 figure for "Double-M" is open to question. In the long run, this scarcely matters; Adolph Schickelgruber's "Big Lie" technique is very much in evidence here, and I cannot deny the merit of pragmatism at work.

Furthermore, the politically-shrewd observer appreciates the influence of Machiavelli upon the Reverend and his faithful. Never has the maxim, "The End justifies the Means" been so aptly demonstrated in America's spiritual realm. Falwell's cunning was apparent when he granted an interview to that esteemed secular publication, Penthouse, only to seek an injunction in federal court in an attempt to halt distribution of the issue bearing the text of said interview. Through this process, the Reverend accomplishes two "fundamental" objectives: (1) He reaches a readership which might otherwise never be so fortunate as to see "The Word" in print; and (2) He instigates some controversy, which stimulates appreciably greater interest amongst the potential purchasers of newsstand items.

So very shrewd is he, this latter-day Elmer Gantry. One wonders how a Gantry, or a Billy Sunday perhaps, would have fared had they had access to network television. Suffice it to say that the Reverend Falwell and "Double M" reap a handsome return from their loyal brethren, exceeding $50 million yearly. High praise goes to the Reverend and his henchmen, who so selflessly risk their own prospects for Salvation by handling these vast sums of money, so that you and I might be extricated from the morass of iniquity in which we wallow. (By implication, I call the reader's attention to the Biblical proclamation, "Tis easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven"). Something which seems distressing, however, is the ratio of monies realized to membership – roughly, one dollar per member, if the figures for each are reliable. If tithes are customarily ten percent of one's income, then it is nothing short of astounding to think that "Double-M's" per capita income is but ten dollars per annum! If this be the case, then it lends credence to the previously-mentioned theory regarding Divine Intervention. The Lord truly does work in wondrous ways.

There are those among us who recall how America was utterly humiliated by a fanatical Iranian theocracy, as recently as a month ago. Obviously, we must be receptive to the implementation of safeguards which can prevent any recurrence. Thus, if we choose to fight fire with fire, we might do well to emulate our adversary in form as well as function. In short, why not a fanatical American theocracy? Who better to prompt such a "revival" than the Reverend Jerry Falwell, the Baptist Bodhisattva himself? (Perhaps John Anderson may make a credible bid; he is nearly as capable a demagogue as Falwell, if not as well-heeled. It was Anderson, after all, who sponsored legislation in each of three successive Congresses which would have declared America a Christian nation. Also, Anderson allegedly was heard to say that "God is my campaign manager" early on in his attempt at the presidency. Apparently, God and the former Congressman are not ideologically compatible. One hopes that they parted amicably.)

Andrew Young unilaterally elevated Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini to sainthood with scarcely a word of warning two years ago. By contrast, virtually no one has been so pretentious as to nominate the Reverend Falwell for canonization, although his credentials are at least as extraordinary as are those of Khomeini. Being the student of divinity that he is, the Reverend Falwell can appreciate and accept such an abysmal discrepancy. Even so, it is distressing to realize that Andy Young, an American minister, should sing the praises of a minister of another faith and nationality while disregarding the accomplishments of his countryman and fellow Baptist. Perhaps it was merely an oversight for which the Reverend Young feels genuinely contrite, and will hopefully make amends for very soon.

It is doubtful whether the Reverend Falwell harbors even a shred of musical talent. Yet, the diligence and the high-mindedness of his infatuation make one more fully appreciate the lyrics of a song whose popularity reached its zenith a good half-decade ago:

Dropkick me, Jesus,
through the goal-posts of Life;
End-over-end,
to the left or the right –
Straight through the heart of them righteous uprights
Dropkick me, Jesus
through the goal-posts of Life...

To be so reverent, and to be imbued with the force of eloquence therefrom, is among the finest endeavors one may aspire to. Ours shall surely be a more nearly perfect union when works such as the one printed above are made available, nay, mandatory, in our divinity schools.

Notwithstanding, then, the sardonic observations of Churchill ("There, but for the Grace of God, goes God") and John Steinbeck ("Arrogance is one of the prerequisites for sainthood") I liken "Double-M" to a procession of Saints – and, "I want to be among that number."

Anti-Social Insecurity

By Evans-Raymond Pierre

Surprise, surprise! There is a not so new game in town, in fact it's the only game in town. It's the "1984" Social Security Pyramid Game (SS for short) brought to you by Washington Big Bros. Inc. You have no choice, everyone is forced to play SS, except federal employees who administer the game, judges who insure its credibility and of course the 535 men and women in Congress who make the rules for SS and are supposed to represent us.

When it was established in 1935, the Social Security system deceived retired workers who were led to believe they were "contributing" towards an old age retirement fund. Today SS deceives workers who must support a growing number of SS recipients, and who expect to receive SS benefits in the future. In order to avoid bankruptcy, the SS administration, with a little help from "our" elected officials, annually taxes a larger percentage of the people's paychecks. SS "contributions" are inequitable, placing a heavier burden on its young and lower-income "contributors."

William J. Driver, commissioner of SS, said in June of 1980 that unless Congress acts, SS would not be able to pay old-age retirement benefits. What Driver meant was that unless Congress saved SS from bankruptcy by increasing workers' "contributions," SS would go out of business.

In 1950 a worker "contributed" 1½ percent of his paycheck to SS. The maximum contribution was $45. In 1981 close to 7 percent of all workers' paychecks go to SS. The maximum "contribution" is now $1,975.

According to some economists SS owes $4 trillion in SS benefits!! Not only shall we have to bear this burden, but so will our descendents for generations to come!! And although we will have to pay higher SS taxes, economist Milton Friedman writes that young workers now "contributing" to SS will "under present tax and benefit schedules... receive decidedly less" when they retire.

Government-sponsored inflation has raised SS payments, along with bureaucrats' and politicians' salaries, yet inflation has decreased productivity, savings, and investments, taxes collected, and has merely raised unemployment.

With a retirement age population growing at a considerably faster rate than the working age population, it will not be long until a small number of workers will have to support a large retired population. In 1950 17 workers financed the SS benefits of one retiree, in 1970 that number declined to three workers, by the year 2000 two workers will have to support one SS recipient.

SS is not a pension fund into which workers voluntarily invest and later on collect their original investment plus interest. SS "contributions," which are in reality taxes, are merely transfers of payment. They are not invested and therefore yield no interest. The punchline to this cruel joke is that the Federal politicians and bureaucrats promise young people nothing in the future in the form of SS payments, because there might not be any money for the now nearly bankrupt SS system.

Not only is SS a cruel joke on the young, but also on the workers of lower-income. Those who earn over $29,700 do not have to "contribute" more than the $1,975 maximum contribution to SS. Friedman states that the SS "contribution" "...constitutes a larger fraction of low-incomes than of high (incomes)." Generally speaking, a lower-income person is more apt to begin working earlier in life and die earlier than his middle- or upper-income counterpart. As a result, the lower-income worker pays more, yet receives less of the "benefits" of SS.

The callous SS administration will forget the "contributions" a deceased spouse made to SS and not pay survivors' benefits should the surviving spouse remarry. HERE, HERE for celebate widows and widowers.

SS was meant to be supplemental income, but increased government inflation and taxation have helped destroy private savings and investments. Today SS is in many cases the only form of income for retirees. SS regulations state that retirees must lose one dollar for every two dollars they earn over $4,000. So much for freedom of enterprise, freedom to work, and freedom from age discrimination.

Harvard economist Martin Feldstein estimates that personal savings and investments could have amounted to $168 billion in 1975 had SS "contributions" not taken $83 billion. continued on page 7

COMMENTARY

The Knowledge Business

By Al Terry

Financially, the American university is quite healthy. The university's dairylands, mining interests, basketball and football television contracts, book store, publishing house division, medical and hospital operations, computer rental, corporate counseling, and business-brain-exchange programs are all flourishing, with overall return on invested capital increasing about 11 percent per year.

For their sustained effort, top administration has been well compensated. Pay for the highest salaried administrators last year was $109,000, $102,500, and $95,250, respectively, exclusive of living and travelling expenses, and university pension plan accruals.

But top administration is disheartened and worried, and the professors are drinking too much. The groundsmen's morale is fair, because of recent raises, but the smiling faces of the freshmen, traditional signs of energy and hope, have begun to display queer, unattractive lines. At every level, even down into the depths of the library, where the librarians defiantly insist on signatures for the release of books instead of the new magnetic cards, people want the administration to stop what it is doing before it is too late.

A video-disc firm in New Jersey has come out with first-rate lectures on everything from photosynthesis to Phaedrus, and this has hurt the university, no doubt about it. Forced to become more competitive, the university has had to install VD-terminals in the library. The people in the library don't like the machines. (A few say they like the machines, but they are the people who like television.) When the machines go down, as they often do, the people in the library laugh and cheer, and roll out triple-decker trays of books – "displaced" books, which the director has yet to decide whether to throw in the dumpster or place in storage. The director threatens to cut up the staff into sections (according to discipline) and disperse the people to separate terminals on campus. Recently, the librarians ran the same disc on market research for a week. No one noticed, no one complained.

Professors have implored the administration to alter its course, and yet the administration has continued to answer with delayed guarantees, or in some cases, bureaucratic rebuff. One example: the academic dean warned the Classics department that it had better "shape-up," and begin to step in tune with the Literary Industry, or it would be discontinued. In a quiet demonstration, the professors in the department dressed up as ancient philosophers and picketted the administration building. Socrates wore sandles and a white robe. So did Aristotle. (Ulysses held a sign, 'Mentors are not pro ball players'.) The administration was impressed, and promised to review the situation. But after a week, the professors were told, "Go Away."

Some departments of the teaching staff are not depressed. The Chairman of the Business Management School has been a fountain of ideas, and his curriculum, full of courses on international resource development and new product deployment, is packed with students. More statistics professors have been hired, more economic professors, and more instructors, who, it turns out, are pretty hot on the new computer. The data, accounting, and silicon chip classes are especially popular.

The English and History departments have once again applied for relief, and have once again been promised it. (But, because of a slip up in the financial calendar, the money went instead for a new batch of Apple 2's.)

Surveys show seventy-five percent of the students to want "Space Wars" programmed into next semester's disc series, and feasibility studies are being conducted. Administration acknowledges, over long lunches at good restaurants, that the students are wrong to want "Space Wars," but insists that "taste cannot be legislated." Disagreeing, the president says he thinks such games could "supplement the personalized environment that we experience here at the university."

The campus police meanwhile, are beriddled with anxiety, and have asked to have a study done on vandalism, for it has nearly died out altogether – except for a few scratchings here and there. A resident sociologist suggests young people are turning to "modes of expression" which are less violent and more productive. The chief fears an imminent explosion of student unrest, while some of the junior officers, now with less work to do, fear they will be let go.

Not all the young people are well-adjusted. A few complain of tension, and they are being referred to a newly formed counseling group. The program includes seminars designed to show the students the "How-To's" of excess energy dispensal. Students can sign up for topics such as:

TIME MANAGEMENT MEMORY TECHNIQUES
CONCENTRATION MAPPING
RELAXATION STRATEGIES
GOAL GENERATING

The seminar series is open to "students or non-students" and any who wish to become more "effective persons."

Funding of the university theatre has been signed over to IBM, and ABC has been invited in to shore up the faltering communications department. (The few student journalists left are off in the corner whimpering, their paper having been long ago absorbed by public relations.)

Last Thursday, there was an especially lively show at the student gallery. The week's theme was fingerpainting – a playful and enlightened collection. The main event was entitled "Ophelia" – the work of a young artist who had dipped her feet in latex, and run around the entire building – on tiptoe.

Yes, the administration has vowed to stop what it is doing – not now but soon, soon. Meanwhile, we've formed a little group on the hill, and we drug ourselves and play the Doors, until, of course, the music's over.

Contrary to popular belief and to government propaganda, SS "contributions" are not divided between employers and employees. Employers deduct SS "contributions" as operating costs, thereby reducing available capital to hire additional employees or increase current employees' wages.

SS denies workers one of the fundamental freedoms, the freedom to choose their own destiny. Workers are not free to choose how much they would like to "contribute" to SS or how much and at what pace they can collect SS "benefits." If dissatisfied with SS, workers are not free to cancel their SS policies as they could do under private retirement plans.

In the past Amish farmers have refused, because of religious convictions, to "contribute" to SS or accept SS payments. For that they have had their properties seized by BIG BROTHER and Co. Inc. So much for the "separation of state and church" or for that matter, freedom of religion.

In the SS game a worker is assigned a number (015-60-4748 in my case) which remains with one for the rest of one's life. The worker is not free to obtain employment without a SS number. SS numbers are increasingly being stored in computers and being used for identification and record purposes by colleges (UVM), banks, the military, hospitals, et cetera. Those who registered for "selective service" (the "draft") did not have to reveal their SS numbers. Oh, you already gave your SS number. Too bad, your SS number will make it easier for Big Brother Inc. to enslave you into his army.

The easiest way for a government to monitor people in a society is by assigning each one of them numbers that they will use for identification and record purposes. It is easier yet if the majority of the people fail to realize that their privacy and liberty can be easily infringed upon by government bureaucrats.

Unless we act in unison, the danger that SS represents to our economic and social freedom will become more critical. All present SS payments must be continued. However, future retirees who have earned SS benefits must be permitted to collect their benefits and enter into private retirement plans of their choice. The regressive payroll tax (SS tax), which places a heavy burden on lower-income workers, must be ended. SS benefits could be funded from general revenues. By eliminating SS "contributions" no more SS commitments would be accumulated, workers would then be able to invest their money into private retirement plans which in order to return interest to their customers would have to invest in the private economy, thereby stimulating the private sector of the economy. Employers no longer forced to "contribute" to SS could expand their businesses, hire additional employees, raise employees' wages, et cetera.

The philosopher/economist Friedrich A. Hayek said it best: "...All sheltered monopolies become inefficient in the course of time..." This thought can certainly be applied to SS, which is neither social nor secure. It need not be that way, we, as taxpayers and citizens, can and must demand that our representatives rectify the injustice that the "Social Security" system represents.

Students Will Fight Decision

Comm Department Doors Virtually Shut

By Jonathan Goodspeed

In a March 4th memorandum to the Department of Communication's faculty members and students, Arts and Sciences Dean John Jewett formally proposed to phase out major programs in Mass Communication and Communication Studies and to disband the discipline entirely. Jewett's decision came several weeks after he suspended admissions into the major program.

His proposal will be placed under an administration review process, the results of which will be presented at the Trustees' June meeting, where the ultimate fate of the department will be decided. If this is accepted as a viable option by the Trustees, "the effective date of the termination of the major programs will coincide with the timely completion of major programs by currently admitted majors," Jewett said.

The reaction of the Student Steering Committee, representing those Communication majors who are actively trying to save the department, was negative. "I am more than willing to admit we have a definite problem," said Jim Blouin, a senior member of the committee. "We didn't come here to defend the department, we came here to study in it."

Vermont Legislator Marion Spencer (R—Addison—1), a University of Vermont Trustee, expressed concern that the department would lose its identity. "Communications is so vital to everyone," Spencer said. "I am concerned about its future here at UVM."

Jewett made his decision after reviewing four proposals submitted by students and faculty concerning possible directions the department could take.

The four options recognized in the memorandum were:

1. To retain the Communication Department as it exists now, but select a new chairperson from within the existing faculty, and implement a new curriculum proposed in the spring semester, 1980;

2. Recruit a new senior faculty member as chairperson, using money dedicated currently to two entry level positions, recruit one additional tenure-track faculty member, and develop a new curriculum that can be provided by a staff of eight faculty;

3. Phase out the major, but retain the department structure. Six faculty members would offer courses (but no major), and department leadership would be reduced to a coordinating role;

4. Phase out major programs, and discontinue the department. All tenured faculty and the debate program will be relocated to other departments.

The options were "assessed from the point of view of value, quality, and resources, and in terms of the need to solve the three fundamental problems identified in my February 11, 1981 memorandum," Jewett said. Option number 4 was chosen.

"I earnestly believe the proposed course of action is the best possible option for the future study of Mass Communication, Communication Studies, and Debate at UVM."

He continued, saying that this action is required to provide

Viet Vets Rally To Gain Overdue Recognition

By Richard Hyland

A large group of Vietnam Veterans and their families rallied at City Hall Park last Sunday to protest President Reagan's proposed cut of 800 million dollars from the Veterans Administration's 1982 budget. The rally, part of a National Green Unity Day sponsored by the Vietnam Veterans of America, featured several veterans who spoke candidly of their experiences and defended the work of the V.A. Outreach Centers, established to help veterans readjust to civilian life.

"I am here today because someone helped me," said Jake Jacobs, spokesman for the Rutland chapter of the VVA. "People must realize that we are all human beings first."

Another speaker, Richard Blake, asserted that the continuation of the Outreach Centers was necessary because "more Vietnam Veterans have taken their own life than were killed in combat." Although many veterans agreed that Federal spending had to be decreased, they argued that it should not come at their expense.

"We're spending too much, I understand that," said Mike Corcoran of the Disabled American Veterans, "but there should be programs for psychological readjustment." Corcoran justified his position by explaining that all the money spent on the Outreach Centers is less than the cost of one day's combat in Vietnam. "Which do you think is cost effective?" he asked.

A few speakers seized the opportunity to criticize Reagan's call for increased military aid to the government of El Salvador. "Reagan says it's different from Vietnam," said Richard Blake, "but that's a lot of crap. Vietnam started the same way. I can't believe how ridiculous this all sounds." He added that although he does not believe in writing letters to Congressmen, he was contemplating sending a "get well soon" card to President Reagan.

Another veteran referred to the many children in attendance and said that it was necessary to prevent another era of war. "I've lived in the woods, mentally and physically for eleven years," he said, "I don't want to see another generation of veterans."

The rally concluded with a speech from U.S. Congressman Jim Jeffords, an ardent supporter of the Vietnam Veterans' cause. Jeffords drew comparisons between the tumultuous welcome given the American hostages and the almost total lack of acknowledgement of U.S. servicemen for their role in the Iranian crisis. He pledged support for the continuation of the Outreach program and praised the work of the Vermont Outreach Center in Williston.

"We cannot cut these centers out now," the Congressman said. "What has already been done is miniscule to what we should be doing. This is a time for you to remind this country that you cannot be forgotten."

Jamieson, Former Exxon Pres, Sees Oil, Nuclear Future

By Reed Dewey

"The challenge for America is to build the energy bridge to a future of renewables," Kenneth Jamieson, former president of the Exxon corporation, said February 26th.

"Over the next twenty years we'll still be using mostly conventional raw materials and sources like coal and nuclear, but they'll probably be augmented increasingly by such things as shale oil and tar sands," he added.

In 1973, when OPEC instigated an oil embargo, Americans saw the last of cheap energy, Jamieson told the crowd in Carpenter Auditorium. Prior to the embargo, Exxon paid two dollars per barrel for Middle East crude. Today, OPEC oil costs 18 times as much. "OPEC has finally been recognized as a very powerful institution, although its strength derives from fundamental factors of supply and demand that have been long developing," the retired oil executive said. Jamieson illustrated OPEC's strength, saying that in 1973 the United States paid four billion dollars for oil imports while in 1980 over $75 billion was paid out.

Renewable forms of energy such as solar and hydroelectric power will only account for eight percent of the U.S. energy pie by the year 2000, Jamieson said. Solar energy, by itself, he predicted, will only make up one percent of our energy production. "The real contribution from solar awaits major technological advances that likely won't be made and widely applied until sometime in the 21st century." When asked why solar energy couldn't play more of a role in the short run, Jamieson replied that Exxon had done considerable research in solar cell technology development in the 1950s and early 1960s, but saw no future profit potential given the amount of research money the company was spending. Instead, Exxon shifted its financial resources towards nuclear energy development. Presently, Exxon has a nuclear fuel rod processing plant in Washington state.

"The United States is lucky" - Jamieson

Former Exxon chief Jamieson

Jamieson said that Exxon also forecast the limitations of oil back in the sixties and invested large amounts of capital in coal fields. Jamieson predicts that coal consumption in the United States will double by the year 2000. "The United States is lucky to be incredibly rich in coal resources. In terms of energy equivalent, we have forty times as much coal as oil."

Synthetic fuels derived from shale, coal and tar sands, Jamieson said, help provide the U.S. with liquid fuels essential for transportation and the petrochemical industries. "If many major projects get underway soon, synthetics could start making an impact by the 1990's," Jamieson explained.

According to Exxon figures, the United States, with only five percent of the world's population, consumes 40 percent of the world's energy. "We have more 'calories' to lose on the energy 'diet' than anyone else," Jamieson said, adding that "clearly, there's ample room for further progress with conservation." Exxon's predictions, though, still see energy demand increasing by 18 percent by the year 2000, "to make possible a growing economy."

At present, oil accounts for about 50 percent of our energy needs, but Jamieson predicts that oil will only deliver one third of our energy by the year 2000. "Almost half of our (oil) production, as we approach the year 2000, must come from reserves not yet discovered. Most potential oil reserves in the United States lie in the areas of Alaska and the outer continental shelf," Jamieson said. "One of the energy industry's problems is gaining access to federally controlled lands for petroleum exploration," he added. The government is "trying to protect us, but we have to take some risks if we want to get somewhere," Jamieson concluded.

According to Jamieson, major energy transitions to coal and nuclear power should be the beginning of changing energy policy. "Global transition to a new energy mix is achievable but will require large private sector investments, changes in existing government policies, and a long term commitment on the part of industry, government, and consumer alike."

Jamieson also predicts an extreme shortage of technically trained college graduates in the years ahead. Those entering technical fields will find abundant job opportunities in the energy industry, he added.

Sanders said he had already received inquiries from Good Morning America, ABC's newsmagazine program 20-20, and Time magazine, for feature presentations on his election.

Sanders' mayoral win capitalized upon a "protest" vote, an attempt to "send a message to city hall," and many who voted for Sanders were stunned to find they had elected a new mayor. Few outside the Sanders campaign considered the 39-year-old Brooklyn native a serious challenger to the firmly entrenched incumbent – least of all, Paquette himself. His time and energy consumed by the Downtown Mall, arterial highways and the lakefront, what some said was an attempt to build a monument to himself, Paquette neglected many of the constituent groups he had taken the time to disagree with earlier in his tenure.

There are few indications Paquette ever took Sanders' "Independent Coalition" challenge seriously; it was not until the final days of the campaign that he ceased referring to Sanders as *Saun*ders. Sanders, on the other hand, ran a hard grass-roots campaign, organizing brigades of door-knockers, leafletters and poster-affixers to save scarce dollars for a last-minute media blitz. He capitalized upon Democratic disaffection with the Mayor's priorities, promising an administration of "people before projects," while urging the traditionally apathetic groups of low-income people, renters, and young professionals to show their numbers at the polls. They did.

One of Paquette's gravest mistakes, according to UVM Political Science professor Garrison Nelson, was wrapping himself in a needed, but very unpopular tax increase. The 65-cent increase was proportionally the largest request in city history. Noting that "tax-revolt knows no ideology," Nelson attributed much of Sanders' strength in Ward Three (the city's most consistent anti-tax ward) to "tax-revolt" sentiment.

The full irony of Paquette's loss came from Ward Two, the ward which first sent then bakery truck delivery driver Paquette to the Board of Aldermen. In his five mayoral runs, Paquette had garnered an average of 74 percent of the Ward Two vote; this time he captured only 33 percent. Not only did Wards Two and Three, the city's poorest, give Sanders overwhelming pluralities; in staunchly Democratic Ward Two, Paquette's former aldermanic seat – held by hand-picked Democratic incumbent Marian Fisher – fell to Citizen's Party candidate Terry Bouricius. Ward Two endorsed only one Democrat, returning incumbent school board member Barbara Hockert to her seat. Bouricius, meanwhile, became the first Citizen's Party candidate in the nation to hold city office.

When the Board of Aldermen refused to place a Fair Housing Commission item on the city ballot, some local observers speculated the aldermen were loath to encourage the city's large renting population from stampeding the ballot box in a year when all challenges emanated from the Left. If so, they reaped a bitter harvest of rent control supporters demanding more than statutory change.

Support for the Fair Housing Commission was but one of the local issues addressed by Sanders in the campaign, although it was a key to his margin of victory in Ward Two. Gone altogether was the socialist rhetoric of the 60's and 70's, of breaking up multi-national corporations, worker ownership of factories, and public takeover of utilities. In its place, Sanders pledged an open-door City Hall, including a personal advisory council of low-income, labor and other citizen representatives. He opposed the building of the Southern Connector highway through the South End, and the construction of quarter-million dollar condominium units on the lakefront. He called for a shift in the city's tax burden toward businesses, doctors, and for "compensation" from the University of Vermont and the Medical Center Hospital, in lieu of property taxes, from which they are exempt.

Asked if he still calls himself a socialist, Sanders responded, "That's not relevant." Sanders concedes that real improvement of the lives of his poorest constituents will not be forthcoming from his assumption of a desk in City Hall – that will await "much more massive and fundamental change." Sanders' hopes instead to "foster cooperation throughout the city," and to see that the coalition that elected him does not, again, fall through the cracks of the political system.

Sanders' call for cooperation has been extended – as an olive branch – to the aldermen, and in their acceptance or rejection lies the very fate of the next two years in the Queen City. Joyce Desautels, Chairperson of the Board and a strong Paquette supporter, has pledged to all but stonewall Sanders with the cryptic assertion that her youthful experience as a "gutter fighter" on the streets would prove of use in dealing with the new administration. Aldermanic maverick Maurice Mahoney said he will take a wait-and-see attitude toward Sanders, but stressed that the "master manipulator of rhetoric" in Sanders would not find it easy to manipulate the intricate (and precarious) city budget before the Board. Hardly what could be called a vote of confidence, and Sanders' supporters among the "city fathers" promise to be a distinct minority. Whether the Board will willfully obstruct Sanders' appointments and proposals is still an open question. Since conventional wisdom holds that both Desautels and Mahoney consider themselves Paquette's heirs apparent, the olive branch promises to wilt well before the spring of 1983.

In forming the "Independent Coalition," as early as December of last year, Sanders had sought a full

Sanders' Upset Brings Mixed Campus Reaction

Faculty Split Over Burlington's Future

By Hart VanDenburg

Gordon Paquette was ousted from his ten year stint as Mayor of Burlington last Tuesday by Bernie Sanders, a socialist and native of New York City. The victory for Sanders was both a shock to some and a relief to others, but represented overall a massive change in the sympathies of the Burlington community.

"Sanders' win highlights more than anything else the total collapse of the urban party system, especially the Democratic party," said Professor Pietro Nivola of the UVM Political Science Department. Nivola, an urban politics specialist, pointed out that with the normal party structure in disrepair, the way is open for individuals with more initiative than the traditional parties. This theory is borne out by the election of Sanders, who turned Paquette, a long-time Democrat and believer in central government, out of office.

Nivola explained further that the irony of the election results was that Sanders as an independent, got the voters out using one facet of classic "machine" politics. He enlisted the support of many volunteers who spent a great deal of time and effort getting the voters out, literally going door to door to do it.

The fact that Sanders was an "out-of-stater" did not seem to bother the voters at all. Professor Garrison Nelson, also of the Political Science Department, attributed this to the fact that Sanders was running on issues that were of interest to students and non-students alike,

Many Students Stand Behind Sanders

By Carol Hills

Reaction on campus to the surprising upset victory by Bernard Sanders in last Tuesday's mayoral election ranged from disbelief and enthusiasm to puzzled looks followed by "Who's he?"

Only three of the fifty randomly selected students opposed his victory, while nine seemed unaware that there had even been an election. The majority of those questioned consider the Sanders victory a positive and needed change for Burlington.

"Maybe it will set an example for the rest of the country," said Senior Jon Goodspeed.

Andrew Edlin, a Sophomore majoring in English, referred to Burlington's Socialist Mayor-elect as "the most significant change the city has ever seen." He added that Sanders' election was a hopeful sign in a country dominated by political conservatives.

Many complained that Mayor Gordon Paquette had lost touch with the people and that Sanders represents a broader political base, including the low-income and elderly, as well as students. Several referred to the mayor-elect's pledges to work with city youth, change the tax structure, improve neighborhood housing, fight waterfront development of condominiums, and alter or stop the planned southern connector highway, as factors that caused them to vote for him.

One Paquette supporter found Sanders too liberal while another accused him of ignoring the energy issue.

S.A. Pres Announces Plans For Billings Pub

By Terri Johnson

"The Student Association has been busy and has many plans for the remainder of the semester," S.A. President Michael Deutsch said in an interview Monday.

In the next few weeks, Deutsch, S.A. Vice-President Rick Green, and Student Activities Director David Nestor will take the Billings renovation proposal to the residence halls. They will present a slide show to inform students about the feasibility study underway for the construction, which includes an underground connection between Billings and Ira Allen Chapel. Students will have a chance to ask questions and express their opinions on the plans. Deutsch encourages those who support the study to sign a petition to let the S.A. Senate know their feelings. The Senate will vote on whether to give their support to the plans later this month.

S.A. plans to sponsor a Billings Pub on March 21. Students are invited to the Billings Den for 40 cent beer, games, and pinball, and no admission charge. Money for the party will come from S.A.'s special events fund. Deutsch says that the pub "is the beginning." He hopes it will eventually become a regular event.

In other S.A. business, the Student Action committee proposes to evaluate almost 400 Arts and Science and College of Engineering, Mathematics and Business Administration courses. The week of March 16, Vice-President Green will head a group that will ask students 12 questions about what they think of the courses. Targeted in the evaluation are introductory courses that a lot of students take for distribution requirements, or as electives. Deutsch and Green ask that students interested in taking questionnaires around to classes contact one of them or come to a meeting Thursday at 6 p.m. in the North Lounge of Billings.

Also coming up for the S.A. are elections for President and Vice-President, to be held March 25-26. Candidates must submit their petitions to the S.A. office by this Friday afternoon. So far three presidential and six vice-presidential candidates have filed. Candidate forums will soon appear in the Cynic and on WRUV.

In past S.A. action, several students lobbied the legislature in Montpelier March 3rd. The students made four presentations to the House and Senate Appropriations Committees to urge them to approve the 11% state fund increase the University has requested. The lobbyists' main points were that students may be getting shortchanged by not getting their money's worth, that the school may price itself out of the in-stater's reach if UVM does not receive more funds. They also pointed out that the state must recognize the economic and educational impact that the University and the students have on the community.

Trustees Look To Tighten University's Belt

By Sarah Bailey

Inflation and the Reagan budget were of major concern last weekend as the UVM Board of Trustees gave preliminary approval to a 15 percent increase in room rates and a 12-percent increase in board for next year. A maximum charge of $878 for board, up $96 from last year, was tentatively approved, as was a room rate of $1,404 for a double room, up $190 from last year. Final approval will be voted on in April.

The Board also gave the University approval to borrow $858,000 for construction of a new cooling tower for the Given Medical Building. The money, needed to replace a tower implicated in last summer's Legionnaire's Disease outbreak has been requested from the Vermont State Legislature.

Construction on the tower must begin immediately, according to UVM President Lattie Coor, in order to be working by summer. The Legislature, however, will not act upon the request until they address the entire Fiscal Year 1982 budget and this will probably not allow enough time for completion of the job before July.

Coor told the board that the Legislature assured him the Given funding had "top priority... We anticipate the success of the request, but we feel we must start the project immediately."

In last Friday's Budget and Finance meeting the trustees also discussed the impact that inflation and President Reagan's budget cutting may have on the University. Robert Arns, Vice-President for Academic Affairs, outlined some potential reductions in UVM funding.

Financial aid for students is one area that faces severe changes. Currently a Basic Educational Opportunity Grant (BEOG) awards $1750 to qualified students. These awards may drop to $1250 per student. Arns estimates that this would mean a loss of $935,000 to the University. If the reduction were only to $1,500 per student, the loss would be $500,000.

"Financial aid is one of the most significant aspects of students who go to UVM," said Coor. "There are changes in the offing that may be sobering."

Arns also estimated a potential loss of $1.75 million in General Student Loans due to an elimination of in-school interest subsidies and a raise in the interest rates.

Cuts in the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment for the Humanities could result in a $75,000 reduction of federal grants and contracts to the University, primarily in the College of Arts and Sciences. Other cuts could result in the College of Education and Social Services losing $240,000, and the School of Natural Resources losing $100,000.

In other business, the board approved:

*Raising the room cancellation fee from $50 to $100 and slate of aldermanic, and even school board candidates to run with him. With competition from members of the Citizen's Party for willing "cannon fodder" before the Democratic guns (including a Citizen's Party candidate for mayor who finally demurred to Sanders), the Mayor-elect failed to carry a single member of his coalition into office. As a hundred-to-one longshot – a socialist in the eye of that storm known as "a swing to the right" – not even "progressive" candidates were racing to fling themselves upon Sanders' coattails.

*Raising the late payment fee from $10 to $50.

Sanders garnered his first claim to political "respectability" with an endorsement from Burlington's Patrolmen's Association, trading upon poor pay and departmental discontent. The following day a select group of UVM professors, led by George Albee of the Psychology Department, declared their support of Sanders. Other faculty members, notably religion professor Richard Sugarman, English professor Huck Gutman, history professor Mark Stoler and economics professor Jenny Stoler, comprise a good portion of the Sanders' "brain trust."

Sanders will take office early in April, should the recount confirm the election's apparent outcome. In the meantime, a gauntlet of briefings and strategy sessions checker the weeks before he takes office. Paquette is out of town for the recount, presumably enjoying the Florida sun and reflecting upon his decade in City Hall. The city budget, assuming level funding, is running slowly into the red in the wake of overwhelming rejection of the 65-cent city tax increase. Reagan administration budget cuts critically threaten the county's subsidized bus service, and urban development grants are expected to evaporate overnight, heightening the city's revenue crunch.

"Sanders' election was based upon a 'negative coalition,'" Nelson observed. "He's got to move fast enough to keep his more radical supports pleased, without alienating everyone else."

And not just Bernie Sanders but the future of the city is balanced on the wire the new mayor must walk, Nelson said.

But one thing appears certain: "politics as usual" in Burlington has passed away.

(The Cynic wishes to thank Gary Nelson, without the aid of whom this article could not have been written.)

a proper structural environment for strengthening instruction, research, and creative activities, and service in the Communications field. Students should not be exposed to a major program which cannot offer all related courses, he said.

Jewett argued that his proposal has many other advantages. "It will allow all available resources to be used to provide 'high quality' programs to current majors," (because resources will not be used up in enrolling new majors). Also, an enduring commitment could be made to offer a wide variety of Communication courses in the future. These relocated positions would be housed in a stable department structure, and in the event of resignation or retirement, fruitful searches for new faculty could be expected. And the debate program will flourish under different arrangements with regard to a departmental home, he explained.

Frank Manchel, Associate Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and current Chairman of the Communication Department, said he "feels very optimistic about the future."

Members of the Student Steering Committee are apparently not as optimistic as Manchel. "Even though the faculty will be moved, they will still have their jobs. In the long run, it will be the students who lose," said Blouin. "Anyone graduating from the Communication Department in the next four years will be graduating under a 'low quality' program. Therefore the public will perceive the graduates as having abilities of low quality."

"We are concerned with our future," Blouin continued. "What are our job market possibilities, especially when we will be competing with graduates from other Communication Departments?"

Blouin also said that Communication students are angry about the reasons Jewett has been giving as to why the department should be closed. "They should come out and say they cannot afford a good Communication Department," said Communication major Tod Warner, a Senior. "It is obviously a question of economics," Warner added.

"One of our necessities now is to attempt to influence the Trustees, because they have the final decision. We are now in the process of drafting a letter which will be sent to alumni, a letter which asks if those concerned about the future of the Communication Department would write to the Board of Trustees, and express their concern," Blouin said.

Vermont State Representative Edward Colvin (R–Bennington–3), a member of the UVM Board of Trustees, said he doesn't "object to cutting a department if it is not fruitful, but I feel the Board of Trustees should be part of any decision made to propose such action."

Dear Vermonter:

Each summer, a number of Vermont young people join my Washington staff as interns. The program concentrates on improving our government as well as on learning more about how it functions. Over the past six summers, our intern program has proven very rewarding to both my Washington staff and to the Vermonters who took part.

I would encourage students and recent graduates to apply. Due to the small size of the program, applications must be restricted to Vermont residents only. If you are interested, please write, and remember to include a resume and brief writing sample. My address is: Senator Patrick Leahy, United States Senate, Washington, DC 20510.

Since the program will run from the middle of June to the middle of August, applications must be received by March 15. A member of my staff will contact applicants to arrange interviews later in the spring.

Any questions you may have can be answered by calling Mrs. LouAnn Lamson in my Burlington office. The Vermont toll-free number is 1-800-642-3193. In Burlington, call 863-2525.

I look forward to hearing from you.

People Are The Most Precious Resource

By Eliot Bergson

For almost 50 years, David Brower has championed the cause of wilderness preservation, and with great success. He was instrumental in establishing The Cape Cod and Point Reyes, California National Seashores, the Allagash Wilderness in Maine, and Florida's Everglades Wilderness. He has also been credited with almost single-handedly preventing the building of the proposed Grand Canyon Dam and the Echo Park Dam in the Dinosaur National Monument. Because of this, author John McPhee terms Brower "the single most effective force" in the American conservation movement.

Brower brought his message of fighting for wilderness, "that extraordinary book of knowledge," to Ira Allen Chapel Monday evening, where he told a crowd of about 250 people not to give up hope.

"You must realize how important an individual is," Brower said. "It is terribly important to realize your own power."

"Everything I've worked for in the last 42 years is going down the drain. I've seen a lot of good things happen, and I'm about to see them disappear if the climate in Washington prevails," he added.

The former director of the Sierra Club, brought to UVM through the efforts of S.A. Vice President Rick Green and Slade Hall resident Margo Davis, argued that Americans can no longer hold on to our "addiction to exponential growth." Using figures from The Global 2000 Report to the President as evidence, Brower explained that the world will be much more crowded in the year 2000, but we will have much fewer resources.

"There is not a pinpoint of light in the Reagan Administration about this. Present economic practices are a sophisticated manner of stealing from children.

> "Love is a strange resource. The more of it you use, the more of it there is."
> -Brower

We're discounting the future at no value. The main problem is that the U.S. doesn't want any other country to have a grosser national product than us," he said.

Conservation of resources and a switch to an emphasis on renewable resources is a necessity, the wilderness expert said, but Mr. Reagan's appointment of James Watt as Secretary of the Interior and James Edwards as Energy Secretary prove the president's lack of understanding of environmental priorities.

"How much energy does it take to ruin Alaska? One watt," Brower quipped.

The only way to stem this tide, and have the principles of responsible growth adhered to, Brower said, was for people to let their voice be heard in Washington. He suggested that each person write letters to their Congressman and President Reagan on controversial issues, but emphasized the "absolute importance" of doing the same thing in the event of a favorable decision in Washington.

"Elected officials watch editorials and the mail. If there is no favorable response to an action, it will not be decided the same way the second time around," Brower said.

Aside from thanking a responsible politician for rendering a sane decision in the environmental arena, Brower suggested that grass-roots organizing be emphasized by concerned individuals. He said that he was extremely happy with the fact that 13 towns in Vermont, "a place where there is a great appreciation of terrain," voted to have the State Legislature ask for a moratorium on nuclear proliferation.

As Chairman of the Board of Friends of the Earth, a conservation organization founded after Brower's tenure as Sierra Club's director, he is striving for an end to nuclear power, because "all other conservation concerns don't or won't matter in the long run." He explained that if a plutonium processing unit were built, as is being suggested by the Reagan Administration, a catastrophe of unimaginable dimensions could occur.

"If a processing plant were hit, by a nuclear warhead or sabotage, more Strontium-90 and Cesium-137 would be released than is contained in all the nuclear weapons on earth. If, for example, this were to happen in Europe, it would render the entire sub-continent uninhabitable forever," Brower explained.

Because the growth of nuclear power is an excuse to proliferate nuclear arms, Brower wants the United States to stop supplying the world with nuclear technology in the name of corporate profit, and realize a future of peace.

"We do not increase our security by decreasing the Soviet's security (by building more warheads). The U.S. must make the first step. Not a big step, but the first in the right direction," Brower said.

Brower ended his speech by re-emphasizing the belief that the individual can make a difference, a belief that he has followed throughout his own long fight to preserve wilderness.

"Love is a strange resource. The more of it you use, the more of it there is."

which has not been true of past elections. Tenants don't usually vote, according to Nelson, but this time around, with rent control an issue (if not on the actual ballot) they turned out in unprecedented numbers. A large proportion of tenants in the downtown area are students, and voted for Sanders and, symbolically, rent control.

Many University of Vermont professors supported Sanders as a candidate. Professors Gutman of English and Sugarman of Religion actually petitioned the faculty body, one of the results of which was an advertisement in all the local press formally endorsing Sanders for Mayor.

"It was an attempt to show that Sanders had substantial support on the campus," said Gutman, who canvassed those he knew throughout the University.

Professor Gregory Mahler, one of many people whose names appeared on the list of formal Sanders' supporters, said that no matter how good or bad a mayor is, "ten years is enough." He went on to say that "Paquette had lost touch" with the Burlington public, citing the lakefront development and the Southern connector as evidence. Mahler expressed concern that, given the state of Burlington housing at this time, Paquette's support of these two schemes showed him backing away from the more pressing issues of the day. The projects clearly supported, in his view, a preference for the more wealthy residents of Burlington.

The University of Vermont, as well as supplying many volunteers who supported Sanders, had something more to offer the new city administration in some faculty members' eyes. Professor Albee, of Psychology, stressed that there was a great well of "untapped intellectual resources" on campus, and that "many faculty members and students are ready to work with the Mayor's office."

Albee first met Sanders at the Vermont Faculty Seminar Meetings. "I talked to him at length on a variety of issues," said the psychologist, but insists that his advice was only in relevance to ways of making use of the opportunities that UVM offered. "He's a very competent strategist," Albee said.

And if there were conflicting opinions as to who would win, there was one thing which both supporters and opponents of Sanders had in common. They were surprised that Sanders pulled off a victory.

Professor Nelson thought that Sanders' tactic was to simply get enough of the vote to scare the Burlington community. Nelson, who on election night was following the returns on a local radio station, had been predicting a Paquette victory based on the past ten years' voting records. Sanders went against the averages. Even Professor Gutman was surprised at the result.

Not only did Sanders take the liberal wards, but "what really surprised me was that he even swept the traditionally Republican and Democratic wards," said Gutman. It would appear that the "competent strategist" whom Professor Albee talked about, had done his homework. But, as Gutman said Tuesday, "Thinking you can win is completely different from actually getting the votes... you only had to see the look on his (Sanders) face the night of the election to see that it was a surprise."

Many students talked about the problems Sanders will face trying to work with the Democratic Aldermen and the city's financial problems. Paquette's proposed 65 cent increase in the city tax was defeated on the March 3rd ballot and he has now issued a freeze on government hiring. "It's going to be a short honeymoon," said Senior Wendy Lappell.

Michael Nolan, News Director at WRUV, was both surprised and pleased with the election, but said that harsh feelings exist within the Burlington-power structure and that Sanders' campaign was consequently presented negatively.

Residents of Slade Hall were particularly excited over the Sanders victory. Many of them were active in grass roots organizing, calling students and urging them to get to the polls in support of their candidate. John Rumaldi, one of the most active students from Slade, foresees a more effective relationship between the city government and the university.

"It's a change and it's surprising," said Evans Raymond-Pierre, Senior and S.A. Senator. "Sanders succeeded in getting the low-income voters to the polls and a lot of the people that support Paquette didn't vote."

Pierre said the Student Association would like to improve relations with the city of Burlington. In the past they have invited the City Council to a wine and cheese party. They plan to invite Sanders for a presentation and an opportunity to meet with students.

Paquette's near silent campaign and smug attitude contributed to his defeat, according to Wendy Greenberg, a Junior at the University, and active member of P.A.C.T. (People Acting for Change Together). "Bernie's winning has strengthened a trend that has been growing in Burlington for a long time."

P.A.C.T. endorsed Sanders and campaigned hard for him. "People feel a personal responsibility since the election was so close," said Greenberg, and she added that the support of students and the elderly, particularly women, was crucial in determining the outcome of the election.

Greenberg said the Sanders' victory will allow P.A.C.T. and other neighborhood groups to form a coalition aimed at common goals. She sees City Hall as a "people's place" with a mayor more amenable to change.

Northeastern Knocks Cats Out Of ECAC Basketball Tourny Following UVM's Triple Overtime Victory Against Boston University

SKIERS WIN AIAW TITLE

By Lon Brettell

The University of Vermont women's ski team won the A.I.A.W. ski championships held at Bozeman, Montana.

Vermont finished the championship in dramatic fashion, storming back from a ten-point and 39-second deficit to win the 4x5 kilometer cross-country relay and the national championship.

Vermont needed to beat Middlebury by two places in the relay to capture the crown. Most coaches felt Vermont had the strongest nordic team, but Middlebury's wasn't far behind. Alaska and Utah were given outside shots at beating Middlebury.

After the first leg, Kelley Milligan had given UNH the lead, and Betsy Haines had Vermont in second. Middlebury's Alice Tower got off to a poor start as her illness kept her from running in top form.

In the second and third legs, New Hampshire fell out of contention, while Vermont stayed near the top with runs by Jennifer Caldwell and Liz Carey. Utah moved into first, and Middlebury moved into third, thanks to fine runs by Keli and Tara McMenamy.

Utah had a 39 second lead entering the final leg. Vermont's Leslie Bancroft ran the fastest leg of the day, after she had pulled to within 20 seconds of Utah's Marrit Lund. In the next race, Bancroft caught and passed the tired Lund. Utah finished second and Middlebury finished third.

The A.I.A.W.'s had begun on Wednesday with the giant slalom event. Vermont was without All-American captain Lindy Kelly who suffered a knee injury in the Middlebury Carnival. Vermont's alpine team consisted of sophomore All-American Laurie Baker and four freshmen, Jennifer Kennedy, Gayle Voelker, Debby Miller and Emily Hart. Racing for Middlebury were two All-Americans (Leslie Smith and Cindy Gavett) and Leslie Baker, Dani Shaw and Jeanne Hammond. Wyoming jumped out to the early lead with Becky Simning coming in first and Stacey Ward finishing third. Tiania Tutt finished second for Colorado. The top eastern finisher was Leslie Smith of Middlebury in fifth place. Leslie Baker, also of Middlebury, was sixth and Kennedy of Vermont was eighth. Vermont's Laurie Baker and Gayle Voelker

In a joint effort, Jim Nocera and Time Woodlee score two points in Catamount playoff game.

Dramatic Victory Over BU Was First Playoff Win For Men Since Basketball Started At Vermont in 1900

By Andy Cook

"Jesus Christ," muttered Tony Adams of WCAX Sports.

"You turkeys," bellowed Mrs. Salzberg to the referees.

"Common, Jimmy!" pleaded the Catamount faithful.

Why all the commotion? Why all the fuss? Simply put, last Tuesday's 85-84 triple overtime win against Boston University which brought the University of Vermont's basketball team to within two victories of the ECAC North Championship was perhaps the most thrilling and emotion-packed sporting event ever seen by the partisan Catamount crowd in Patrick Gym.

Never before had a UVM men's basketball team won a playoff game and never before had one been played here in Burlington. As if to make up for this long-awaited post-season appearance by the Catamounts, over 2,000 fans were treated to a roller coaster ride of emotions by the determined and aggressive play of both teams. In the end, it was a Jim Nocera foul shot, 27 seconds of flawless defense, and a missed BU shot at the buzzer, which left everyone feeling weak yet ecstatic.

The Vermont ride to long-awaited glory was then derailed by the ferocious rebounding efforts of the Northeastern Huskies on Thursday, but even that contest went into overtime before Peter Salzberg took his final bow as head coach of a UVM team that simply didn't know the meaning of the word quit. Now, as the old cliche goes, the players will have to watch the rest of the tournament on TV. But during each commercial they will think about the cardiac finish to the regular season and especially about the two wins over BU, which brought pride to a basketball program which appeared to be heading for disaster midway through the season.

This was supposed to be a good year for the Catamounts. They were 12 men, who had played together for at least one year. Although the team's 1980 record was 12-15, Salzberg was quick to point out that 10 of the 15 Cat losses were to teams which made it to the NCAA playoffs, and that the club lost five games by six points or less. Without losing any seniors to graduation, the prospects appeared bright for a banner season.

But misfortune was written on the team's uniforms from the season's start. At the Rutgers tournament in New Jersey, UVM was outscored approximately two to one by St. Peters. Then the team went on a road trip to New York state, which not only produced two losses (to RPI and Fordham) but also the seemingly untimely resignation of Salzberg. The head coach's decision to leave at season's end provoked criticism not only of himself, but of the alleged "lack of support" he was receiving from the UVM Athletic Office.

Huskies Kill Cats In Overtime With Foul Shooting

By Cristina Fiorini

The University of Vermont was eliminated from the ECAC basketball tournament by Northeastern, 76-69, in overtime. The Cats missed a shot at the buzzer in regulation time and then succumbed to the Huskies' torrid foul shooting in the extra period.

The Cats had traveled to Boston after beating BU in triple overtime here last Thursday, in the first UVM basketball playoff victory ever.

"We had everything to win, to do what we had to," commented Vermont coach Peter Salzberg, "but we didn't capitalize."

The first half belonged to the Huskies after a Dane Correll jumper tied the game, 14-14 at 10:59. Northeastern steamed ahead and opened a 10 point lead while shooting around Vermont's Steve Thode and Tim Woodlee. The Huskies latched onto this, and kept the Cats' ECAC All-Star Mike Evelti scoreless throughout this period, which ended with the score 38-24.

A whole new ball game began with the start of the second period. Vermont bounced back with scoring led by Evelti, hitting a technical and a shot inside, Bruce Beynnon with two hoops, Jim Nocera dropping a foul shot and a Corey Wielgus jumper closing the gap at 12:13.

"We were impatient first half," stated Salzberg. "Second half we played the way we're capable of playing."

At 7:17, Correll hit two foul shots, bringing the score to 50-49. This was followed by an Evelti jumper which gave Vermont its first lead in the game. The Cats continued their rampage and stretched the lead to 54-50 with a Wielgus score along with two Jeff Brown foul shots.

With 3:40 left, Northeastern's Roland Braswell cut Vermont's lead to 59-58. Later, Brown shot at the line and put Vermont up by only one point. Then Northeastern's Eric Jefferson fired a shot to tie the game 60-60 with 50 seconds left on the clock. UVM took the ball down the court calling a time out with 12 seconds remaining. Seconds flew by as the ball was passed to Brown who tried to bang it in for a shot. However, it bounced off the back and sent the contest into overtime.

The start of overtime was dominated by Huskie play as Roland Braswell and Pete Moss chalked up two points apiece, and initiated a 64-60 Northeastern advantage. Evelti came up with two foul shots to bring Vermont within two points of Northeastern, but the Huskies' Jefferson came back with two more points. Foul shots killed the Cats, as they were Northeastern's only form of scoring.

UVM's Basketball Season Superb, Media Coverage Poor

The Cats went on to host the Black Bears of Maine, who nearly threw Vermont's playoff hopes into Lake Champlain when their ECAC-Most Valuable Player, Champ Godbolt, led the team to consecutive wins at Patrick, including one contest that went into overtime.

Slowly, however, things began to get better. Jeff Brown's 18 points sparked a one-point win over Robert Morris College, and the Catamounts went on a five-game winning streak. People like Tyrone Johnson started coming off the bench and executing their skills in clutch situations. Suddenly, the Cats were winning games by one or two points, and the maturity of the squad was being manifested in the final few minutes of each nail-biting contest. Although the Cats lost to Colgate on Feb. 21 by virtue of Mike Ferrara's 18-foot jumper in the final seconds of play, Salzberg's men now possessed a very impressive 6-1 record in games that were decided by fewer than three points.

Unfortunately, during the climax of this season, the local media did its usually horrible and despicable job of reporting sports. As if unable to make up their mind whether to cover Boston, Montreal, or UVM sports, TV and sports crews concentrated on high school gymnastic meets in Montpelier! Here is the state university in a town that is, of course, too small to house a professional franchise. But instead of pushing publicity and interest in UVM sports, especially basketball, the stoic announcers of the Champlain media insulted their audiences night after night with disorganized, and utterly worthless reports about activities ranging from Buffalo Sabre hockey to schoolboy wrestling. The Burlington Free Press, meanwhile, published dull and lifeless articles about the Vermont Five, and rarely did the paper include an in-depth analysis of the team's play.

Therefore, it was somewhat humorous to be sitting on Journalist's Row for the two thrillers against BU. In the first game, which provided the Cats with the home court advantage for the opening playoff game, several announcers pounded the tables with clenched fists and curled programs. Inbetween Mrs. Salzberg's verbal assault on the referees, the usually lackadaisical broadcasters, in actions as surprising as Tom Landry's smile during a football game, moaned and groaned as a 14-point Cat lead dissipated during the final few minutes as UVM hit a cold spell. But when UVM won the contest, a grinning TV sports director grabbed Salzberg's hands and said, "Congratulations, coach. I knew you had them beat all the time." Another journalist, a sports writer from the Barre Times-Argus, began sputtering forth statistics which no one could understand due to the excitement in his voice. What a bunch of Dr. Jeckles and Mr. Hides!

A book could be written about the triple overtime contest. Sitting between representatives of the Rutland Herald and WCAX, I was right next to the fist pounders, who made Burlington seem like Fenway Park during the sixth game of the 1975 World Series. This was the big game, all right — a game in which the happy ending will be replayed over and over by fans who suddenly were being informed by the media about a basketball team which had rarely received the relative publicity for its importance.

But perhaps the three overtimes will serve as an example of the spirit of this town and state. You don't need a professional franchise to attract interest in sports; you need interested journalists, who are willing to interview players and promote UVM athletics, particularly basketball. As each overtime expired, fans and reporters conversed on strategy and suddenly there were our heroes — the basketball players of Vermont, who were capturing the attention and admiration of thousands of people throughout the Burlington area. When the game ended, mobs of fans jammed the area between the broadcasting table and the front row of stands, screaming and hollering. Meanwhile, reporters shook hands and pounded the back of Sports Information Director Dick Whittier, whose hearty smile showed signs of relief that this marathon contest which had captured the hearts of the local sports buffs was finally over.

One source reported that half of the fans in attendance for the loss in Boston on Thursday were from the Burlington area. They saw a game that had produced a now classic Catamount comeback. Trailing by nine points at the half, and doing a virtually ineffective job grabbing offensive rebounds, the University of Vermont received tremendous support from its reserve players, and by taking a three-point lead in the final minutes of regulation time, nearly pulled the impossible dream out of the hat. But now, Burlington has its set of heroes despite the frustrating loss, and it's up to the media of this city to make Vermont not forget about the team that came from nowhere to nearly shock the eastern college basketball world and to produce a pulsating, emotional, win in triple overtime that may, and probably will be referred to in the future as "THE win over BU." Yes, UVM basketball Cats, for those of us who knew you and followed you, 1981 was a year we'll never forget. You've made the Green Mountain state proud.

Braswell hit two, Moss and Robinson each dropped in one, and with 36 seconds left, the Huskies led 65-70. Although UVM managed to chalk up four more points with two Wielgus jumpers, time ran out as Northeastern shot ahead, with six more foul shots.

"Vermont played inspired basketball as anyone we've played," commented Northeastern coach Jim Calhoun. In regard to his team's performance, he noted, "Overall we didn't play well. Nine days off hurt us, we weren't prepared to play."

Salzberg, noting the outcome of what was his final game, having earlier in the season announced his retirement, commented, "They played smart. They did the two things that bother us, better than any other team we've played. They clogged us inside while pressuring our perimeter."

This past weekend ends the 1980-81 Vermont basketball season with the play of the ECAC finals. Northeastern went on to defeat Holy Cross, by two points in overtime, to win the ECAC North championship.

Baseball Owners Meet Players' Demands

By Bill Sawch

With seven digit figures ringing in their heads, professional baseball players are quickly changing America's favorite pastime into America's money market. With each passing year, salaries soar higher and higher. Just this past winter a record-breaking contract was signed by former San Diego Padre Dave Winfield with the ever-spending New York Yankees. The deal is estimated to stand at about 22 million dollars for ten years. Not bad for a guy whose lifetime batting average is somewhere in the range of .280 or so! Then again, it isn't surprising these days to see a player whose credentials aren't exactly overwhelming to receive illustrious contracts.

The club owners continue to spend, and with the increasing competition for the big stars, the salaries for these players rise. The man most notorious for his free-agent dealing is, of course, George Steinbrenner, principal owner of the New York Yankees. Since taking over the team back in 1973, he has bought player after player in order to restore a winning tradition in New York. Unfortunately for other clubs, it has paid off well.

The increase in player wages has also had an effect on the fans. To compensate for the cost of fielding a respectable team nowadays the organizations have been forced to raise ticket prices. Yet despite the increase, fans are not driven away. In fact, total league attendance has risen every year from 1975 to 1980 except for a slight decline last season. Along with the deals comes a great amount of controversy, thus creating a greater interest in the financial aspect of the sport. It's simple; big names attract fans. But after all, what is to deter an owner from spending a couple million dollars if the player he's signing is going to make him money? Nothing at all except if that player falls flat on his face and is a flop. That's been known to happen! But with the desire to win so badly owners are willing to take the chance.

From the start, Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn has disliked high salaries. He has done what he can to prevent them, but there is little he can do. With the Players Association being so strong today, it's almost as if the players themselves are running the game. Owners are like mere puppets controlled by their employees. Owners often criticize one another for ruining the game with their spendings, yet many are in turn guilty of the same charge. For example, in a recent issue of Sports Illustrated, a San Francisco Giant co-owner was quoted as saying "the Winfield contract was outrageous." But twice themselves, the Giants did the same thing. They were responsible for signing Rennie Stennett, a second baseman, to a five-year – three million dollar contract which was probably the most ridiculous deal before the

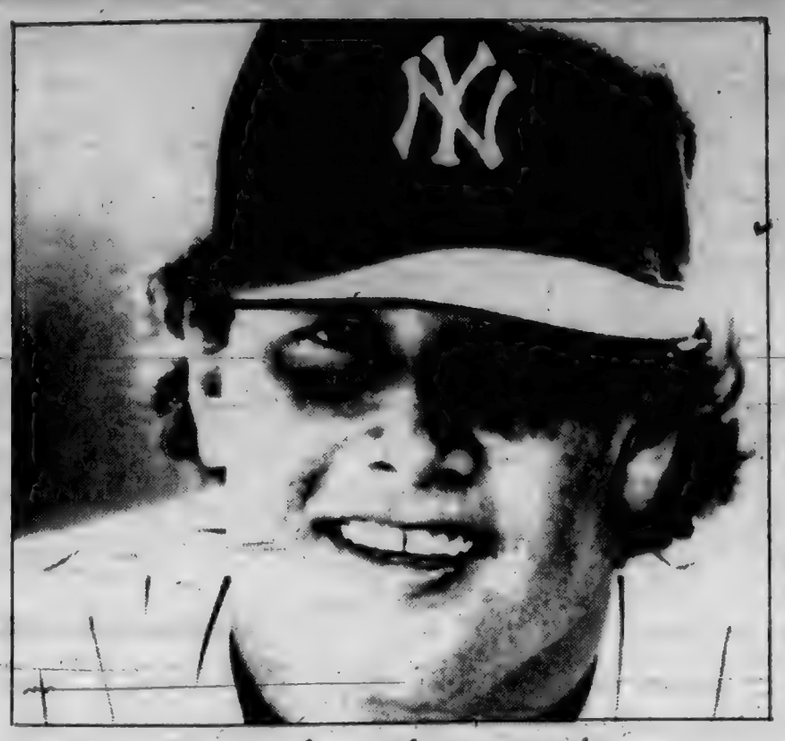
Swimmers Look Towards Future



By L. E. Lassiter

Unknown to so many of us, the UVM men's swimmers have enjoyed – no pun intended – a watershed season. Between them, Cary Clark and Brian Shimel have broken no fewer than five varsity records. In addition, the Catamounts trounced their opposition nine times over the course of eleven dual meets, as Shimel, Clark, Glenn Eagleson and Mike Hains collectively recorded first and second place finishes in each of these nine matches.

At the New England Regional Swim Tournament, held this past weekend in Springfield, Mass., only two teams – UVM and Boston University – were able to qualify two or more divers for the finals. Shimel took third place in the three-meter competition, and he will be among the participants at the National Qualifying Tournament to be hosted by Cornell University this coming Friday and Saturday.

Second-year Coach Tom Olivo anticipates much improvement from his relatively-inexperienced charges. Eagleson, a freshman and a walk-on, had virtually no previous diving experience before this year. Hains, a freshman, who had heretofore competed only oft Winfield deal.

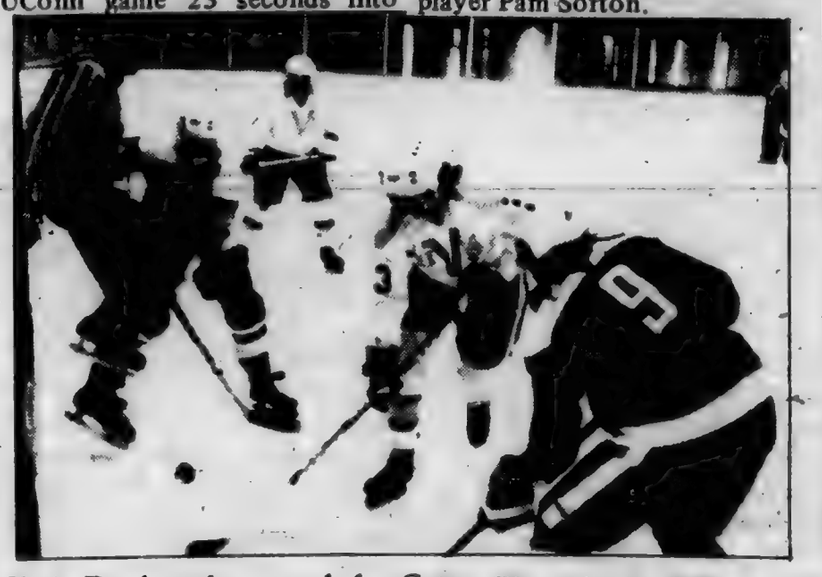
Fortunately, for some teams thrifty spending wasn't necessary in order to have a successful club. Such teams as the Kansas City Royals, Baltimore Orioles, and the Houston Astros had productive seasons in 1980 without having to dish out large amounts of cash to do so. But, perhaps these teams might have given in too. During the off-season each one was guilty of signing at least one million dollar contract.

It will be interesting to see what professional baseball will be like ten years from now. With million dollar salaries becoming commonplace these days, who knows what they will be like then. Will there still be avid fan turnout or will ticket prices get to the point where they are unaffordable? I think it can be said that baseball is becoming more of a business than a sport and as with many kinds of business, money can become the ruin of all.



Women Skaters Finish Season On Disappointing Note

By Cealy Anderson

In the last game of their season, the UVM women ice hockey players came up short against an opportunistic Potsdam, N.Y. team in a 7-1 loss this Saturday at the Gutterson Rink. Although they outshot the visitors by a wide 43-20 margin, the Cats were frustrated in repeated attempts to score, meeting stubborn resistance from Potsdam's defensive lines and outstanding goaltender. Tori Ryder tallied UVM's sole score on a light-nine-quick wrist shot from the post, set up on a pass from right wing Bonnie Daley.

The Cats met with partial success in two games played earlier at Northeastern and UConn. Captain Mary Glowka scored her third goal of the UConn game 23 seconds into overtime to lift the UVM team to an exhilarating victory. Goalie Pam Reganall fielded 21 shots in her second appearance in the UVM goal and she stopped two point-blank breakaways by UConn's threatening wing to preserve the third period tie and set up the overtime win.

The tables turned against the Vermonters in a game played the following night at Northeastern. The highly skilled Boston players capitalized on every offensive opportunity, while Dee Boohosen's remarkable goaltending for the Huskies contributed to the misleading 14-0 score. UVM pressured Boohosen consistently, forcing her to stop 22 shots, including 7 from Freshman Lila Kirkland and a powerful blast from defensive player Pam Sorton.

finished eleventh and fourteenth, while Cindy Gavett finished in sixteenth place for Middlebury.

After the giant slalom, Wyoming led Middlebury by 6 points, Utah by 11, and Vermont by 12 points.

The 7.5 kilometer cross-country event proved much more encouraging for the Catamounts as Betsy Haines placed second behind New Mexico's Marianne Rud. Sissell Bjerkenas of Wyoming was third, Chrissy Lewis of Middlebury, fourth and Leslie Bancroft in fifth. Keli and Tara McMenamy placed ninth and twelfth for Middlebury, while Jennifer Caldwell finished in thirteenth position for Vermont.

After two events, Middlebury held a one-point lead over Vermont with Utah nine points back and Wyoming 17 points behind.

On Friday Becky Simning completed a sweep of the alpine events as she won the slalom. Tiania Tutt and Stacey Ward finished second and third. Leslie Smith, Leslie Baker and Laurie Baker finished in fourth, fifth and sixth places. Jennifer Kennedy and Cindy Gavett finished in eighth and ninth while Debby Miller finished in sixteenth position.

Middlebury increased its lead to ten points over Vermont and seemed to have things well in hand entering the final event.

Cats Startle New England Runners With 'Sweet' Victory

By Harry Eastman

Judi St. Hilaire set two New England records for the one-mile run and the two-mile run, leading the University of Vermont women's indoor track team to a startling third place finish in the New England Championships held at Boston College on February 21.

St. Hilaire, called by Coach Ed Kusiak "the most dominant runner in the East," took both the mile run and the two-mile run with times of 4:34.4 and 10:04.3 respectively. The Cats finished the event with a total of 44 points. First place Boston University scored 96 points, while second place Rhode Island finished with 49.

Although overshadowed by St. Hilaire's stellar performance, several other team members turned in outstanding efforts. In the shot put, Katrina Geurkink finished second with a toss of 43' 3¼", and Barb Luneau finished fourth with a score of 41' 1". Anne Schiauone took fourth place in the two-mile run with a time of 10:39.9. The 4x880 relay team (Kingsley Belcher, Pam Moulton, Laurie Mertzlufft, Karen Bucke) placed second in a performance, which allowed the Cats to pull into third place.

"When we went to Boston, we were shooting to make the top seven teams," said Kusiak. "This third place finish is probably the sweetest victory we've ever had."

The University of Vermont's men's indoor track team finished its season, breaking UVM records in the distance medley relay and in the 4x400 meter relay at the men's New England Championships, held at Boston College on February 22.

The distance medley team of Terry Gilmore, Bill Newberry, Randy Sightler, and Tony Bates elapsed the old UVM mark with a time of 10:20.4, while the 4x400 meter team of Steve Shea, Steve Wechter, Lucas Peluffo, and Joe McClallen had a time of 3:22.3.

Charlie Claudio scored 3470 points on his way to a fifth place finish in the pentathlon, and Steve Stebbins finished fifth in the unseeded section of the two-mile run with a time of 9:13.7.

Joe McClallen, who has turned in several phenomenal efforts this season, suffered a muscle pull in the semi-finals of the 55 meter dash, which forced him to withdraw from the competition. McClallen was seeded second in the event.

The team will begin training for the Spring outdoor track season with its first event coming on April 11th at the University of Massachusetts Relays.

the one-meter board, has already begun the laborious process of mastering the most difficult of dives from three meters. Clark has been the team's leading scorer this season with 63 points (based upon a system which awards five points for first place, three for second, and one for third); he also led the team during his freshman year. Shimel, a transfer student from the University of Wisconsin (Madison), was, in fact "red-shirted" for one semester before he began competing in earnest.

Coach Olivo has his divers participate in an arduous training program which includes anywhere from two to five hours of practice daily and which incorporates the use of a trampoline as well as diving boards. Olivo maintains that a diver ordinarily requires eleven years of training and competition to achieve top-flight status. Accordingly, the accomplishments of this year's Catamount squad at the Division One level are all the more remarkable.

"I want my divers to become students of the sport," says Olivo, who records both practice dives and actual meet dives on film so as to enable the team to observe their mistakes and make necessary modifications in technique. The Coach envisions his divers "dominating the Old Yankee Conference," perhaps as soon as next season.

ART / CONCERT PREVIEW

Diverse Progress or Energetic Apprehension ?

Graphic by Peter Niceberg

By Max Lesselbaum

Rock and Roll reverbed through the Williams Hall catacombs last week, complimenting the potato chips, pretzels and beer offered at the reception for the Student Art Show held at the Colburn Gallery. Openings are a good pre-exhibit indication of the tempo, and flavor of a show.

A large, leafy construct first greets the gallery goer. This paper piece by Joe Mazzeo and the series of folded brown strips by Elli Clough, are unique in being designed to exist only within a gallery. Sarah Brayman conveys expression by applying masking tape directly to the wall, and then she slashes on a one-stroke orange gesture. Creating space within space is Joe Rodgers' galvanized sheet of steel.

Color field experiments include one very strong acrylic painting by Alix Manny; her chromatic geometry makes the canvas seeth. Sarah Slocum uses jags of tone in her acrylic, focusing on a central splash of magenta. Bold, dark colors are mixed and not matched in Kim Camire's silkscreen and in David Wilson's painting. The panorama of pink in Wendy Fredericks Carnation is pacific and sweeping. Sally Egan's Euro-village image intimates she may have a background in classical painting.

An architectural propensity is found in the high contrast photography by Richard Ames. In contrast to Ames' angular view are S. Dorfman's minimal photographs of a gently lit corner, and a "buns eye" view from above toilet bowl. Chris Stebbins has combined trash and photographs in his mixed media reflection upon the city of Burlington. The camera of Al Terry provides us with Mes Amis a St. Tropez, a sequence of demi-erotic beach scenes which show "sand between my toes" action.

Candy Eyes is the disturbing ceramic creation of Paul Kruppa: an elongated, wet-red fungus with eyes bulging out at all potential spore gazers. Patty Remingers slab vase is an amalgamation of little brown tongues. Childhood is the recollection of Greg Dawson, is a plaster fist clenching an ice cream cone. The 3-D plexiglass Garden by Terry Worthington casts a beautiful shadow. Melinda White's Field No. 2 stood alone in a corner, its fragile wood prongs begging for recognition. And a streamlined subtlety is found in Sarah Horne's architectural Study. The work by Elizabeth Gozzi called Rock of Ages, Rock the Night Away is a mixed media tribute to John Lennon. This sliced up Beatles poster is overlaid by battle and church hymns and Renaissance images. The collage has a sharp, cutting edge.

"Untitled" is a very popular name for many of the works on display. More than half of the pieces in the show remain under this anonymity.

The separate entities of the Student Art Show combined into an energetic, apprehensive whole. The diversity of work displays the inclinations of art students, and also acts as the compendium of studio art instruction at the University of Vermont.

Czech Out Oscar

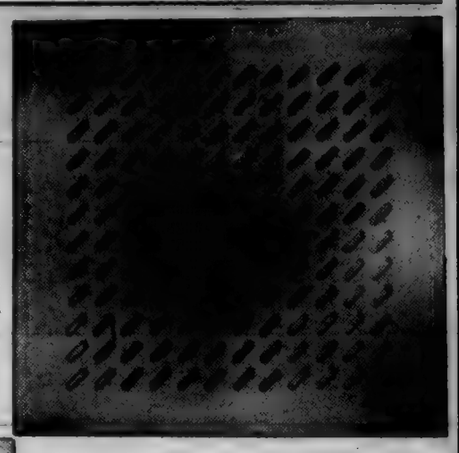
By Mark Cahill

The success of The George Bishop Lane Series in bringing both the classic and the classical to Burlington in past years has been overwhelming, and the next two weeks will be no different. On Friday, March 13, the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra will appear at Burlington's Memorial Auditorium. Then, on the following Friday, March 20, Oscar Peterson, one of the greatest living jazz pianists, will perform.

The Czech Philharmonic Orchestra is among Europe's oldest and most distinguished orchestras, having formed in 1896 under the leadership of composer Antonin Dvorak. Great conductors, such as Vaclav Talich (on the podium from 1919 to 1941), were instrumental in establishing the solid background from which even today's ensemble draws its musical strength. Talich insisted that each score was perfect before it was performed publicly — a tradition that the present ensemble upholds to this day.



The orchestra, conducted by Vaclav Neumann, with an appearance by Zdenek Kosler, will do the works of three Czech composers. The works that will be performed are Bedrich Smetana's "The Moldau" Suite, Leos Janacek's "From the House of the Dead," and Antonin Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 in D minor.

Oscar Peterson, the jazz pianist, has been called the greatest soloist of all time. His speed and lucidity have astounded audiences for years, and his appearance in Memorial Auditorium next week should be another exceptional concert.

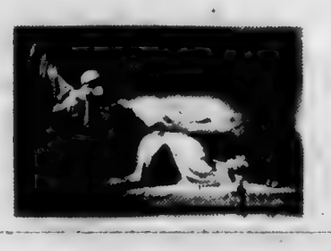
Peterson has led trios which have at times included great jazz musicians such as drummers Ed Trigpen and Louis Hayes, bassists Ray Brown and Sam Jones, and guitarists Barney Kessel, Irving Ashby and Herb Ellis. He has also played with such jazz greats as Ella Fitzgerald, Joe Pass, Billie Holiday, and Louis Armstrong.

Be sure not to miss Oscar Peterson, surely the most articulate and diverse pianist since Art Tatum, or the wonderful sound of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra. Tickets for both these concerts are on sale at the Campus Ticket Store or at Bailey's Music Rooms.

Independent Record Labels: Diverting the River

By Michael Bonebrake

Imagine... Elvis Costello is on his fifth album (not counting Taking Liberties) and still receiving critical acclaim, The Clash are on their fourth album (but seventh record) and are definitely the band to watch, and even The Revillos, a take-off of the twice recorded Rezillos, have put out their second album. Are these once altruistic bands becoming impersonal giants like the institutions we're so accustomed to in America? Was New Wave just a one-shot, 1977 idea? Even Stiff Records, the darling label of Elvis, Ian Dury, and Nick Lowe, have just finished the grand tour, giving exposure to their third stable of new talent.



Many of the achieving bands of England's pub circuit are now international heroes, which would refute their original intent. Many of the small record labels have been integrated into the worldwide record industry. But, if Reaganomics is to teach us anything, it will be "less is more." This is especially true of the record industry in England. The slack created by the recording giants is being taken up by the small, independent labels. They produce a more streamlined product, in which the artist has total command over the output (i.e. not contractual obligations which could require one album per year, along with a follow-up promotional tour, etc.) The result produces an integral movement of creative, uncompromising rock that has infected England.

Magazine, a band formed by Howard Devoto as a vehicle for his single, "Shot by Both Sides" while he was with The Buzzcocks, is a band that played with the independents for two albums before signing with Virgin Records. Reminiscent of early Roxy Music (sax), Magazine created a cult following in many major cities upon the release of their epic second album, Secondhand Daylight. Unfortunately, it's available only on import.

Though Magazine has signed with a nationally distributed label, other bands such as Joy Division and The Cure have proudly kept their independent status. Many Rolling Stone readers may have wondered why the annual Critics Poll listed the single of the year as Joy Division's "Love Will Tear Us Apart." Joy Division recorded two albums of unrelenting bleakness on the independent Dindisc label before lead singer Ian Curtis committed suicide. Both the albums were acclaimed as uncompromising, danceable despair. Joy Division was at the forefront of an English progressive movement, inspired in part by Johnny Lyndon's Public Image, Ltd. before their dissolution. Their second album, Closer, is a true testament to simple power and intensity, not unlike The Doors or King Crimson.

photos: Dindisc Ltd., Fiction Records, Factory Records, Virgin International

What Joy Division is to volume, The Cure is to minimalism, yet both enjoy the same magnetic intensity and depth. The Cure's second album, 17 Seconds (on independent Fiction Records), is a stunning masterpiece in which the main intrigue is carefully thought-out compositions where the sound understates to create an original texture. Many critics have ranked 17 Seconds as the finest album of the year, because it clearly defined the line between experimental and acceptable music. The Cure, like Joy Division, create a mood as compelling and dense as anything since Dark Side of the Moon..

Another Dindisc band of interest is The Monochrome Set. Taking semi-pop melodies and quirking them with African, Polka, and Spanish influences makes their very lighthearted debut a pleasant surprise. The Monochrome Set have been compared with late Kinks for their cuteness and pop writing ability. Before releasing their first album, Strange Boutique, they made a series of poorly produced singles under the auspices of the Rough Trade label.

Where The Monochrome Set is very eclectic, another Dindisc band, Orchestral Manoevres in the Dark, uses straightaway electronics, very much in the Gary Numan mode. "Messages" and "Red Frame/White Light" have been Top Ten singles in England without the help of a major distributor. The second album from this two-man team, Organisation further employs the rhythm box and electronic sophistication as presented in their first release.

It's interesting that Melody Maker (England's weekly version quite like a New Wave Billboard, which sells here for $1.75) lists a singles chart, an album chart, and recently an independent label chart on the inside cover.

If one can remember when "Watching the Detectives" or "Is She Really Going Out With Him" was considered punk, then one will appreciate the route popular music has travelled in the past four years. And if you don't mind searching the import bins and dishing out a couple of extra bucks for a new artist, it might go a long way towards diverting the river full of old talent and exposing another band full of new ideas to America.

ALBUM REVIEW

Try On Some Shoes

By Mark J. Cadigan

Shoes, an Illinois-based rock group, has conpleted a new album, Tongue Twister, and it's a hot one. Mixing smooth harmonies with rough electric guitars isn't an easy task, but the band manages to do so with taste and skill. Their songs focus on male/female relationships without getting repetitive. I haven't heard a band this fresh and powerful in a long time.

Although unfamiliar to many, Shoes has been on the music scene since about 1976. They've produced three albums' worth of home-recorded material before signing with Elektra/Asylum Records in 1979. With Present Tense, the group's first E/A album, they proved they could make the transition from home 4-track studio to professional 24-track studio without losing their individuality.

On Tongue Twister, the band shows that they're comfortable and creative within the professional recording industry. Their latest offering combines hard-driving, emotional rock 'n roll with a few novelties. One is their use of synthesized guitars to provide eerie settings and melodic backgrounds, particularly in "The Things You Do," "Girls of Today," and "Found A Girl."

But, occasionally, as in the last of these songs, the synthesized guitar maintains the same melody throughout, which becomes a bit boring. Also, Jeff Murphy's singing is overly sentimental, to the point of being melodramatic. "Found A Girl" limps along, especially when compared to the raw power of such rockers as "When It Hits" and "Hate To Run."

Fortunately, that one song is the only low point on the record, which sizzles from the start. "Your Imagination" erupts with an extremely fuzzy bass intro by John Murphy, and then soars with the aid of Skip Meyer's speedy drumming and the wailing guitars of Jeff Murphy and Gary Klebe. Pleading with his lover, Gary sings in an appealingly hoarse voice: "Don't be angry, don't be cold/ Can you hear me, don't you know?"

Questions arise again in "The Things You Do," which features a spacey synthesized guitar reminiscent of Gary Numan's odd keyboard sounds. John vocalizes passionately about a woman who's confusing him: "She'll try anything that she's not sure of/ Is she breaking a heart?/ Is she changing a mind?/ She'll do anything to make me wonder." Heavy, reverberating guitar chords punctuate the vocals effectively here.

Those heavy, "dirty" chords appear in other numbers, including "Burned Out Love." With a solid foundation of a thumping bass and a steady drumbeat behind them, Jeff and Gary are able to go wild on their guitars without having the song lose its backbone. Unlike so many other rock songs, poignant lyrics lie among the power chords and feedback: "Trouble follows anyone who tries to run away."

The beautiful, soothing acoustic and electric guitar work in "Karen" and "Only In My Sleep" contrast with the forceful guitars of the previous songs. Their fluid instrumentation, flowing harmonies, and aching passion remind me of The Beatles in their Rubber Soul days. It's easy to sympathize with John when he sings: "Karen, I have always loved you/ Even when your arms were filled with other men."

By concentrating on a variety of problems and joys in relationships, Shoes keep their songs colorful and unique. The dozen tunes on Tongue Twister are rhythmic and tight, with solos kept within the framework of the songs rather than as tangents of them. The vocals sting with the yearning, bitterness, and reckless happiness of love; the harmonies are exceptional, and the band projects a lot of energy throughout the album.

If you're tired of most of the music you're hearing these days, try on some Shoes — they may be the perfect fit for your audio fantasies.

Lydia Snow as Laura

The Glass Menagerie's World of Dreams

By Jennifer Weiss

Life was tough in the 1930's – people had to struggle hard to attain their goals. The opening of Tennessee Williams' The Glass Menagerie, set in a shaggy St. Louis apartment, mirrors the dismal nature of the times as it brings the characters' difficulties to life on the stage.

Amanda (played by Priscilla Newton Oliver, an Alumna of UVM's Class of 1938) has more than her share of problems. She is concerned about her frustrated son, Tom (Mark Nash, who is also the narrator), and her crippled daughter, Laura (Lydia Snow). Jim O'Conner (Connell McGrath), as a co-worker of Tom's, shares the family's strife.

Tom introduces the drama as a memory play, a reflection of unrealistic thoughts. Each character lives in his/her own world or American Dream: Amanda constantly returns to her past in the South, Laura's life revolves around her glass menagerie and worn records, and Tom has a conflict burning within him as he tries to decide what to do with his own life, as well as his sister's. Jim O'Conner's role, though brief, is significant in that he helps the others to realize what their dreams are. By the close of the play, all have come to terms with their dreams.

Directed by Edward J. Feidner, The Glass Menagerie is sponsored by the UVM Class of 1938. Performances began on March 11th and continue until March 14th at the Royall Tyler Theater. Shows start at 8:00 p.m. nightly, with a matinee on Saturday at 1:00 p.m. Contact the Box Office at RTT (656-2094) for further information.

FILM REVIEW

Tess: Cinematic Beauty

By Jana Panarites

Director Roman Polanski has both fascinated and horrified audiences with his passion for the macabre. In 1968, Polanski's Rosemary's Baby told the nightmarish story of a trapped and vulnerable young housewife, ravaged by the child of Satan pregnant within her. The thrills increase as she is destroyed through agents of the devil – her own husband and neighbors – and lured into ritualistic dreams of the occult.

Perversity and twisted plots continued as Chinatown (1974), filled with moral decay and violence, established Polanski (for better or worse) as a director of haunting and chaotic proportions. Tess, the director's latest venture, may change all this if viewers can be encouraged to disregard the eeriness of Polanski's film past. Based on Thomas Hardy's 19th century novel Tess of the D'Urbervilles, the film is filled with incongruous pitfalls and corruptive forces, but fortunately there is little bloodshed and an absence of excessive violence. Instead, a reliance on exquisite setting and strong character acting brings the theme of male/female relationships out of the 19th century novel and on to the 20th century screen smoothly.

Tess is the story of a young girl burdened with the task of retrieving her family's supposed riches when her father, John D'Urbeyfield, is told that he is related to the D'Urbervilles (a wealthy land-owning family of many generations). Innocent yet bold, Tess sets out for the treasured estate and soon falls prey to Alec D'Urberville, manager of the family wealth. Alec, taking advantage of Tess' striking good looks and obvious vulnerability, proceeds to seduce the young wayfarer, explaining, "Can't you see, Tess, I'm longing for you?" before raping her. She runs away from the D'Urberville estate, takes a job as a migrant worker, and later falls in love with Angel Claire, a young and popular dairy-hand who proposes to marry her.

Tess and Angel are eventually married, although she refuses several times due to her shameful past. Trouble follows as Angel discovers Tess' secret, Alec returns to torment her, and the sense of responsibility Tess feels towards her poor family continues to influence her actions. "All is vanity," says a worn-out Tess, after spending a night alone in wooded seclusion.

Film as a visual medium has seldom exposed both the spectacular and cruel qualities of the countryside and open land so effectively as in Polanski's Tess. Wessex, the fictitious setting for all of Hardy's novels, is just as the author would have it – pockets of villages are separated by long dirt roads and vast stretches of land. Camera crews filmed the action in both England and Brittany, with the director's usual flair for detail working at its best.

Tess is further enhanced by the fine quality of acting throughout the film. Foreign film buffs will recognize the name Natassia Kinski (who plays Tess) as the daughter of highly acclaimed actor Klaus Kinski, himself a leading actor in Werner Herzog's Nosferatu and Woyzeck. Tess belongs solely to the younger Kinski, though, and a better actress could not have been chosen, in this writer's opinion. Miss Kinski's portrayal of pensive concern, masking inner charm, is subtle and yet brilliant. Readers of the Hardy novel will be astonished at the remarkably accurate transition Tess has made from the page to the screen, in the heroine's characterization.

The villainous Alec D'Urberville is adequate, yet not nearly as threatening and desperate a figure as the novel might lead one to believe. Peter Firth, seen recently opposite Richard Burton in Equus, plays the romantic yet proud Angel Claire with conviction. Perhaps he took the time to read Hardy's novel. The villagers and minor roles are all filled quite well, and in the end, it is the genuineness of Tess' cast blending with the scenery which makes the film enjoyable.

Tess, three hours long, is not for the fidgety filmgoer. Still, audiences have confronted worse; consider the unforgiveable boredom of Von Stroheim's Greed, a 10-reel attempt at capturing life's naturalistic "flow." Gone With the Wind went on for nearly four hours, although Clark Gable and Vivien Leigh still manage to sustain viewer attention today. More recently, the all-but-played-out war theme proved that even Francis Ford Coppola could not save the lengthy Apocalypse Now from financial ruin. Alas, Tess is neither overly drawn-out nor dependent on intricate camera technique for its success. Quite simply, Roman Polanski has redeemed himself, for Tess is all beauty.

CONCERT

So Near...

By Eric Kilburn

Music industry moguls must feel frustrated when they see Holly Near perform. Their dismay may be likened to that of a basketball scout who finds a seven-foot prodigy in the backwoods, only to realize the kid wants to stay home and pick apples for his pa.

Similarly, Holly Near, despite her considerable talent and dynamic range of musical styles (encompassing blues, rock, jazz, and Broadway), has refused to become typecast in the shallow roles usually reserved for female singers. Instead of singing saccharin love songs and posing provocatively on her albums and in her concerts, Near writes and sings about personal and social topics with such conviction that for big-business music interests, she became "unmarketable" (read "unexploitable").

Undaunted, Near formed her own record company, Redwood Records, and her five albums have sold over 250,000 copies, an amazing feat for a small label without major distribution networks. In the last five years, Holly Near's popularity has grown geometrically, apparently reflecting the public's desire for more meaningful music than is available from major labels. The people who once booked her into a bookstore basement in Cambridge, Mass., recently had to rent a 5,000 seat hall, which sold out quickly.

For their ability to captivate and involve the audience, Holly Near's concerts are rivaled only by those of Pete Seeger and John Sebastian. Instead of the common performer-listener gap, where the artist is exalted to god-like status by the audience, Near relates to the audience like an old friend over dinner. Whether introducing the next song, talking about an issue she is concerned with, or joking and poking fun at herself, Near maintains a graceful intimacy with her audience, never relinquishing their attention. Singalongs, often of songs the audience never knew before the concert, erupt spontaneously during the show and a general feeling of celebration prevails by evening's end.

Near recently released her fifth album, Fire in the Rain, an effort which signals a determined attempt to expand her following. Whereas the themes of her most recent albums focused primarily on women's struggles for equality and recognition, Fire in the Rain finds Near exposing a more vulnerable side, asking questions about personal relationships and other struggles of everyday living. The production of this album is much slicker than her previous records, with string and horn sections, catchy choruses, and soulful bass lines easily meshing with Near's versatile voice. One wonders what musical style she can't work with, as this album flows comfortably from rock to jazz to gospel to Broadway idioms without hesitation.

Holly Near will be performing this Saturday night, March 14, at the Flynn Theatre in Burlington, with Adrienne Torf on piano and Susan Freundlich interpreting for the hearing-impaired. Audience members who have never seen Freundlich set Holly Near's music to sign language are in for a treat, because, as one reviewer described it, "Watching Susan Freundlich was worth half the price of admission." The concert is being organized by VPIRG, Every Woman's Place (a recently opened community women's center in Burlington), and the UVM Women's Organization and Referral Center. Tickets are available at Bailey's or at the door, and plenty of good seats are still available.

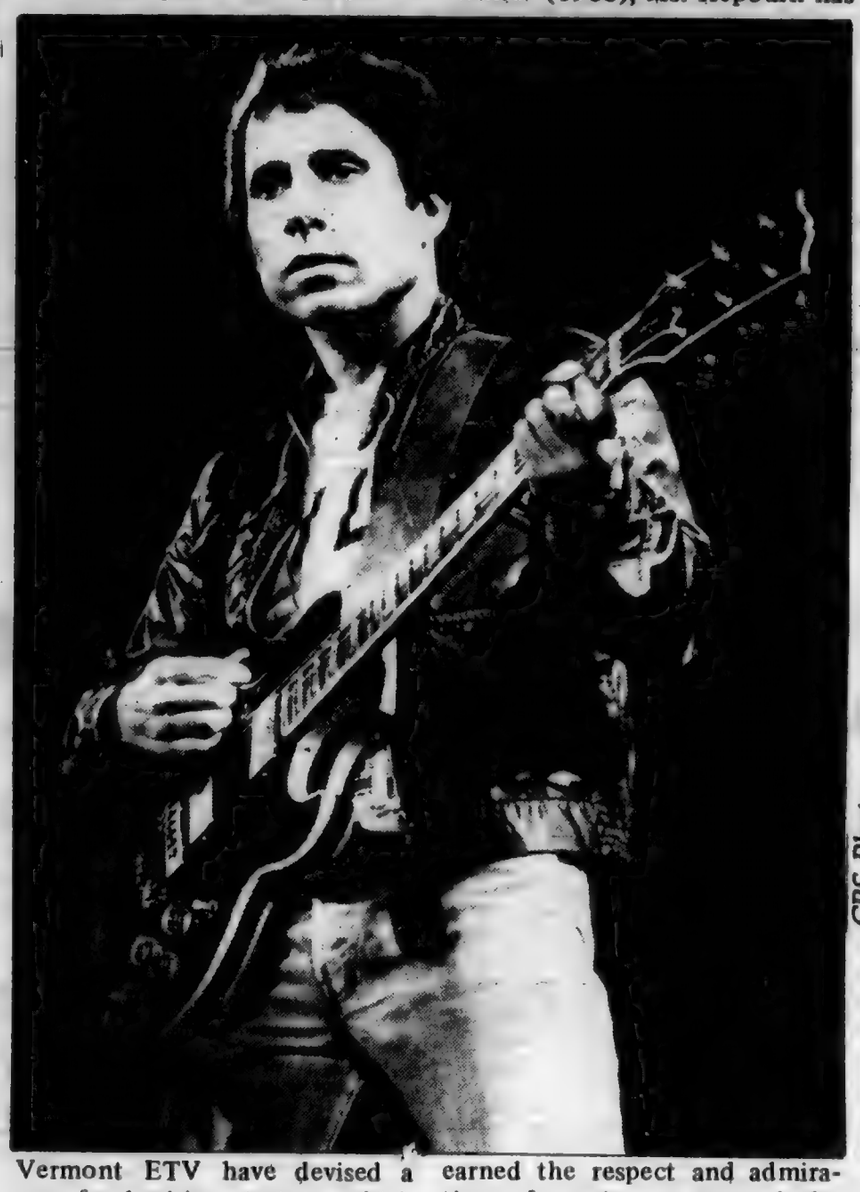
TELEVISION

Simon and Hepburn on ETV

By Ed Stearns



As we enter a new era of fiscal austerity, the old adage "adapt or die" seems particularly poignant. Now that the Corporation for Public Broadcasting is slated for a $377 million reduction in Federal funding over the next five years, public television stations across the country are approaching their fund-raising efforts with renewed urgency. The question which they must now face is: how can they raise more money without alienating their viewers in the process?

This year the people at Vermont ETV have devised a new fund-raising strategy which they hope will solve this problem. They are betting that viewers will be inclined to dig deeper for donations if they are asked to contribute less often. Consequently, the air time allotted for this purpose has been cut in half. This new approach relies heavily on the generosity and goodwill of all ETV viewers. If viewer response is good, you can count on seeing more high quality programming with less time devoted to the necessary appeals for donations.

Beginning Saturday, March 7, and continuing through Sunday, March 22, ETV will present "Festival Nights," an extraordinary lineup of specials and films, supplementing the best of its regular programming. The purpose of "Festival Nights" is to acquaint viewers with the wide variety of quality programming on public television.

On Thursday, March 12, at 10 p.m., Paul Simon stars in his own concert special, taped before a capacity audience at the Tower Theater in Upper Darby, Pa. Backed up by Steve Gadd on drums, Eric Gale on lead guitar, Tony Levin on bass and Richard Tee on electric piano, Simon demonstrates his lasting musical appeal to yet another generation of fans. Starting with "Me and Julio," and continuing with such hits as "Sounds of Silence" and "One Trick Pony," he is able to communicate his personal insight into life as a performer and poet.

Also appearing on Vermont ETV during "Festival Nights" is a two-hour retrospective on the life and work of Katharine Hepburn. Winner of three Academy Awards for her performances in Morning Glory (1933), Guess Who's Coming to Dinner (1967) and The Lion in Winter (1968), Ms. Hepburn has earned the respect and admiration of moviegoers around the world. During her fifty-year career she has appeared in nearly forty films and has worked under the direction of George Cukor, John Huston and Sidney Lumet.

This special presentation uses film clips, newsreels, stills and interviews to trace her career from her first movie for RKO, A Bill of Divorcement (1932), to her most recent, the soon-to-be-released On Golden Pond. One memorable sequence shows her 1950 arrival in Africa with Humphrey Bogart and Lauren Bacall for the filming of The African Queen. This program will be aired Monday, March 16, at 8 p.m.

Two nights later, ETV will present the television premier of The Lion in Winter. This American film classic was the winner of three Academy Awards, one of which went to Katharine Hepburn for "Best Actress." Also starring Peter O'Toole and Anthony Hopkins, this film is about the private lives of Henry II of England and his wife, Eleanor of Aquitaine. The Lion in Winter will be shown Wednesday, March 18, at 8 p.m. on UHF channel 33 or cable channel 10.

The Falling Sickness

Living With Epilepsy

By Al Terry

It is estimated that approximately one out of fifty people in the U.S. have some sort of convulsive disorder. Epilepsy is not rare. It is more prevalent than diabetes. Contrary to popular belief, the majority of persons with epilepsy have normal intelligence. Alexander the Great, Caesar, Van Gogh, and Alfred Nobel were known epileptics. Ignorance, superstition, and false information have invested the term epilepsy with unwarranted fear and distasteful connotations.

During a fit of anger, Paul's father hurled him through the bay window of their suburban home. The boy suffered small cuts, bruises, and a concussion, but within a few weeks he seemed to recover.

Many people do not know how to react to a seizure victim.

One year later however, when Paul (not his real name) was nine years old, he was sitting in a classroom when he suddenly "felt funny all over" and blacked out. What happened next typified the kind of convulsive attack he would be forced to endure the rest of his life.

While unconscious, Paul let out a muffled shriek. His body became rigid and lurched forward into the fetal position. His muscles twitched and shook erratically, as he doubled over jerking in full body spasms. He fell to the floor, a patch of skin on his neck was red, his face, blue. Paul stopped breathing.

Just as suddenly, the shaking slowed. Within thirty seconds Paul's eyes stopped blinking, his body calmed, and his breathing became regular. He slept. A few moments later, Paul awoke, unaware that his classmates had just witnessed his first seizure.

"When people see that," says Paul, now twenty-three years old, "they think of nothing but ugliness." After his first attack, the teacher at the public school he attended asked that he be placed in a special section. "She didn't want me disrupting the class," Paul says.

Besides the obvious medical problems associated with his disease, Paul's most difficult obstacle in leading a normal life may well be his effort to convince people that he is in fact "not different." Outside of seizures, says Paul, "I'm perfectly normal. I play basketball, soccer, and I do well academically. But if I suddenly have a seizure, it's devastating. People can't handle it."

During another attack while in a classroom, Paul says that his math teacher "thought I was swallowing my tongue... so he grabbed a pencil and started stabbing my mouth. I woke up on the floor with my lips bleeding and I had to go to the hospital when I should have gone back to work."

Sometimes, unknowing onlookers who have watched Paul have a seizure, believe that he is "on drugs" or even "inspired by the devil." Recently Paul was pushing a cartful of groceries when he went into convulsion: "I hit the bar with my teeth and the whole thing flipped over backwards on top of me. So there I was, shaking under this pile of groceries in the middle of the store. When I woke up, this lady was bent over me pointing her finger practically in my face and saying something like 'God's punishing you' or the 'devil'... I wasn't sure, I wasn't really awake yet. But then I noticed a little crowd had gathered. It was pretty embarrassing."

"Everyone is capable of seizure," says Dr. John Wallman, a neurosurgeon with thirty years experience at the University of Vermont Health Center. According to Dr. Wallman (and several medical texts) anybody is a potential epileptic. Each person has what is referred to as a "convulsive threshold." Drugs, electric shock, or a blow to the head may push a person past his limit, or threshold, and he will suffer a convulsion.

"Some have an inherited trait that reduces the threshold," says the neurosurgeon, "and others had it reduced by injury or disease."

Epilepsy is more often acquired than inborn. "Epilepsy is not really a disease in itself," explains Dr. Wallman. "It is a symptom of any of a number of disorders of the central nervous system."

Tumors, infections of the brain (such as meningitis) and severe injury to the head might bring on a convulsive condition. According to the neurosurgeon, five percent of all persons who suffer from brain damage in car accidents develop symptoms of epilepsy.

Once the brain is prone to seizure, an attack may be brought on by hyperventilation, a poor diet, or in women, menstruation. Convulsions are often triggered by emotional disturbances. Stress, fear, excitement or anxiety may be enough to push an epileptic over the edge. One Burlington doctor (who wished to remain anonymous) said, "I've had college students who were doing very well until they came to the final exams. They had stayed up all night studying and worrying, then after the exam they'd have a big letdown and a seizure or two."

Whatever the cause, the brain suffers what is referred to as "traumatic insult" as a precondition for a convulsion. A few crucial neurons are struck, and the whole brain-nerve system dysfunctions. During normal activity there is a smooth flow of electrochemical impulses between cells that discharge in a controlled pattern. In contrast to normal activity, Dr. Wallman says, "During seizure many cells fire off simultaneously and this uncontrolled stream of [electrochemical] impulses disrupts the entire brain."

When the explosion originates from a small focal point, it usually precipitates what is known as a petit mal attack. The person loses consciousness for a few seconds without muscular convulsion. The casual observer may think the person is daydreaming. Paul's attacks are characterized by loss of consciousness, foaming at the mouth, and total muscular convulsion. His fits are generally called grand mal and are among the more intense.

To help control the severity of his fit, which occur approximately once every two and one half months, Paul takes drugs such as Phenobarbitol and Dilantin. Often a doctor will combine several types of anticonvulsant medicines to be taken simultaneously. The doctor and patient must search for a proper balance of medications. Even if he takes the recommended dosage, Paul says he might still "have a seizure just as bad as before."

Even with all the medical problems, epileptics still face more difficulties in their personal lives. Because of the nature of their disease, some epileptics who lead normal lives tend to conceal their problem. Paul says that when he does let friends know about it, they tend to react in one of two ways. "They either don't say anything because they are embarrassed or they say 'It must be so different,' and they pity you."

"I don't want pity," says Paul.

Paul laughs. "I've learned how to tell people. I don't mind telling people I'm an epileptic. Now I just have to decide where and when I will break the news. Hopefully, it's before I have a seizure right in front of them."

Paul said that just recently, he had invited a young woman up to his apartment. In the middle of a pleasing evening, Paul had a seizure.

"She freaked out," says Paul. "Now, when I pass her in the street, she won't even look at me." Paul laughs again. "You wonder why I laugh. It's not so bad. I make fun of my epilepsy. People are taught it's a terrible disease. They sometimes don't understand me. You must learn to show people how to put it in perspective."

"When I think about it though, if I had my choice of chronic diseases, I'd pick epilepsy. Not palsy or some heart disease which stays with you all the time.

"It has helped me to be more compassionate," says Paul.

One of every fifty Americans have some sort of convulsive disorder.

First Aid for Epilepsy

1. Keep calm when a major seizure occurs. You cannot stop a seizure once it has started. Do not restrain the patient or try to revive him.

2. Clear the area around him of hard, sharp or hot objects which could injure him. Place a pillow or rolled-up coat under his head.

3. Do not force anything between the teeth. If his mouth is open, you might place a soft object like a handkerchief between his side teeth.

4. Turn the patient's head to the side, and make sure his breathing is not obstructed. Loosen necktie and tight clothing but do not interfere with his movements.

5. Do not be concerned if he seems to stop breathing. Do be concerned if the patient seems to pass from one seizure into another without gaining consciousness. This is rare but requires a doctor's help.

6. Carefully observe the patient's actions during the seizure for a full medical report later. When the seizure is over let the patient rest if he wishes.

Lake Champlain Myth Resurfaces

By John Lindberg

Lake Champlain is 118 miles long, 12 miles wide, 400 feet deep in some places, and encompasses an area of 435 square miles. It was directly connected to the Atlantic throughout much of geologic history and was entirely separated, except for the Richelieu-St. Lawrence river system, about 12,000 years ago. Fossil evidence of this region indicates that a multitude of creatures called the lake's sometimes brackish, sometimes fresh water home. They ranged in size from tiny crustaceans to now extinct prehistoric whales and amphibious dinosaurs.

As of late, there has been some speculation about that last category. A photograph by a modern anthropoid visitor to the lake's shores has been raising new questions on Champlain's present inhabitants. The photograph, which I have personally seen, is of a head and neck extended vertically out of the water to a height I would estimate to be seven or eight feet. The photo also shows what appears to be the top of the back just above the surface and a disturbance in the water that is being caused by what looks like a flipper. The subject of this picture bears a striking resemblance to the picture of the Loch Ness creature that was taken earlier in this century. However, that print is of relatively poor quality compared to the Champlain picture, which is a modern color photo taken at close range on a clear, calm summer day.

Loch Ness and Lake Champlain are two lakes with very similar pasts. Loch Ness, though deeper, was also a part of the same vast ocean that Champlain once joined. Both Lake Champlain and Loch Ness support healthy populations of fish that could in turn support larger predators. The two lakes also tend to have very murky water which makes any exploration difficult and dangerous. Consequently, Lake Champlain, although used as a main route of travel for many centuries, has only recently seen much subsurface use. This has been restricted to recreational divers with scuba gear.

Over the years, there have been many sightings of unusual creatures in the lake. Many, if not most, have been passed off as waves, otters, or sturgeon and still others have been subject to wild exaggeration. Most of the graphic representations of these creatures have resembled something out of a 15th century mariner's guide to sea serpents. Judging from the photo that I have seen, and from other accounts by lake travelers, I would say that the creatures seen resemble a Jurassic age fisheater known to paleontologists as a plesiosaur. Fossilized remains of these animals indicate that they probably did not exceed 40 feet in length and that this is a large estimate, although hardly large enough to star in a Japanese sci-fi movie. I might also add, this seems hardly large enough to be noticed in a body of water the size of Lake Champlain, except by the occasional lucky viewer, who catches a glimpse of one of these Mesozoic reptiles sticking up its elongated neck to get a breath of air and a directional bearing.

Now there is the question raised of what happens when the lake freezes over, as it has been doing for countless years. Many creatures take advantage of the more constant conditions that exist below the ice during the winter: frogs and turtles for example. These creatures are able to diffuse enough oxygen through their skin to maintain their reduced metabolic needs in the icy waters of January. Animals the size of those sighted in the lake would surely have considerable surface area on their bodies when their elongated forms and broad flippers are taken into account. In the cold depths of the lake, perhaps their metabolic needs would be reduced enough to permit them limited activity during periods of ice cover – activity limited mainly to the occasional pursuit of a school of whitefish or cisco.

Graphics by Peter Niceberg

It seems to be human nature to ponder the existence of things beyond the known and tried, and the Lake Champlain phenomena seems to be no exception. The recent interest in the previously unknown lake dwellers, with the appearance of photographic evidence, may send a wave of sightseers and scientists to the lake's shores. If, out of this comes more evidence of their presence, perhaps legislation would be passed to protect these creatures from their newfound popularity, although I doubt they will suffer much damage from prolonged exposure to flashbulb glare.

However, in the event that nothing is found, which I suspect would be likely, all the excitement will quickly die down when the novelty wears off. Yet, through it all, the least excited, to be sure, would be those reclusive creatures who now must share their eons old home with some more curious and recent visitors to its shores.

The Marijuana Connection

Graphic by Caroline Arlen

By Mike Gochman

While spending a summer in Westchester, New York, a friend and I were hard up for some pot. It was late August and our supply had depleted. We headed South on the Hutchinson River Parkway to the hot streets of Bronx, New York. We cruised along Pitmann Ave. until we saw what we wanted, pulled over to the curb, and I stepped out of the car. A boy, approximately twelve years old, was standing on the corner next to a tree (the only tree around). He put his index finger and thumb together and brought it to his lips mimicking smoking a joint. I nodded in approval.

"Looking for some smoke?" he asked.

"Yeah."

"How much?"

"A nickel."

The boy reached into a dug out knot in the tree and pulled out a small Manila packet folded over and scotch-taped. I handed him a five dollar bill, thanked him and got back in the car. At home we poured out the contents of the packet on an album cover and rolled five skinny bones of rather good quality commercial weed. I wondered who this kid's supplier was.

High Times reports that organized crime is the main distributor of U.S. marijuana, including a multi-million dollar industry in Northern California and Hawaii. Some pot is smuggled into the country via private boat and aircraft. The ports of Miami and New York are the most popular stops, according to High Times. The marijuana hustler thrives in big cities such as the jive-talkin' marijuana peddler. For many street hustlers, it is the best business they can be in. Trapped in a restrictive environment, they can enjoy economic freedom and avoid supporting the system they mistrust and reject.

High Times says that a hustler may use one of three ways to distribute his grass: the herb shop, "herb-gate," and the "hustling zone." These types of distribution are usually found in ghetto areas in New York's five boroughs. Brooklyn has the most herb stores of any borough, especially in the areas of Flatbush, Bedford-Stuyvesant, Bushwick, Crown Heights, and Brownsville.

The weed was packed in small Manila envelopes as $5 and $3 bags (nickels and treys). The transaction was made through the crack of the slightly opened door.

these.

Marijuana means money for everyone who touches it. High Times notes that a pound of pot costs the Mafia $25 and they can sell it to middlemen for $300-$350 per pound. The middlemen, in turn, can retail the grass for $450-$500 a pound. The middleman is the link between the supplier and the street hustler. He must keep his contacts under cover. As far as the street hustler is concerned, the middleman is the supplier and he does not want to know any more. One mistake may mean going for an involuntary skin diving expedition in the East River.

Most everyone has seen or been approached by the street hustler at one time or another. He is the contact to the people,

A store front or herb shop may be any general store or record shop. I have been to a herb shop where nickel and dime bags are available and even ounces upon request. These shops must be located where there is heavy drug traffic as sales of legitimate products are insignificant. Although drug transactions may be made over the counter, I found precautionary measures are taken to protect against robbery.

Most shops make their transactions through a small cubicle cut in thick, bulletproof glass. Since smoking habits vary from individual to individual, some shops are open 24 hours a day. I assume the operations are usually owned by middlemen. They need a constant flow of good quality marijuana in order to survive. A store which does good business may sell three to four pounds a day in nickel bags, which is approximately $2000 to $2400 a day gross, with $800-$1000 pure profit, according to High Times. The employees of the store are paid straight salary.

I have also witnessed the apartment set-up, or "herb-gate," which is usually done on the first floor of a less than Park Ave.-type apartment building. Just like herb stores, the "herb-gates" are reinforced to protect their business. Windows are barred with steel gates and the doors are reinforced with many locks and crossbars.

The inside of the apartment I saw was practically empty except for the bare essentials and a portable radio providing entertainment. The weed was packed in small manila envelopes as $5 and $3 bags (nickels and treys). The transaction was made through the crack of the slightly opened door.

These "herb-gates" may be individually owned, but are usually run by a partnership. Their success depends greatly on their rapport with the community because they are less visible than herb shops.

The most visible distribution channel for reefer is the street corner, or "hustling zone." In this case, the hustler is dependent upon the middleman. He has no control over supply and demand because organized crime and law enforcement control it. Newspaper articles have reported that big busts can cause dry spells in areas as big as New England. Some cases, however, have been reported where cops take the money rather than make the arrest, or take the supply of weed and resell it themselves.

During these experiences with drug traffickers, I must confess to a feeling of apprehension about the possibility of fire arms being concealed behind the counters. Unexplained deaths surrounding this industry highlight the danger involved. Many former dealers are inside barred steel once again, in the state penitentiary.

Diverse Drug Use High Among Students

Ann Arbor, MI (CPS) – Drug use among high school seniors "appears to be at or near its peak level," and "is probably higher than that of any other industrialized nation in the world," say the authors of a new national drug study.

Of 17,000 students questioned, 65 percent said they used some illicit drug at least once during their lifetime. For 39 percent of the seniors, illicit drug use extends beyond marijuana.

In compiling results for the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research, the three authors – Drs. Lloyd Johnson, Jerald Bachman, and Patrick O'Malley – found that seniors aren't using any one fad drug. Barbituates, tranquilizers, PCP, and cigarettes all continued their long decline.

Yet Johnston notes that the percentage of seniors who have ever used an illicit drug other than marijuana has risen steadily in the last four years, from 35 to 39 percent. He attributes this to the "rapidly increasing popularity" of cocaine, especially from 1976 to 1979. He also notes that more seniors use amphetamines "to get themselves through the day" or "to curb their appetite."

Substantiating the Michigan survey is an Arizona State University poll showing one in six students there use cocaine on a regular or irregular basis. One-third of all the Tempe, Arizona students admit they've tried the drug.

Although researchers at the Institute for Social Research make no mention of LSD use, Oui magazine reported last November that use of hallucinogenic drugs increased by 900 percent from 1978 to 1979. Quoting Drug Enforcement Administration figures, Oui says that the LSD distributed today is on the average half as potent as that used in the late sixties and early seventies, which might encourage more young people to try it.

In spite of such increases, Johnston says "of perhaps greater importance" is the decline in marijuana smoking.

The survey suggests that fully half of the nation's seniors believe there is a "great risk" in regular marijuana use, and 39 percent disapprove of "experimental" use.

"Some of the shifts have been able to take place because students are in a better position to listen to the warnings of their parents and the media than before when they were rebelling so strongly against things like Watergate and Vietnam," Johnston says.

Mind Blown Fiction(?)... Great Harbors

By Elmo Nealey

I wonder if she knows there's a snake crawling into my milk shake. Oh well, no need to upset her, I'll just pretend it's not there at all. It's always great to get ice cream on a hot summer day. I just wish the walls would stop moving for a minute so I could catch my breath. I'm not sure if it's the mushrooms or the microdot, but my head's detached and flying. I wish her head would stay on her shoulders. Boy is she fupped-uck! My body guards are waiting outside rolling around the back of a U-haul mover, waiting for their milkshakes. Oh shit, the light just turned green. I've gotta go. Grabbing the milkshakes, I flip the young headless waitress 20 pesos and make my escape.

Bolting out the door, I see the grey and orange U-haul round the corner, my bodyguards howling out the back door, melting into the hot cape cod sun. I'll catch them at the next light, I think as I sprint down the lane in their direction. Holding the milkshakes, two chocolate and a vegetarian tight, my body's going almost as fast as my head. A funny feeling in my chest makes me wonder if all this exercise is bad for my health, maybe I should just stick to milkshakes and hallucinogens, but then I realize it's the milkshakes that are causing this chilling sensation. I didn't remember they were for consumption, not emersion. Oh well, maybe I can get someone to lick it off.

This Gremlin has passed me three times already. Oh no, Spiderman's driving and Secret Squirrel has his ray gun out. I'll duck behind them and hitch a ride on the bumper. Lucky it's snowing.

Great we're catching the U-haul. It's right there in front of the Ice Cream Parlor. They better watch out for the snakes... Wait. That's an outrageous outfit, solid navy blue with little shiny things on the shirt and the hat and a real wide heavy belt and look, he's taking notes. Maybe he's a writer, everyone knows how weird they are. Here's the truck. Ughh...

VT. ETV Hurt By Comm. Dept. Folding

By Cynnie Wheeler

Vermont Educational Television (ETV), begun as a subsidiary of UVM in 1967, has been dependent upon UVM Mass Communications volunteer interns for production and research work, but re-evaluation reports of the UVM Communications department have proposed a major change in the structure of internships as part of the Mass Comm degree.

"Interns are a tremendous asset to us. They're staff," said VT ETV station manager Hope Green.

Jason Crandall, the only UVM technical intern presently at ETV, is responsible for the production of the local segments on the program "Hotline." He has responsibilities like the regular staff. He is getting pre-professional experience for credit, and ETV is getting help on programs they otherwise wouldn't be able to produce.

ETV is faced with a three-year deficit, a $125,000 loan to pay off, old and malfunctioning equipment, and Washington's proposed budget cuts in appropriations to educational television of 50 percent over a two-year period, (25 percent in each of fiscal '82 and '83). Reagan's cuts would translate into $100,000 of the VT budget for fiscal '82, which is 5 percent of its budget. "If we lose interns, we'll be doubly hurt," said Green.

"The Mass Comm. major is not a pre-professional degree," said Comm. dept. chairman Frank Manchel, "it is more theory oriented." The External Review Committee, the group that evaluated the Comm. dept. in 1979, compiled a study proposing that students take a full course load of 15-18 hours and not get any credit for time spent on internships. Assistant Dean Barbra O'Reilly pointed out that the Comm. dept. decided that the experience students get at ETV is valuable and should be available for some elective credit. They want to give students the opportunity to integrate Comm. analysis, criticism, and some practical experience before graduation, but not at the pre-professional level. "Given the size of our faculty, the demands of the Mass Comm. major, and the expertise and resources of the dept., we can't handle full or half-time internships," said Manchel.

The Comm. dept. has outlined a "self-study" agreement for students to set up readings and research fields projects at ETV under the supervision of faculty members. They said the credit should translate into systematic study, not just work experience.

According to ETV Production manager Jeremy Siegrist-Jones, five production interns, working five hours a week, save the station approximately $1,418 per semester. But the interns could not be replaced by a paid staff. "Losing the interns will mean a cut in local programming."

Jones said that if students are limited to three credits, they aren't going to have time away from other academic demands to put in the time needed for production work. "We can get other interns, but because of our affiliation with UVM we'd like to give UVM students first priority. This is a hands-on situation. At station WGBH in Boston, it's hands-off. It's beyond me why [the UVM Comm. dept. doesn't] recognize the value of this opportunity for students. They cannot compete for broadcasting jobs without entry level experience. I think UVM has a responsibility to give the students this experience."

The Comm. dept. said that students should have a firm background in comm. analysis and theory before entering a professional situation. ETV would be practical exposure to the field before graduation. Manchel said that students who want more job experience can take internships during the summer.

Ethnicity in Our Midst

Fencers, dancers of folk, Middle Eastern, Polynesian, and Afro-American traditions, medieval combatants, and a variety of music and international foods will transform the Harris-Millis lounge into an international showcase Saturday, March 14 from noon to 6 p.m. The Center for Cultural Pluralism is sponsoring this day to kick off a two-month worldwide smorgasbord billed as the Ethnic Heritage Faire.

Highlights of the fair include the Trinidad Tripoli Steel Band Saturday night, "Still I Rise," a one woman dramatic presentation by Jennifer Cover, Monday, March 16 at the Royall Tyler Theater, "Tracing Your Roots," a presentation by a geneologist in Billings, Tuesday, March 17, and various films and presentations. Saga is contributing by featuring ethnic foods like Middle Eastern cuisine, Asian cuisine, and soul food at Marsh Dining Hall on March 16, 17, 19, respectively. These are only a smattering of the numerous events scheduled. Check the Cynic calendar and the Center for details.

The Ethnic Heritage Faire promises to offer enriching glimpses of cultures not generally apparent at UVM.

Well, I made it into the back and was able to shut the door before Secret Squirrel had a chance to shoot, but I can't say as much for the milkshakes. At least we have straws. "THUMP" ...a whack on the head...

"Don't fuck with me, I got a milkshake."

My bodyguard, Al, giggles hysterically in the darkness, "Veggie, I hope, make mine boiled. How'd you know what I wanted?" I feel my arm lifted and dropped... "That's gotta be the worst milkshake I've ever tasted."

I don't have the heart to tell him that's not his shake he was sucking on, so I just hand him the Veggie, "Salt?"

"No, thanks. You have any thyme?"

"Uh-uh, where's Nick?" Nick's my other bodyguard.

I hear Nick's voice from a remote corner of the pitch black cavern that is the inside of the back of the truck, "Great Harbors!"

"Thanks, Yours aren't too bad either. You want the chocolate or the snake?"

As I slink towards his voice, I suddenly hear it behind me.

"I'll take the crunchy one!"

"Stand still, will you, Nick."

"I can't, someone's got me by the throat," the raspy voice replied. I hadn't realized I was so close to him. I thought that was the snake, fattened up by the milkshake that I was holding.

"Why didn't you say something earlier?"

"I don't know. I guess I'm all crazy."

Barry Cutlass...

Stowaway

By Sonny Valentine

We left our hero, Barry Cutlass, and his friend Professor Valdez boxed in crates of Soviet Kalashnikov rifles somewhere in the mountains of Nicaragua. The two hid in the crates when they heard someone approaching while investigating a huge military stockpile nestled away in a hidden valley. The crate Cutlass hides in has just been picked up by a forklift.

"I'm not ready for a pine box just yet," Cutlass muses. "I hope this is a temporary incarceration."

Cutlass tries to determine his direction of travel by concentrating on the crate's motion, but after a few turns through the aisles of crates, he is disoriented.

"I guess I'll just enjoy the ride."

Moments later, Cutlass hears voices and feels the crate sliding on the metal floor of a small plane.

"Vamanos! Vamanos!" a gruff voice shouts, as the crate is lifted by grunting men and stacked on top of other boxes.

"This plane better have some umph if these guys are cramming as many of these crates in here as I think they are," Cutlass thinks.

"Just under an hour...That should put us snugly within the borders of El Salvador."

The engines cough and wheeze as they are started. The door slams shut and the plane lurches toward the runway. Screeching loudly, the plane shakes a little and then smooths out.

"We have liftoff," Cutlass thinks with relief. "Next stop El Salvador if my intuition serves me right. I'm glad that they left Prof. Valdez here. He would have had a tough time explaining his absence."

The steady drone of the engines lulls Cutlass to sleep, but he is awakened by the thud of a rough landing.

"Just under an hour," Cutlass thinks, checking his watch. "That should put us snugly within the borders of El Salvador. The recipients of these guns will want to see them right away. I'll have to clear out of here fast."

After the plane stops, the door is thrown open and Cutlass feels his crate being lifted out and placed on a truck. When the plane is empty, the truck rolls away. Cutlass carefully lifts the lid of his crate and sees the dark green ceiling of a tarp covered stake truck. Very slowly, he climbs out of the crate and looks for guards in the truck. He is alone. Looking out of the rear of the truck, Cutlass sees a small military base.

"This must be the secret headquarters of the Democratic Revolutionary Front (F.D.R.). I don't want to get caught here."

When the truck passes some thick vegetation next to the road, Cutlass leaps off, rolling into the underbrush. After lying still for a minute to make sure he has not been spotted, he crawls off into the jungle.

"I must find out where I am. With that information, this arms traffic can be shut down," Cutlass thinks.

A rustling in the bushes behind him gives Cutlass a start. He turns quickly to see a young boy in peasant's clothes starring at him.

"Como se llama, amigo?" Cutlass asks the lad.

"Paco," he replies. "What are you doing in the bushes, American?" the boy inquires in Spanish.

After making sure Paco is not with the F.D.R., Cutlass tells him his story. The boy listens attentively and says:

"These men want war. The people don't want war. Already the government kills many people because they are after these men. We wish these men would go away and stop the trouble.

"My father is a farmer. The government just gave him his own land. Before he worked for one rich man. Now he can work for himself. The people don't want a war. Too many people die now."

Cutlass reassures the child that he will try to help stop the war.

"Can you tell me where we are? I will go home and tell my government about this camp. Maybe they can help," Cutlass says.

The boy locates the camp precisely between Cojutepeque and San Vincente. He leaves Cutlass saying:

"Please tell your government not to make a war. We only want to live."

Knowing that he can not travel back to Nicaragua openly because of border crossing hassles, Cutlass plans to hide in another transport plane returning to the hidden stockpile. He hides near the landing strip and when the pilot leaves his plane unattended, Cutlass jumps in and hides under some canvas tarps.

The flight back is quick. The sun is setting as the plane lands. No more flights will be made this day. When the coast is clear, Cutlass steals away from the plane into the twilight. He finds Prof. Valdez's house by nightfall and tells his host about his discovery.

"Tomorrow I will fly back to the U.S. and tell my senator friend all that I have learned here. The next move will be up to the State Department. We can only hope that they will act wisely," Cutlass says.

"Thank you Barry. You have risked your life for people you don't know. You will be remembered for this," Valdez promises.

"Please Carlos, I would prefer if you kept my part in this quiet. Too much publicity could cramp my style you know. Besides, it's been great seeing you again. The pleasure is all mine."

Admissions Seek Student Reps

The UVM Admissions Office is seeking interested undergraduate students to become members of the Student Admissions Representative program. Since potential UVM students are encouraged to visit the campus, representatives are responsible for answering questions about life at UVM during informational interviews and while conducting campus tours. In addition, student representatives are required to participate in special admissions programs throughout the year.

Students who are enthusiastic about UVM and who are willing to volunteer their time to work with the Admissions staff are encouraged to submit an application. The process involves the completion of application and reference forms along with an interview with a student executive member. Applications are available at the Admissions Office, 194 South Prospect Street. The application deadline is April 7, 1981 for participation during the 1981-82 academic year. Feel free to call Debbie Beretta at x3370 if you have any questions.

UVM SUMMER SESSION

Combine studies and sunshine at UVM this summer. If this sounds intriguing, consider the possibilities . . .

FOUR GOOD REASONS WHY:

1 A LEARNING EXPERIENCE. Imagine sitting on the green at Redstone Campus, your books piled around you, and the vista of Lake Champlain and the Adirondacks spread before you.

2 LOWER TUITION. Vermont residents pay $53.00 per credit; out-of-state students pay $75.00 per credit. (Medical courses have higher rates.)

3 VISITING PROFESSORS.

4 STUDY WHILE YOU WORK.

EDITORIAL

Guilty Until Proven Innocent?

Nothing in the last few years has cast as dark and ominous a shadow over UVM, and produced as angry and vindictive a reaction among UVM students as the recent allegations of a horrifying gang rape at Sigma Nu.

By the end of last week, the campus was a whirlwind of confusion, anger, and snowballing rumors about the alleged incident last month. The week culminated with a mob surrounding the fraternity last Saturday night.

Despite the fact that no formal charges have been filed with the Burlington police, and University officials have found no evidence to substantiate these very serious allegations, UVM student opinion clearly has Sigma Nu guilty of all charges.

Its sad, but not surprising, that Sigma Nu has been indicted on heresay. They have a reputation for harrassing men and women at UVM. Since the controversy surfaced, several UVM students and alumni have reported to the Cynic that they have friends who were assaulted at the fraternity. Several other callers, who would not identify themselves, reported that they know of women who have been assaulted at Sigma Nu this year. Sigma Nu is known for its maliciousness at UVM.

But reputation is not fact. Nor is information from anonymous callers. Even the complaint to Deputy State's Attorney Via has not been filed formally. To date there are no charges for Sigma Nu to address itself to, and all the important questions are unanswered.

There's been no cover-up by the University as many suggest. Legally, the University has no jurisdiction over the fraternities, which are private residences. What the University has done is pledged full support to law enforcement officials in their investigation of the controversy. Keith Miser, Dean of Students, and Dave Nestor, Director of Student Activities, have spent most of the last week and a half ferreting through reports and the barrage of claims against Sigma Nu. Everybody at UVM wants the truth.

The rumors and accusations continue on campus. Meanwhile, two national press wires and NBC's The Today Show have picked up on the story. Sigma Nu President Caissy and Vice President Dalton deny the rumors, and charge that they have been victimized by vicious rumors . . . Nobody knows. All there are now are assumptions.

Perhaps the anger and the mob action last Saturday night in the "take back the night" rally will have a positive effect in the end as a symbolic warning to those who perpetrate attacks on women. But in the meantime, mob action and cries of "castrate men" threaten individual rights and the proper climate for due process if formal charges were to be brought against Sigma Nu. That's a serious injustice.

Letters to the Editor

Dunn For Vice President

To the Editor:

This semester we are beginning to see signs of a new trend on campus. Students are beginning to see the need for a powerful student voice into the decision-making process at UVM. This trend can be seen through the actions of the Student Steering Committee and their involvement with saving the Communications Department.

Presently, students have little voice into the decision-making process. Any voice they have is generally of an advisory nature. The only input into faculty tenure decisions that students have is in responses to standardized evaluation forms; Tenure decisions affect us directly, yet we have no real voice! We have so little voice on campus that we can't even get a reading period before exams.

This can change with your help. Kirby Dunn wants to help all students have a greater voice in the decision-making process at UVM. Currently, the Student Association is a service-oriented body. There are many Student Association clubs and services that aid in bringing UVM students a better life. Kirby Dunn would like to expand this function and give students a voice at UVM as well. I urge all of you to support Kirby Dunn for Vice President of the Student Association. Help fight for a voice which will be heard.

Linda Kidder

Unacceptable

To the Editor:

Dean Jewitt's proposal to disband the Communications Department at UVM is unacceptable. In a culture almost totally controlled and shaped by mass media, it is essential for individuals with an indepth understanding to be the link between the media and the people. By discontinuing the Comm. Department, Mr. Jewitt is failing to recognize the importance of such knowledge. How can a university consider itself adequate if it does not offer a Communications Department? I hope that Mr. Jewitt will reconsider and that the Communications students will come up with a feasible solution towards a positive future for Communications at UVM.

Emily Greenberg

Anger and Disappointment

To the Editor:

We want to express our anger and disappointment in the University of Vermont for failing to act promptly and appropriately in regards to Sigma Nu's violent activities. We believe these activities, namely the sexual assaults on women, have been covered up for some time now. We demand that you, as our administrators, take action. We want the following demands met immediately with no further concern on adverse publicity:

1. That Sigma Nu's charter be revoked.
2. That there be more support from campus security in investigating complaints, that security be more sympathetic to victims of assault, and that better patrol for students on and off campus be put into effect.
3. That there be an immediate suspension of Sigma Nu activities.
4. That there be a positive response from the university demonstrating that action is being taken.

"Suburbocondonization"

To the Editor:

Vermont is experiencing "suburbocondonization." This growthmania in the name of economic progress is happening too quickly — too quickly for a traditionally rural, community-centered culture to make a natural and healthy adjustment to the change.

The cost of living in Vermont is increasingly more disproportionate to the standard of living. Even though Vermonters are rated among the most industrious workers in America, we are paid among the lowest wages.

An ever increasing number of young Vermonters approaching graduation and not about to inherit an abundance of money are moving out-of-state in order to make enough money to move back home.

The second-home boom is making it increasingly difficult for year-round working Vermonters to buy a first home. At the current high rate of interest, who do you know that can afford all those mountainside and lakefront condos going for up to and over $100,000?

Maybe the young execs and top management from some of Vermont's big industries — like IBM, GE, banks, insurance, or medicine — can afford it. But then again there's a good chance the person in that high position was imported from out-of-state. The year-round working Vermonter gets the assembly line jobs.

Yours respectfully,
Frederick Wilber
Marshfield, Vt.

Roccio/Bottini

To the Editor:

I am writing to endorse Dave Roccio and Mark Botini for S.A. President and Vice President, respectively. I have known Dave for three years now, have seen his leadership abilities as Chairperson of the Concert Bureau, and feel that his energy and experience, with the help of Mark, can give the Student Association effective leadership.

Sincerely,
Greg Dooman

Speakers Bureau

Women's March

To the Editor:

Due to the appalling behavior of the most vocal group at the Take Back the Night walk in Burlington last Saturday, I feel that the most important sentiments of the walk were stifled by hateful and violent words and activities. Certainly fear, anger, and hostility toward rape are justifiable and all are necessary to create change for safe streets in Burlington (and elsewhere). But what is wrong and actually destructive to our cause is when these feelings become directed at all men who then become scapegoats for the actions of those men who are a dangerous and disgusting part of the community in which we all must live and interact daily. These destructive forces — such as kicking cars, shouting obscenities at male onlookers, and making gross generalizations about all fraternity members — become an outsider's focal point when viewing a much needed action such as the Take Back the Night Walk. This behavior only greets violence with more violence and thereby creates a new issue. Rape is a violent crime aimed at all women. To put a stop to rape we must put a stop to violence, not perpetuate it.

COMMENTARY

Overwhelmed, Threatened and Angry

By Sarah Bailey

There is a woman in this city who says she was raped by eight men in a UVM fraternity. This same woman, according to Tuesday's morning paper, will not press charges because she "didn't feel she could handle everything a prosecution could entail." Beyond that, nothing conclusive is known about the incident.

Once again, as so many times before, I feel threatened, overwhelmed and angry. Very angry. Once again, it is graphically demonstrated to me that I not only cannot walk safely down a street after dark, that I not only cannot feel comfortable if I am alone at night, that I not only cannot trust people I don't know, but that people of my own age, people who have grown up hearing and learning more and more about women as human beings, have chosen not to hear those words.

Whether or not any such rape occurred in Burlington on Valentine's Day 1981 will probably never be known. And that is as much a crime as rape itself. I am not condemning anyone specifically on allegations and heresay, but rather – once again – voicing my anger and frustration at a social system which perpetrates such abuse.

Why is it that a woman who has been abused, violated and damaged must defend herself? Why is it that the system creates such stress and suspicion on the victim, and not the accused?

A disproportionately large number of rapes never reach the courtroom. Sometimes the assailant is never found, but other times the woman involved is subjected to so much distrust, anger and scorn that she feels incapable of handling such an ordeal.

It is hard enough for a person to re-create such a traumatic experience and tell even close friends. Imagine how much harder it is to tell that same event to strangers in a courtroom. Now, multiply that difficulty by the number of hostile people in that room who are willing to do anything to discredit your validity as a human being. Is it any wonder that some women simply don't feel able to carry through prosecution?

Rapists who are not challenged for their actions will continue. People who give tacit approval through jokes about "gang-bangs" further foster the approval of such actions.

So often, this issue of rape is divided up and considered a "woman's issue" where we, the politically radical "libbies," are mouthing off. There are men, many men, who are as concerned as women about rape. However, there are many, many more who do not see how this issue can affect them.

In so many ways, it does.

Imagine your wife, or your girlfriend, has been raped. Try and think about how she will react to you. Scared of your touch, scared of your presence. Nightmares. A loss of self-confidence. A sense of betrayal. You will be one of "them" now, no matter how thoroughly her logic says you aren't. Does that really appeal to you?

How about those of you with daughters? Happy, carefree laughing little children. Remember, children are not immune to rape.

These are sobering situations – perhaps, you say, a bit on the dramatic side. Bleeding heart, maybe. But it is a sobering problem which leaves scars that may never heal, and that affects all of us.

It is hard for me to maintain objectivity on this issue. Intellect, upbringing, economic situation have no bearing on my reactions. The only thing that matters is that I happen to be female.

I grew up in the classic "secure" situation. There were no serious deficiencies, and I was provided with a good education and a belief that I, as a woman, had every right to apply myself to a career and independence. I considered myself very lucky.

I still do consider myself lucky. Statistically, that is. I have not been raped, or assaulted. One out of every four women cannot say that, and the numbers still rise.

However, I still must check my car before I get into it at night (even though I locked it). I still prefer not to walk to the corner store at night to buy a pack of cigarettes. I still check the doors twice per night if I'm alone. I shouldn't have to do that.

And I look at a little five-year-old friend of mine and worry about the future for both of us. I hope she'll never have the fears I do. She shouldn't have to.

Scorpio: You are particularly vulnerable to a nervous breakdown today.

By Mike Hambly

Realizing that the Cynic lacked a feature found in most newspapers I looked in the yellow pages under Fortunetelling – Wholesale. I then consulted a combination psychic – astrologer – masseuse named Madame Lasagna who does freelance work for the National Enquirer. Here is your horoscope for Friday, March 20 according to this stargazer:

Aries (March 21 to April 19): Money matters are highlighted. An opportune time to rob a bank or invest in pork belly futures. A one-eyed Lithuanian shepherd will pay a visit.

Taurus (April 20 to May 20): You will breathe today. You will also attend a party at which people will drink heavily – just when you think you have it made with a member of the opposite sex, he/she will vomit on you. Do not be discouraged; persistence will pay off.

Gemini (May 21 to June 21): If you've been feeling paranoid lately, maybe the reason you think that everyone's out to get you is that they are. A good time to go on a diet, but not the Scarsdale Medical plan – that can be deadly.

Moon Children (June 22 to July 21): An especially dangerous period for you. Avoid avalanches, wildly careening cars, and nuclear radiation. Menacing brutes carrying machetes bear watching also.

Leo (July 22 to August 21): Do not spend more money than you have or financial difficulties could arise.

Virgo (Aug. 22 to Sept. 22): The stars indicate you should travel to Katmandu today. Dress warmly.

Libra (Sept. 23 to Oct. 22): Nothing will happen today. Sorry.

Scorpio (Oct. 23 to Nov. 21): You are particularly vulnerable to a nervous breakdown today. Therefore, do not take any exams, watch the evening news, or view any TV program with the Osmonds on it.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22 to Dec. 21): At a party tonight, the object of your desires will play hard to get. On the other hand, a member of the opposite sex who is built like a stegosaurus, with a brain to match, will be sexually attracted to you. Run!

Capricorn (Dec. 22 to Jan. 20): The configuration of the planets makes your digestive system extremely sensitive. You are especially susceptible to food poisoning. Under no circumstances should you swallow anything in a SAGA cafeteria today.

Aquarius (Jan. 21 to Feb. 19): You will feel a strange compulsion to shout, "Thar she blows!" today. The stars say that now is a good time to add to your spring wardrobe or to get a prefrontal lobotomy.

Pisces (Feb. 20 to March 20): Portentous planet alignments mean a really shitty day for you. But don't despair; such days build character. You will receive a long-distance phone call from a dead person. Don't accept the charges if it's collect.

The UVM Student Association is not a model where students pretend to be administrators, treasurers or senators. The S.A. is a very real organization which affects the student body in a very real way. The amount of work that the President and Vice-President put into the tasks of the S.A. has a direct effect on the quality of student life and activities at the University of Vermont. This year Michael Deutch and Rick Green have created the potential for the Student Association to become a major decision-making force at UVM. Through working with them this year, I have come up with some ideas for changes that will help realize this potential.

S.A.'s undertakings will be essential in determining the amount of weight student input carries. The great importance of Legislative Day and the spring lobbying effort in Montpelier have finally become apparent, as the student body watches its tuition and other expenses rise while financial aid plummets. The General Assemblies of the S.A. could and should become forums for students to express themselves, on the money issue, as well as many others.

The distribution of the student activity fee is the responsibility of the Student Association. Needs to be defined. Suggested

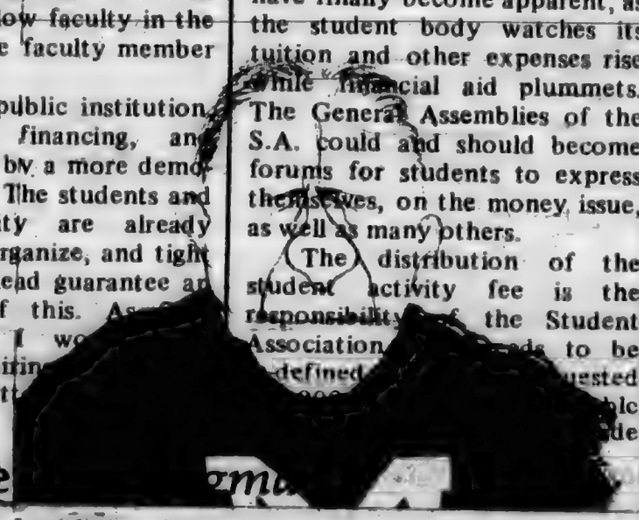
It was not until the beginning of this year that the Student Association had appeared to me to be an "organization." In my previous two years here at the University, I had learned very little about the Student Association and no one had made a real effort to inform me. However, this year I have seen a dramatic change in this situation. S.A. has done a terrific job of informing the student body of the issues which are important to University and the students, and of increasing the student body's general knowledge of the organization. However, this is just the first step in truly making the Student Association the "students" association.



My name is Mark B... and I am a candidate for the office of Vice-President of Student Association. I feel that what was done this year is a good start towards bringing the S.A. to the students. I want to be sure that the positive aspects of S.A. are further developed and expanded to maximize the benefits to both the students and the University. Some of the specifics of these positive aspects are: the development of pertinent and public Assemblies; the ... constructive ...

It is time for the students to take control. For too long the decision and policy-making processes which affect all facets of our lives as students, have been out of our control, and in the hands of a small number of administrators and trustees. The results are that students don't have any concrete input into who their professors will be, or the academic priorities and financial direction of this institution. What I hope to do throughout this campaign and as the Vice President of the Student Association is 1) to raise the issues, 2) to make the Student Association more of a student government instead of simply a service organization, and 3) to build a coalition of students, faculty, community members for purposes of re-evaluating the priorities of the university and making it more accountable to the people it affects.

Many students have little knowledge of S.A. beyond a representative body in terms of what it can offer to each of us; yet UVM students support the S.A. by paying the fee on our tuition bills. It would be my concern to see that each student can get something back from S.A., either in terms of monetary savings or experience from involvement in S.A. programs.

One of the main areas of concern to me will be services to the students: S.A. programs from which UVM students receive ... the cou... has ac... begun projects that are worthy to be continued next year. The Billings renovations plans must be fairly presented so that each student may decide on the issue, which would have a profound effect on each student's bill if approved. A Teacher Evaluation system was begun this week by S.A. and will be an excellent way to find out about courses before registration, improving the quality of education at UVM. This will also make UVM students more informed about the University in an area that affects us every day. Another service that can give direct benefits to the students is the Book Exchange. This would be one way for a student to receive monetary returns from S.A. The on-campus Pub in Billings also promises to be a way to save, and if successful, would help bring together UVM students by providing us with our own pub here on campus.

S.A. can also provide a means for students to influence the bigger costs, especially tuition, through Legislative Day, the Lobby, and a letter-writing campaign. By participating in these programs, students can have some effect on the State of Vermont's view of the University and ultimately its funding of UVM, along with gaining valuable experience while involved with S.A.

Along with the State Legislature's opinion of UVM, S.A. should be concerned with the city of Burlington and our relationship with it. As representatives of the students to Burlington, S.A. must address such issues as the last night of fi... and the recent events at ... Nu and Wills Halls in a manner to protect UVM's reputation and improve our standing as resi... of Burlington.

S.A. should be a means by which we can try to do something about the problems confronting UVM students. Something should be done about the Communications dept., the town's view of UVM, rising tuition, etc., and every student must be informed of the issues and have the chance to get involved in them through S.A. programs. As Vice-President, I would ... let every student ha... fit from by having. I am supportive of the suggested modifications.

The relationship between the University and the City of Burlington needs to be addressed. Riding the momentum of the recent mayoral election, we can take steps towards improving the existing situation. It is important that we reach an understanding which both communities will benefit from.

These are not the only issues, but are some which I feel to be the most important. The S.A. presidency is an incredible commitment and challenge. Overseeing and guiding the Senate and presenting the student viewpoint to the administration are formidable tasks as the S.A. grows and assumes greater responsibilities. I strongly urge any and all interested students to attend the forums and meet the candidates in order to make an educated decision about the future of the S.A.

I feel that the most important base for any presidential candidate to build upon is increasing the S.A. reach to students with programs which are concerned with the quality of life and education here at the University. For this reason, I feel strongly that the S.A. Book Exchange and the S.A. Student-Course Evaluations need to be continued and expanded. I would also like to see S.A. involvement with the Legislative Day continued and the Lobby Effort correlated with a more comprehensive letter-writing campaign at both the state and national level.

The Billings Renovation feasibility study makes recommendations for increasing student organization office space, for establishing a possible lecture hall-theatre, and a Campus Pub. These are all facilities which our university lacks and would benefit from. I am supportive of the suggested modifications.

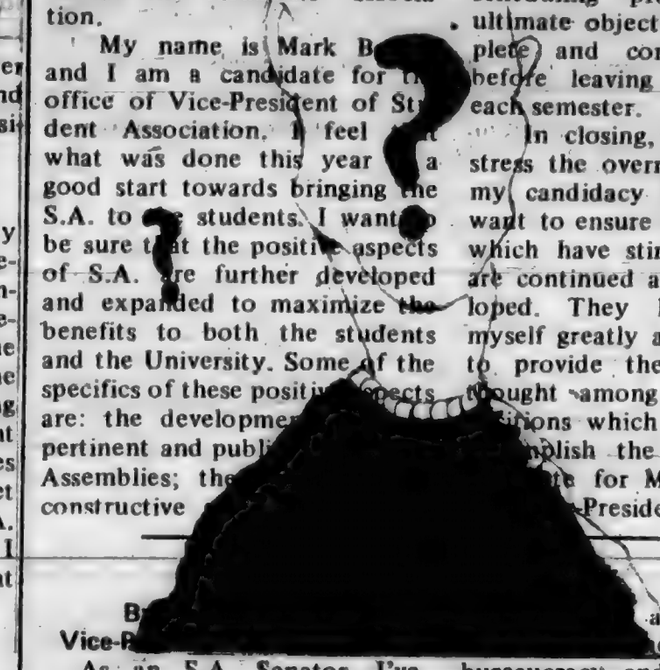
necessary an average cut of 35% on each group's budget allocation. A major reorganization will make more money available to more clubs. Groups must be made more cohesive, a board could be created that will eliminate duplication of services between groups and increase the possible size of any group's undertaking.

The S.A. Senate today has to operate as a type of watchdog, because of the structure of the club system. There are some exciting proposals in the Senate now which will increase the amount of interaction between S.A. and the rest of the students. The best way to get people involved in their own system of government is to offer them services which they want to be involved with, and then to welcome their input.

I am running for S.A. President because I can see some areas for real change in the Student Association and would like the opportunity to implement them.



This declaration of candidacy has been limited in length, so cannot go into great detail of the specific changes. Please watch for the time and place for the Presidential forums, and look for myself and Mark Bottini around campus for more information on our ideas.

Vote for a change.

program; and the evolution of a concrete and feasible Billings renovation proposal.

All of these positive aspects have been initiated and/or further developed by this year's administration. I feel that these all should be continued and most importantly improved, as well as some new programs implemented. For instance, in regard to the General Assemblies, to improve student turnout and general assessibility, the assemblies could be held at various locations throughout campus (i.e. Simpson, WDW, L/L, H/M) each time to make them more visible to the student body. An example of a new program I would like to see is one which would facilitate the scheduling process with the ultimate objective being a complete and corrected schedule before leaving at the end of each semester.

In closing, I would like to stress the overriding themes of my candidacy for S.A. V.P. I want to ensure that the changes which have stirred my interest are continued and further developed. They have benefitted myself greatly and I would like to provide the continuity of thought among the leadership positions which is necessary to accomplish the same for you. Vote for Mark Bottini for Vice-President.

As an S.A. Senator, I've served on the Student Action Committee, which is headed by the S.A. Vice-President. Under Rick Green, our committee has run a successful student book exchange, aided by fellow senators. We're in the midst of a course evaluation, the results to be published in the Cynic before pre-registration to aid in course selection. As S.A. Vice-President I'd see that such projects would continue.

Among other areas to be addressed:

1. Reform of Residential Life's Russian roulette lottery system is needed. Enrollments are not going down (though tuition-setters are trying their hardest). Incredibly, Res Life has underestimated enrollment every year for a decade — perhaps to avoid acquiring a new residence hall. Having lived in Hamilton Hall and out at the Fort, I'm familiar with the advantages and disadvantages of both on- and off-campus living.

2. Students and faculty ... a united front in ... administrative bureaucracy and its occasional asininities. I support faculty unionization.

3. The cost of attending UVM continues to skyrocket. The legislative lobbying effort should continue and ways to lower costs must be found; e.g. more co-op dorms and lowered thermostats.

4. There should be a study period of several days when there are no classes before exam week begins.

5. On-campus upperclassmen should not be required to purchase the current SAGA minimum meal plan. A food quality increase would necessarily result.

As for broad political issues, my viewpoint (expressed in frequent Cynic commentaries) is not easily classifiable. I guess I'm what could be called a Progressive-Conservative.

I hope you'll vote in the election and that a new spirit of campus involvement will supersede the apathy of the self-centered 70's.

UVM Financial Aid On Federal Chopping Block

By Russell Flannery

Ronald Reagan campaigned for the Presidency promising to eliminate waste and fraud in Washington, and reverse a perceived overextension of the federal government into American business and society. Along with a conservatively bent Senate and a relatively less liberal House of Representatives, the President is currently re-evaluating government-funded programs, and causing consternation among groups as diverse as farmers and oil refiners. Financial aid programs to higher education are not exempt from reconsideration, and a significant change in government policy in this area may be underway.

Once thought to be sacred, the "tuition cow" is going under Reagan's knife in the near future, and this could leave UVM on a very lean diet.

Perceptions about the role of the government in educational funding have changed dramatically since the 1960's, when much of the rationale for current aid programs was first espoused. Approximately one month after his inauguration, John Kennedy told a special session of Congress "our nation's progress as a nation can be no swifter than our progress in education... The human mind is our fundamental resource. A balanced federal program must go well beyond incentive in plant and equipment. It must include equally determined measures to invest in human beings – both in their basic education and training, and in their more advanced preparation for professional work. Without such measures, the Federal government will not be carrying out its responsibilities."

Kennedy proposed a then innovative program for federal scholarships, now called grants. Regarding this idea, the New York Times editorialized, "This is good." Twenty years later, addressing Congress within one month of his inauguration, Ronald Reagan struck a markedly different theme: "The taxing power of the government must not be used to regulate the economy or bring about social change. We've tried that before and surely must be able to see it doesn't work. Spending by government must be limited to those functions which are the proper province of government. We can no longer afford things simply because we think of them..." Concurrently, the Times editors found "A Sacred But Fat Tuition Cow" and declared that "the least needy families now getting grants should be given loans instead."

The continued funding of aid programs at pre-1980 levels would appear to be uncertain as long as the Reagan Administration is preparing the budget, and the country swings to a more conservative tune. But because the new President's first budget is only for fiscal year 1981-82, any Administration-sponsored cuts probably will not affect students until the fall of 1982. Of more immediate consequence, yet receiving less attention, are proposed reductions and complications from the Carter Administration's last budget. There are currently pieces of legislation in Congress which could affect next semester's financial aid programs to such an extent that for some, "continued enrollment at UVM could be threatened," according to UVM Financial Aid Office Director Dale Hyerstay.

Present uncertainties about financial aid concern two programs. The Basic Equal Opportunity Grant (BEOG) program, a direct federal grant awarded to about 2,000 UVM students, needs $911 million to meet commitments already made for this academic year. The program's Congressional allocation is based on an estimate of the number of students who will qualify for and accept the award. Last year's prediction was somewhat inaccurate; and processing of next year's applications have been suspended until Congress decides how the program deficit will be funded.

Financial Aid Director Dale Hyerstay

Secondly, the National Direct Student Loan (NDSL) program, a government-subsidized, low interest loan program, is currently facing a 35 percent reduction in Congress. All of the approximately 1000 out-of-state students who receive financial aid and over one half of the in-state students who receive loans receive NDSL.

"There is some fear that the Administration and Congress will attempt to cut the BEOG budget for next year in order to eliminate the deficit for this year," according to Hyerstay. Should this happen, ad hoc adjustments are possible, but all would have the same consequence: some individuals would receive less financial aid.

> "Remove BEOG, and you remove the key to their attendance."
> -Hyerstay

Any loss of federally funded programs such as NDSL "would drastically reduce our ability to provide loans to needy students, both in-state and out-of-state," said Hyerstay. Because of the University bias to in-state aid recipients, and because of the differences in the way in-state and out-of-state student aid packages are allocated, the effects on both of any reduction will not necessarily be the same for all financial aid students.

"Our first obligation," says Hyerstay, "is to see to it that the Vermont students, who, in some cases, have no choice but to attend the University of Vermont, don't have that opportunity endangered because of not enough aid to meet their needs."

"We are greatly sympathetic to the needs of our out-of-state students, and I wish we could fully meet their needs, but there are simply not enough dollars. We have to meet the needs of in-state students first and then with the money that remains do the best job we can with out-of-state students. It's a pure and simple matter of funds."

Moreover, the same financial aid programs receive different weights and play different roles in the Financial Aid Office's formula determining aid packages, and this reflects some bias. For in-state students, BEOG constitutes the basis for measuring all further levels of aid. The Financial Aid Office decides the amount of assistance merited, subtracts the BEOG from that figure, and tries to make up the difference from other sources. Assuming that the state-funded grant program will not increase, any cut in BEOG or the "loan" (NDSL) component of the in-state package could be compensated by expansion in the Supplement Equal Opportunity Grant (SEOG), a different federal grant program, University grants and loans, or work study, even if these funds perhaps require shifting of money now going to out-of-state students.

For out-of-state students, financial aid in the most recent past has had an absolute ceiling of $3,000, consisting of three specific programs: NDSL, SEOG, and work study aid. Any difference between tuition and expenses of, say, $7,000 and financial aid awarded has had to have been made up by summer savings, parental fair share, or BEOG. Therefore, if work study and SEOG awards do not increase this year, as expected, and if NDSL, as proposed in Congress, declines, money to pay for any increase in tuition and expenses will have to come from summer savings,

Work-Study With A Twist

By Eliot Bergson

With the prospect of severe cuts in educational aid almost certain in the near future, alternative means of funding the high cost of a college education are becoming more attractive.

One such opportunity now exists at UVM. Through a grant from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, the University will be able to pay a selected number of undergraduates a stipend of $1800 and up to $1000 for expenses for research projects to be completed this summer.

According to Dr. Hubert Vogellman, Chairman of the Botany Department and head of the Mellon Grants Committee, UVM was carefully selected to participate in the program. "We're in some impressive company," he said. "Only a select number of schools in the country were chosen – Stanford, Yale, Cornell, Johns Hopkins, Connecticut College, Oberlin, Williams, Dartmouth, and UVM."

Undergraduates from all disciplines are encouraged to submit proposals for research aimed at "developing an awareness of environmental and resource problems." Vogellman stressed that "environmental" does not necessarily mean just the outdoors, but encompasses all fields of study, including Engineering, History, Political Science, Art, and others.

In the past year and a half, the Mellon grants have funded studies on Vermont's low-head hydropower potential, an Adirondack Hikers' Survey, using phosphate levels to measure nitrate levels in aquatic ecosystems, acid precipitation, and citizens' perceptions of the environmental costs of energy development. Vogellman said that these projects have been "very successful – the Mellon people seem happy."

Interested students should submit a proposal to the Botany chairman by April 10. The document should include a clear-cut statement of objectives, a justification statement explaining the reasons for wanting to research the topic and the importance of that research, an explanation of the methods to be employed, and a budget that outlines expected costs.

In addition, the student should select a faculty member or other "qualified professional," Vogellman said, as an advisor. A letter from this person, stating that he or she agrees to supervise the student's work, should accompany the proposal.

"This is a great opportunity for positive student output," Vogellman concluded, urging all undergraduates to take advantage of the offer.

Explosives Found, Residents Evacuated

By Eliot Bergson

Due to the discovery of dangerous and potentially explosive chemicals in Wills Hall late last Thursday night, residents were evacuated for nearly two hours while bomb experts carefully removed cylinders and bottles containing hydrogen, picric acid, mercury, and crystalline TNT.

A "temporary action suspending the housing privileges" of William Leslie, a freshman from Cincinnati, Ohio, has been taken pending a formal University review of the incident, according to Paul Oliaro, Director of Residential Life.

Contrary to reports in the Burlington Free Press and on two local radio stations, Leslie has not been expelled from the University.

Resident Assistant Loren Andrews said he returned from the library about midnight Thursday and heard complaints that there was "mercury on the bathroom floor." Upon hearing from an unnamed resident that "there were other chemicals, including hydrogen, in Bill's room," Andrews called UVM Security.

With the help of the Burlington Police Department and UVM Rescue, the building was evacuated and the chemicals were removed to the center of the green behind Cook Physical Sciences building.

Leslie allegedly took the chemicals from a special storage room on the fifth floor of the Cook building. UVM Chemistry Professor Michael Strauss, called in to assist law enforcement officials, confirmed that the chemicals were taken from that room.

"Last time I saw the box (containing the chemicals) and cylinders was up there. To the best of my knowledge, the door was locked, and they were never put outside the building," Strauss said.

Leslie declined to say where or how he got them, but said that the chemicals "were in a dark corner," and that he did not get them "from any room in Cook by breaking in."

Strauss stressed the fact that these compounds are being used for the synthesis of potential pharmaceuticals and for cancer research, as well as basic chemical studies, not for any explosives research.

Although "picric acid could cause a violent explosion under certain circumstances," Strauss' work with nitro groups does not involve, for example, nitroglycerin, which is "much more sensitive to mechanical shock," he said. He explained that the room in which these compounds are kept is specially built to withstand explosions, and the chemicals in no way represent a threat to anyone.

When asked if the materials were marked "dangerous," Leslie said that he didn't notice any markings. Strauss, however, showed evidence that the bottles were marked as to what compounds they contained, as well as giving expressed warnings as to certain dangers if misused.

Leslie, who has been told by Burlington Police to "expect a phone call in a couple of weeks" at the conclusion of their investigation, said that if he "had known what they were, he would never have taken them." He is also waiting for word on exactly what the University will do about the incident.

According to Oliaro and Dean of Students Keith Miser, Leslie will go through the University judicial process involving violations of school regulations. "This is a normal course of action," Oliaro said. "All we have are allegations at this point. We must get a clear idea of what violations occurred, and this will come about during the normal due process of the judicial system."

Leslie said that he has not been given any definite date as to the UVM procedure, but "all my teachers think I've been expelled. I can't even get make-up work! It's all a nightmare."

"We must get a clear idea of what violations occurred, and this will come out during the normal due process of the judicial system."

Enraged Women March On Fraternity House

By Grove Potter

Fired up by reports of alleged gang rapes at the Sigma Nu fraternity, 300 protesters from the Burlington community marched through the streets Saturday night after the concert by feminist singer Holly Near. The crowd ignored the limits of its city parade permit and surrounded the fraternity house shouting "WE WANT THE NAMES," "SHUT DOWN SIGMA NU," and singing an anti-rape song "Fight Back."

The "take back the night" march was not organized by any specific women's group, although the permit to march was granted to the Rape Crisis Center. Marches of this type have been staged in Burlington almost biannually for more than six years. Janet Patterson, a nurse practitioner who helped found the Women's Health Center and has been active in the fight for women's rights in Burlington for 15 years, said, "this march is the biggest public demonstration I've seen... I'm very impressed by the variety of people here. Not just one group is represented." Men and students were present in the predominantly female crowd.

"We are here to show our anger and our power! We want to make it safe to walk the streets of Burlington," a Burlington woman announced just before the march.

Celia Vera, a rally organizer, demanded that the city fund a Center for Battered and Abused Women, reinstate the rape investigation squad at the Burlington Police Dept., train young girls in self-defense in the public schools, and that "the cover-up of sexual assault on the UVM campus" cease, and that police action be taken against student offenders.

A brief statement by mayor-elect Bernie Sanders was read calling rape "a very serious problem in the city of Burlington," and that he is committed to wiping out this "plague."

With reference to honoring the guidelines of the permit, a woman with the megaphone told the crowd to "make your own choice which way you go." She warned that "the house is well guarded. Don't do anything to get yourselves hurt."

Several women brandished signs that read "Castrate the 8 Sigma Nu rapists," and "Castrate Rapists." One sign was fashioned in the shape of an executioner's axe with the word "CASTRATE" printed on it.

The crowd proceeded up College St. stretching from S. Willard St. to Hungerford Terrace. The police escorted the group, stopping traffic at all intersections.

Sanders Loses 12 Votes But Keeps Victory

Ballot-counting in Superior Court Friday.

By Richard Hyland

Bernard Sanders retained his triumphant victory over Mayor Gordon Paquette last Friday, at the conclusion of an anxious recounting session that diminished his margin of victory to just ten votes. The ballots — impounded by the Chittenden County Superior Court since the election March 3 — were counted by the Board of Civil Authority which included Burlington aldermen and three members of the Citizens' Party elected especially for the task. Neither Paquette nor Sanders witnessed the recount, but were represented by their respective attorneys, Allan Bruce and William Sessions.

The results, announced in numerical order by ward, found Wards 1 and 6 tallies correct, but revealed discrepancies in the other four wards of the city. Paquette gained an additional eight votes in Wards 2, 3, 4, but lost a vote from Ward 5 for a net gain of 7. Most of Paquette's new votes were attributed to new found paper ballots and a misread machine tally from Ward 3. The only conflict in Sanders' vote recount was a loss of five paper ballot votes in Ward 5. The Board ruled one ballot from Ward 5 "spoiled" as it had marks for both Bove and Sanders.

The infamous unsealed box which contained the paper ballots from Ward 6 became the dramatic center of attention during the final stages of the recount, but it produced no discrepancies. The two other mayoral challengers, Richard Bove and Joseph McGrath, Jr., each acquired an additional vote through the recount. Write-in votes were also recorded for Greg Guma, an unsuccessful candidate for alderman, and Police Chief Richard Beaulieu. Mayor Paquette, who is vacationing in Florida, was informed of the final vote but had no comment available. Mayor-elect Sanders expressed relief that the recount was finally over and said he was ready to go ahead with transition plans.

Education Professor Mark Smith

Teaching Students To Learn

Interviewed by Wendy Goodrich

"Higher education is a vast, rich storehouse of pertinent information and a home of highly trained professionals. Unfortunately, many students pass through college barely touched and hardly influenced – like two ships in the night, they barely see or know each other.

"We can consider this problem as, first, the waste of valuable resources and talent of both teachers and students and, secondly, a lost opportunity in taking full advantage of developmental capacities during the optimal learning period between adolescence and adulthood.

"Thus, I have several recurring questions: Have educators shut students out of the reasoning process by feeding them products of their own thought? For example, do the professors' notes pass from the teachers' notebook to the students' notebooks without passing through the minds of either? How does this contribute to student alienation? Lastly, if we have excluded students from reasoning, what has been the effect on a society in which people have to solve complex problems on a day-to-day basis?

"The discovery of knowledge is seen as a painful process by many students. It is not seen as something useful which can solve problems and help answer basic questions of value. One of the biggest misconceptions at the University is that the only way you can use information is for purposes of achieving a grade. This is a result of rote learning and teaching, where information is just spewed out and learning is random.

"What is meant by active problem solving? Students reorganizing the information. For example, she takes a segment of a class discussion and makes sure she understands it accurately by reorganizing it in her own frame of reference, establishing links with other personal knowledge, and finally, testing the validity of the knowledge by answering the question 'So what?' Then the student has something that sticks, is a building block for future learning, and is a source of motivation.

"Rote learning really angers me. It violates the learner and essentially programs him for failure because learners don't have a mechanism for retaining arbitrary information. This also violates the integrity of knowledge. If we really care about knowledge, then we should try to teach in a way that makes the information more permanent instead of resorting to a rote method which is, essentially, an excuse for easy teaching.

"My primary purpose is to transmit knowledge in a way that's meaningful to the learner and subsequently useful in the solving of everyday problems. I think the motivation to learn and acquire knowledge becomes stronger when the learner sees the effectiveness of learning in problem solving.

"Ideally there should be a constant relationship between what knowledge the teacher has and what knowledge the learner has – a collaboration between both. The teacher is giving knowledge and helping to reorganize it for the learner's needs, and at the same time respecting the learner's process of reorganizing and using that knowledge. Out of this collaboration comes a relationship because you have two people concerned about the same piece of information.

"For the student the result of rote teaching becomes alienation. They are in a period of life where they are forming an identity. They are reconciling what they believe in, trying to get congruent and appear as an integrative person. Because of these changes they find it hard to take hold. They become alienated from self, and of self, in a struggle to cope. One of the reasons for alienation is the lack of stimulation and intellectual activity between teacher and student. This has become a major problem at the University.

"My recommendations in dealing with alienation are first that the students face up to alienation and realize that they have been socialized. Also, the students should seek to make friends with the University. There are a lot of faculty here who are really interested in the students and are willing to form relationships with them. But the students need to be committed and act on those commitments as much as anybody else.

"Students should also be committed to knowledge and use that knowledge to help themselves. They need to take intellectual risks with that knowledge. At the same time however, a teacher should also take risks so as to stimulate the student to look at what they already know, and use the new information to go beyond the previous limit. To reorganize knowledge is a risk for both teacher and learner.

"This is where faculty can play an important role. We have the knowledge and the skills at our disposal to teach effectively. The caring and concern for the next generation is to want to give away knowledge in a way that won't destroy its own credibility but that instead will extend its originality and enrich its content. Learning is critical to growth and knowledge is an essential interaction for development.

"But a professor's academic ideas must be tested. Publication is a test to create and recreate knowledge. There can be a productive relationship between scholarship and teaching. Publication can enhance intellectual stimulation which can be, and should be, brought in to the classroom. Faculty members should be encouraged to find a creative way to combine and balance both.

"There are ways to give weight to the teaching side of the scale however. One is expository teaching. This is a careful and articulate way of lecturing and explaining. I also believe the learning environment should be one that fosters the process to rethink ideas. Most importantly, though, there should evolve a natural dynamic in higher education to be an active learner, not a passive student. This will have to be an effort on the part of the faculty to become inspired towards teaching, and the student to become committed to taking risks with newly acquired knowledge.

The Sigma Nu house was dark as the crowd approached. Sergeant LaWare of the Burlington Police Department said that deputy sheriffs were in the house providing security. The midnight shift of the Burlington Police was also called in early to help with the crowd, he said.

After deviating from the planned march route by turning left on S. Williams St. and tramping over the front lawn of the Acacia house, the lead marchers continued up to the front door of the Sigma Nu house. Others crowded onto the porch behind them. Two policemen occupied positions at the front door.

The only act of vandalism occurred when a beer bottle was thrown through the front window by one of the marchers.

Several women shouted that the police were protecting rapists. Vera insisted that "rape happens at every fraternity." When members of other fraternities pressed her to retract this statement later, she refused.

The crowd moved back up Williams St. toward Main St. and stopped in front of President Coor's home. Shouts of "come on down Lattie," and accusations of rape courses being taught at UVM were the gist of the demonstration here. Police officers protected the front door.

Marchers nearly spanned the width of Main St. on their way downtown, forcing cars over to the curb. Comments from spectators caused brief altercations. One man's car was kicked and he was surrounded by women when he got out of his car to protest. Police moved in quickly to break up the trouble.

When the marchers reached Church St., those in front led the group to the area outside of "Rasputin's" and "Texas." Here, several furious women shouted at a number of men who teased them with comments like, "I'm going to a rape party at Sigma Nu," and "Why don't you get married?"

Again, police moved in and broke up the crowd, and the demonstration dispersed shortly afterward.

Special Olympians Show Courage At Games

Mime troupe entertaining the Olympians

by Sarah Bailey

"Let me win, but if I cannot win, let me be brave in the attempt."
-Special Olympics Oath

These words, and the spirit behind them, were evident last week as over 600 people with mentally retarded development converged on Smuggler's Notch and Stowe, Vermont to compete in the 1981 International Special Olympics. Athletes from the United States, Canada and other nations competed for the gold, silver, and bronze medals in alpine skiing, nordic skiing, and ice skating events.

Winning was not the singular goal, however. It was a chance to meet new people, participate in the Winter Carnival and to show the world that the mentally retarded "do not need to be locked away as society's rejects," said Herb Kramer of the Joseph P. Kennedy Foundation. Through these games, and all others since the Kennedy Foundation started them in the 1960's, it has been shown that these people can attain goals that even some "normal" people cannot. The record for the mile run by a Special Olympian, for instance, is four minutes, 20 seconds.

Last week, these people showed their ambition and proved their abilities. For the volunteers who dedicated up to 14 months on the project, the week proved to be as much for them as for the athletes, and worth all the work.

Not all the weeks will be as rewarding, however. "What we must remember," said Kramer, "is that these people have to wake up tomorrow, and as the medals are put in a drawer, and the memories fade, they still have to deal with the ignorance and the prejudice."

Financial Aid Cuts

parental contribution and the BEOG. If a student's parents can not increase their contribution or summer savings can not increase to cover the added expenses, then any change in the BEOG for out-of-state students dependent on financial aid becomes critical.

Out-of-state students who are dependent on BEOG are generally from "a family whose income is moderate, and whose attendance at an out-of-state university is really stretching their capability," says Hyerstay. "BEOG is quite often the key to their being able to attend. Remove that, and you remove the key to their attendance."

Broadly, then, Hyerstay noted, "Without even getting into the Reagan stuff, we have clear concerns for next year." With equal concern, Hyerstay said that Congress had not yet acted on either Carter or Reagan proposals, and that students should not "overreact" to what are still proposals. Nonetheless, he said, students who depend on financial aid to continue their education "might find it appropriate" to express their opinions to the Congressmen of their home state.

Ronald Reagan's budget ax seems to be aimed at the two largest federally backed financial aid programs: BEOG, and a low interest loan program, Guaranteed Student Loans (GSL). The cost of the latter has blossomed in recent years due to a change in eligibility requirements in 1978.

A long-term reduction in the BEOG would have essentially the same effect as a temporary one – Reagan could propose a lower lid on the income families eligible for BEOG, fail to consider number of students attending college per family when determining aid, or reduce the ceiling per recipient. In any event, the result will be a reduced financial aid appropriation.

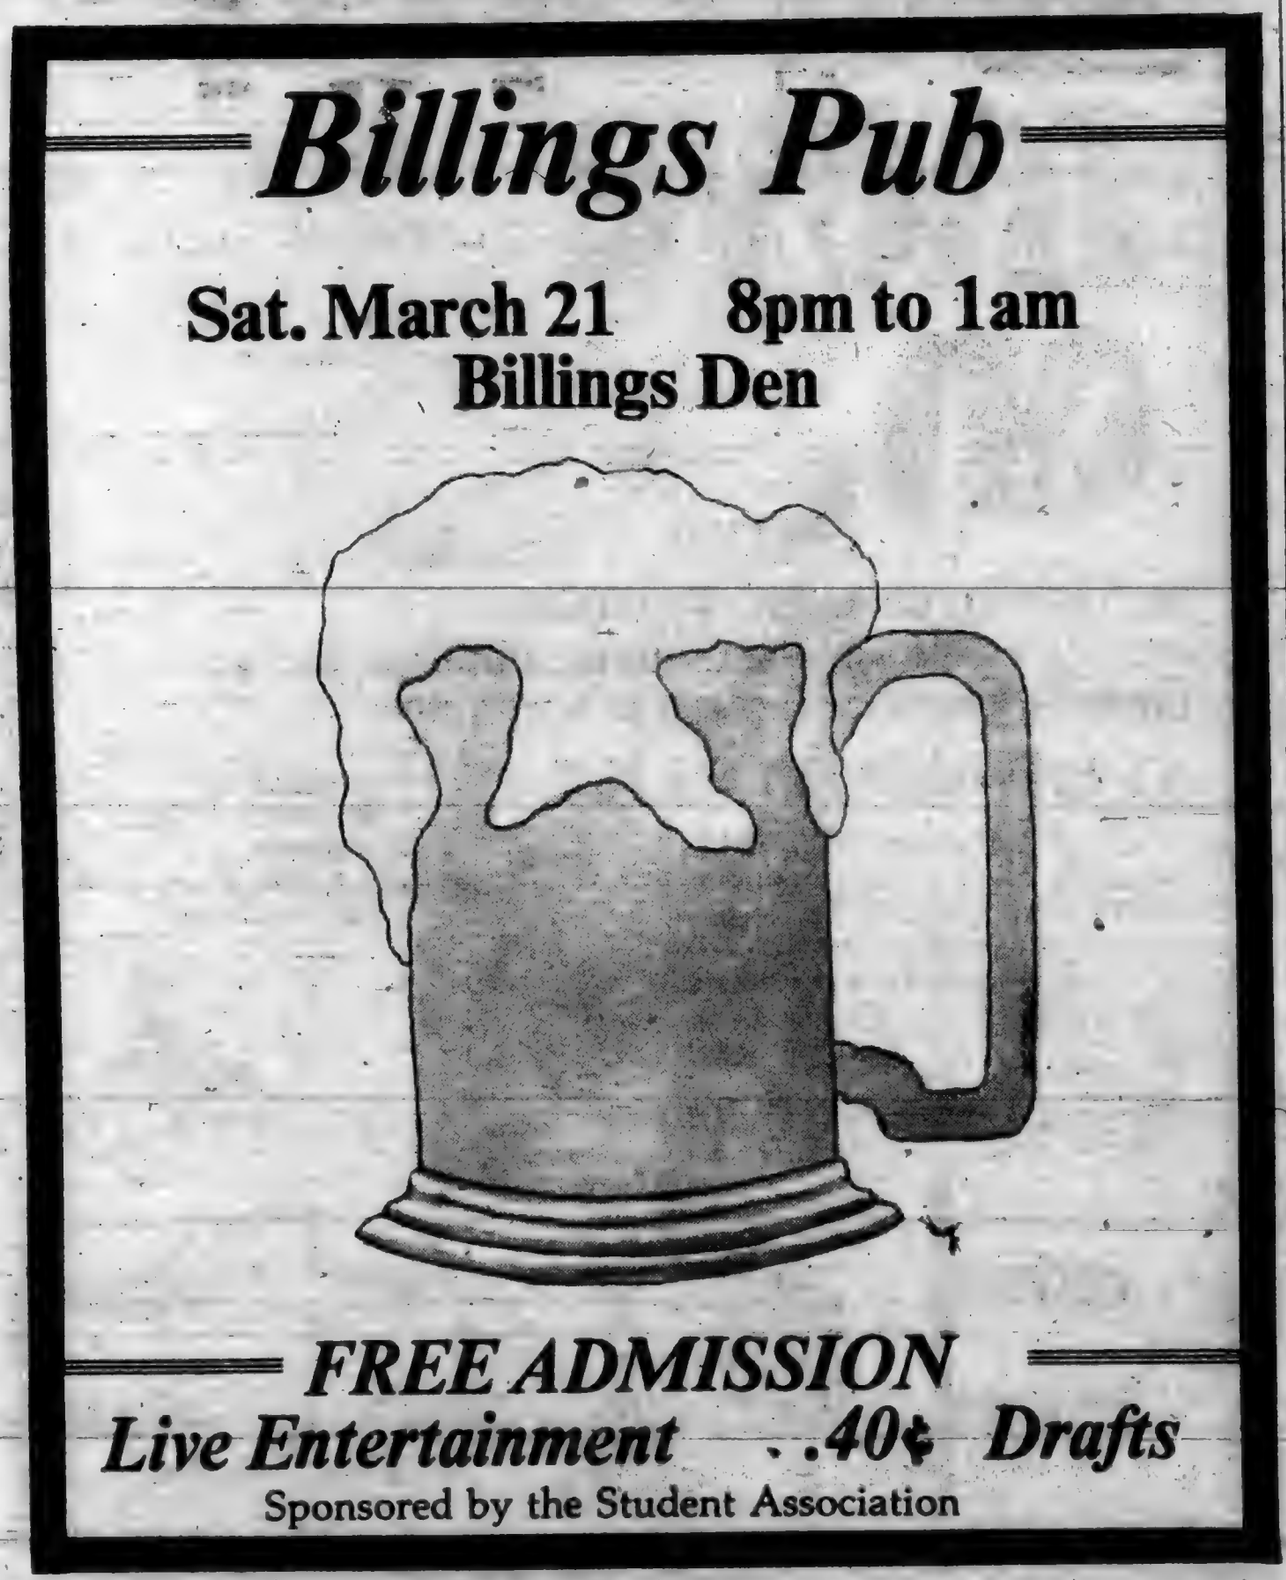
Guaranteed Student Loans are low interest student loans whose costs have nearly quadrupled to $3 billion since 1978, when Congress passed legislation relaxing loan eligibility requirements. At this time, students may borrow up to $2,500 annually to attend school, regardless of need.

As currently understood, the Reagan proposals would end GSL borrowing by those without substantiated need; students would be required to pay interest on loans during their actual enrollment in school, and borrowing to replace parental contribution will be terminated. It is expected that in the future parents unable to meet a determined contribution level would be required to borrow the money at an interest rate equal to a 13-week U.S. Treasury note plus a 3.5 percent interest premium.

If Reagan does not cut NDSL, SEOG, and work study programs, which is a risky assumption, BEOG and GSL reductions alone could dramatically influence the ability of out-of-state students to meet the difference between UVM financial aid awarded and increasing tuition expenses. Students can now meet "unmet need" through the GSL program. If a student's other resources – SEOG, BEOG, NDSL, miscellaneous income, parental contributions, and summer savings – do not meet tuition and expenses, and GSL is not available, it is not at all clear where a student would find the funding to pursue higher education.

Accordingly, a program based on eliminating waste and unnecessary government spending may in fact impose limits on a student's choice of school or, in fact, whether or not a student may have access to higher education at all.

According to the UVM Financial Aid Director, "The Reagan Administration has said it will reduce the expense of fraud and abuse to taxpayers, and no one could object to that. But by virtue of including some financial aid in their proposed cuts, there is the assumption that there is fraud and abuse in these programs also.



"However, one of the things I've always been impressed with is the extent to which financial aid professionals – we ourselves, as taxpayers – are concerned with how our money is being spent along with everybody else's.

"The Reagan Administration's proposals (reflect) a desire to put a lid, as it were, on some of the programs that were opened up during the Carter Administration because they're finding that opening the bid costs a great deal of money. So criticism should not be aimed at a program which is doing exactly what it was intended to do...

"The impact (of reductions in financial aid programs) will depend on the extent to which they do not over-reduce those programs, particularly Guaranteed Student Loans. Some students who depend upon that program for access as well as choice will lose out. We see into enough family circumstances to verify that there are families, (who) if not for assistance from Guaranteed Student Loans, would not be able to exercise choice in attendance in the school to which they desire to have their children attend...

"Congress with recent legislation began to take the position that they would provide some help towards choice. So the difference (now) is that there appears to be a trend in the Reagan Administration of saying that the Government should only be concerned with access.

"The Reagan Administration has not taken a position against choice; one can assume that the impact of reducing federal aid would in fact be to reduce choice. It's an implied intent."

Contesting Tickets

May Save Hassles

By Chris Dempf
Co-Director

A speeding conviction may affect your right to drive and your insurance rates, and therefore may often be more costly than the time, money and effort spent trying to fight the charge. When you are stopped by a police officer for speeding, there are several steps that you can take to try and get the speeding charge reduced or dismissed.

When accepting the speeding citation, you should be polite and respectful. Do not try to make excuses, because you may inadvertantly admit guilt. Even if you are guilty, you should not admit guilt. There is a chance that you may have your case dismissed or your citation and fine reduced.

After you have signed the citation, smile, thank the police officer, drive away at a speed within the speed limit and begin thinking about your next step.

To give yourself some time to research all options and alternatives, enter a "not guilty" plea and ask for a trial by court. If you think that a jury would be more sympathetic to the circumstances surrounding the citation, you may want to ask for a jury trial. Be aware that you will have to go to court once before the trial date to choose a jury. In either trial by court or trial by jury, you may represent yourself without hiring an attorney. You may retain an attorney at any time, if you feel it necessary.

If, for example, the excessive speed is 13 miles above the speed limit, a $26 fine is charged ($2 per every mile in excess of the speed limit). Three points are charged to your driving license. If you are from out of state, these points will not be added to your home state license, but rather to your right to drive in Vermont. If you have been charged with driving 20 miles an hour or more above the speed limit, then you will have a six point violation. Speeding is only one type of "moving violation." Other types of moving violations are running a traffic light, failure to yield, following too closely, and driving the wrong way in a one-way street.

When you are told how much above the speed limit you were driving and how many points may be assessed against your license, you should get an accurate Motor Vehicle Record Printout. In Vermont you must send $10 to the Department of Motor Vehicles in Montpelier requesting your driving record. To do this, you will need a cover letter providing your date of birth and your full name. You want to know exactly how many penalty points you have because your license may be suspended after being convicted of a specific number of traffic offenses.

First, if you receive a point total of at least 10 points in a two year period, your license will be suspended. Second, if you are convicted of eight "moving violations" in a five year period, your license will automatically be suspended for two years. Knowledge of the seriousness of additional points to your driving record may, for example, compel you to hire an experienced attorney to defend you.

Be aware that depending on the insurance company, conviction of a speeding ticket may affect your rates. To find out what the effect of a ticket will be, call your insurance agent. You do not have to mention that you received a speeding ticket. Speak in generalities and ask for the general rules regarding speeding tickets. Try to avoid mentioning that you received a speeding ticket, because unless you draw direct attention to yourself, the bureaucracy of the Motor Vehicle department may not make contact with your insurance company. Once you have determined what the probable effects of a speeding conviction will be, begin plea bargaining with the State's Attorney.

Plea bargaining for most "moving violations" is done the day of the trial.

Before speaking with the State's Attorney, thoroughly research and prepare your case. Witnesses, signed statements, pictures and other evidence should be available. Background information about yourself should be prepared. Information that indicates your worth to society may help. For example, UVM status, G.P.A., major, career aspirations, etc. If you need your car to get a job, mention how serious this traffic offense is to you. If this is your first traffic offense, mention that. Finally, present a good appearance. Be respectful and maintain your composure.

The best you can usually do in a plea bargain situation when there is only one ticket involved is to change the ticket from a moving violation (speeding) to a non-moving violation (defective equipment). This is a highly significant plea bargaining because no points will be assessed against your driving record.

If no plea bargain is reached, there is still a chance that your speeding charge will be thrown out because the police officer does not show up in court. Sometimes the judge, presiding for less congested court calendars, will reschedule the trial rather than dismissing it. The best you can do in this situation is to respectfully explain to the judge that to reschedule your case would be unjust because you would have to miss another full day of classes or work, travel great distances and incur additional expenses to get to the Court House again. In Chittenden County, the court calendar is so full that usually if the police officer is not present for the

Bar Management Tricky Biz

By Ed Fenton

"Professionals make out and amateurs lose out," said Dan Landry, owner of the bar, Last Chance. John Hill, part owner of Finbar's, explained that if a bar opens simply to make a quick buck, the people running it lose touch with their purpose, which is service to customers.

These attitudes show the keen insights a bar owner or manager must have to stay alive in a business that holds the highest mortality rate of any in the country.

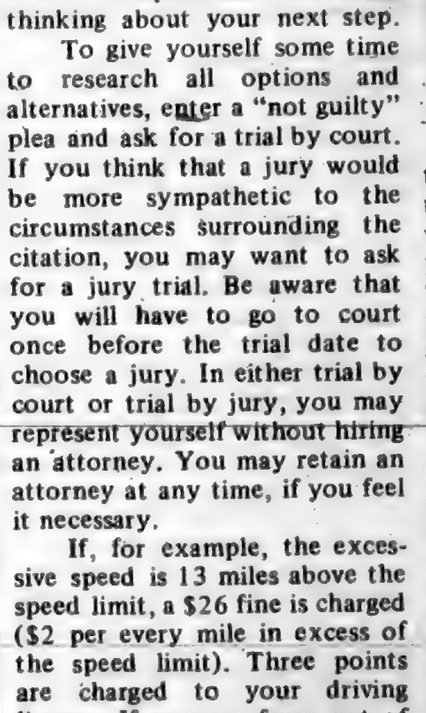
Why was Hannibul's closed and replaced by Pecarus (pronounced Pa-sar-is), a new Mexican restaurant? Why is Texas the fifth bar to open in that spot since 1973, with the last three changes taking place in two years? Owners and managers of bars and restaurants in the Church and Main Street hub area have different insights into success and failure.

Hill, with partner Bill Hunter, of WDOT, considers his place a change of pace from "places with bands or screaming music." Finbar's six year success relies not only on the big college business but also on the cross mix with local clientele who eat lunch there.

Hill believes in quality. "Some people open up and aim at the college students to make a lot of money," he says. "They end up not caring about quality." Hill said that unless the staff cares about operation, service quality declines.

Michael Cain owns B.T. McGuires, Doolin's, and the new Mexican restaurant, Pecarus. The reason behind B.T.'s seven year and Doolin's three year success resembles those for Finbar's, Cain says. A clientele of students and locals who like to eat as well as drink, keep these places active. Although Doolin's is much more beverage oriented, it retains a quieter atmosphere, Cain maintains.

If this bar follows the same trend as the previous two bars at this location, it won't be open in 1983.



Warren Seavey, manager of these places, describes how the closing of Hannibul's and the opening of Pecarus helped Cain's business. "Everyone knows about our problem with a minor being served. A big problem around here is that you can be 35 and get carded. But with restaurants you avoid a lot of that." Seavey said that Hannibul's, a previously steady bar, was on a downward trend anyway. "It just had its heyday, that's all. It was good business to change to Pecarus."

Three years ago, Steve Coons and Frank Cioffi, aided by St. Albans bar owners Jim Pignola and E. Michael McGinn, decided to turn a dirt cellar into what has become one of the biggest bars in Burlington, Rasputin's. Coons and Cioffi, who promoted the place through fraternity and sorority contacts, have since moved on to the restaurant business. Part owner McGinn is busy practicing law, but Pignola visits his bar every day. "We built it ourselves," he says. "When you put your own time into it, it means more to you."

Pignola's practical business insights helped establish his good reputation. With large overhead costs and 40 employees, an owner must stay aware of his business when he's not around. "There are always unexplainable losses from employees, that's just human nature," he says. "But there are warnings when they get too big... they can eat you up." His business is "nerve-racking because it's cash on the spot... Vermont is a controlled state... People think that in the bar business you become an instant millionaire, which isn't true," he says.

Contest...

trial, the case will be dismissed.

If the police officer does show up in court and the State's Attorney is unwilling to reduce the speeding charge to a non-moving violation, an agreement may still be reached to lower the fine. The State's Attorney is usually agreeable to reducing the fine because he is more interested in getting the speeding conviction than in quibbling over a few dollars and having the case take up an hour of court time.

You may go to trial if no satisfactory plea bargaining is reached with the State's Attorney. Depending upon the type of trial that you requested, a judge or a jury will decide the case. The police officer who gave you the speeding ticket will be sworn in and questioned by the State's Attorney. Since you are considered innocent until proven guilty, the State must present its case. You have the opportunity to cross-examine the police officer and any other witnesses called by the State's Attorney. You may also call your own witnesses. You may testify but cannot be forced to testify.

At any time during the course of the trial, you can change your plea to guilty and conclude the trial. However, good questioning may confuse or discredit the police officer's testimony enough to leave some doubt as to your guilt, and the judge or jury may find you innocent.

If radar clocking is used, and if you do not have clear evidence of your innocence, you will probably be convicted of speeding. But if you are convinced you are not guilty, and you can speak convincingly, it is quite possible for you to win at trial.

If you lose the case, the judge or jury cannot retaliate and impose a harsher sentence on you than is already mandated by the law. Although convicted of speeding, the judge or jury often use discretion and may reduce your fine.

Hopefully I have clarified various aspects of how our court system works. People often do not understand all the serious implications of having a speeding conviction on their driving record.

Remember, if you get a speeding ticket, the couple of hours you spend and the few dollars you invest in researching, negotiating, and adjudicating your speeding charge may save your driver's license, prevent an exorbitant increase in your insurance premium, and save you some extra money that would have been spent on fines. Most importantly, I hope you realize that you, as an individual, can effectively work within the established court system to reduce your speeding ticket.

Bar Biz...

Rasputin's is a smaller bar owned by a man with different business attitudes. The reason for the Last Chance Saloon's success can be summed up by one word – consistency. Owner Landry described his steady business, "The high points aren't overwhelming; our low points aren't devastating."

Landry believes that every bar owner should expect a seven day week of hard work to keep on top of the bookwork, cost controls, and personnel.

The bar's strict rules include pouring drinks with a shot glass. This technique fills drinks faster than automatic pourers, but depends on his trusting the employees. Workers and supervisors must almost inherit jobs.

What Ales You, a bar owned in conjunction with What's Your Beef by Jay Robinson and Ed Loeffler, also has a tight staff. Here, crew and customers interact. Jeff Parker, bar manager, says, "The employees get to know the customers well. They can have a good time together. Other bars can be impersonal."

The familiar clientele is mostly Greeks and upperclassmen continuing a trend started in 1973. Parker says, "We love to have freshmen and sophomores, they can grow into the place."

Frank Finnegan, owner of Finnegan's Pub, relies on his "large local following" for much of his business. Nevertheless, his new location in the hub area draws many college students who like the pub atmosphere and good specials.

Owners Jack Dowd, Dennis Lessard, and Chris Chisholm are trying out the Urban Cowboy image with Texas, using the fad concept to get their business started. If this bar follows the same trend as the previous two bars at this location, it won't be open in 1983.

But one of the owners, who wished to remain anonymous, sounded optimistic. "Harold J's was a disco; disco died. Charisma was acid-rock; that mellowed. Vermont has a down-home feeling, like Texas. This feeling won't die." Another interesting note is that Dowd, Lessard, and Chisholm are the first new owners since the Red-dog, which was open back in the early 70's.

Public Arts Group Seeks Funds For Theatre

By Grove Potter

"We have to work for every dollar that we get," said Andrea Rogers, project coordinator for the Flynn Theatre for the Performing Arts, Ltd. (FTPA).

This may be so, but their job could be much more difficult if their commodity was not as attractive as it is. This non-profit organization, spawned by the Lyric Theatre amateur drama group, is committed to raising, by June 1st, the $420,000 needed to buy the glamorous downtown Flynn Theatre and make necessary repairs.

The opportunity to buy the 1,452 seat theatre, built in 1930 as a combination vaudeville and movie house, arose when the present owner, Merrill Jarvis, offered the Lyric Theatre group an opportunity to negotiate a purchase and sales agreement last summer. Jarvis, who owns all of the indoor movie theatres in Burlington except the Cinema 1 & 2, turned down bids from other speculators because he "thought they, the Lyric Theatre, were the ones who should own it locally. They will preserve it and restore it to its original grandeur."

Jarvis has run the Flynn primarily as a movie house since buying it in 1972, but says the Art Deco theatre "is too huge to run as a motion picture theatre... You want to cry when you see 72 people in the Flynn. They look lonely in there."

With the number of performing arts groups in and traveling through Burlington growing with the cultural audience here, FTPA feels the development of a specific performing arts hall would be a big plus for the city. In the past, acts other than Lyric Theatre have had difficulties booking the Flynn, but FTPA hopes to organize the scheduling problems by running a "first come, first serve" booking arrangement.

The availability of a middle-sized theatre with a sloping floor, cushioned seats, and insulation from outside noise as an alternative to Memorial Auditorium would enhance the enjoyment of performances and possibly stimulate increased cultural activity, FTPA feels.

And cultural activity is good for all kinds of businesses. Merchants, restaurants, bars, hotels, and motels would all reap some benefits from more arts in the downtown area. "In its first year of operation, the theatre would add over $800,000 to the local economy simply through its own operations, not to mention the millions theatre goers would spend in related dining, drinking, and shopping activities," FTPA predicts.

But beneath the cultural and economic benefits, many theatre goers believe the Flynn is worth saving for aesthetic reasons. Although it was built during the second year of the depression, structural soundness and lavish embellishments make the Flynn an attraction in itself.

From its elaborate marquee on Main St., under the rose marble panels over the doors, past the "classically detailed Colonial Revival ticket booth" in the lobby, through the elegant foyer, and into the huge seating area where brass grills that once housed pipes for a Wurlitzer organ frame the proscenium arch, the glamour of the Flynn captivates visitors. Cast your mind back to your grade school days and having to do what then seemed like so much homework. You had to read. The thought of it made you wince, especially when you opened the book and there was only one picture every few pages. Well, the Vermont Cynic, along with many other newspapers, has the same problem. For some reason no one likes to read the pages and pages of "grey copy" as it's known. The first thing they head for is the pictures, and more particularly, the "funnies."

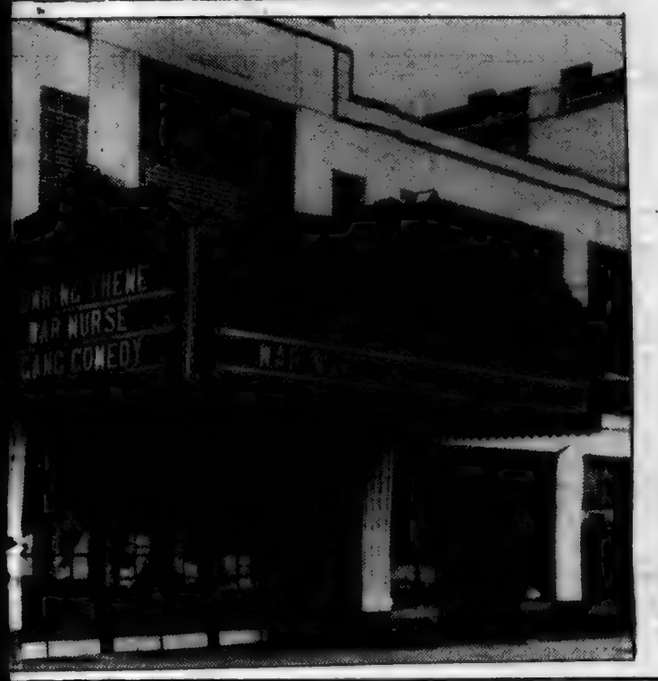
And why not? In a world where the only news is usually bad news, we often need relief. Whether it comes from simply looking at a picture on the front page, or examining the artistic content of a "gallery," the reader inevitably wants a quick glance at what's going on. After all, as a popular film manufacturer tells us every day, "a picture is worth a thousand words."

It is into this world that Matt Surico and Kevin Coburn find themselves projected. They are the Cynic's very own merry-makers, and as Muhammed Ali would say, "more power to 'em." They can say as much in one cartoon as the rest of the Cynic staff put together can say in a whole issue, and they can do it in a fraction of the time.



Coburn and Surico, who both started drawing cartoons for the Cynic this year, represent two different fields of play. Coburn spends his time pulling punches at the powers that be in politics, and Surico takes a lighter look at life on the UVM campus. Yet for that matter, it could be any campus in the world. We are all too aware that the student at UVM faces the same problems as an undergrad at UCLA, Dartmouth, NYU, or the local Community College, and for Surico, a native of Long Island, it is this common ground that all college students trod that gives his "Theo" such wide appeal.

"I learned to draw from Schultz," said Surico recently, attributing both his humor and his caricatures to the creator of "Good 'ole Charlie Brown," and "Peanuts." Yet Surico doesn't think he has much of a sense of humor, and says that most of his characters are "based on people in my dorm." For Surico, life itself is obviously the joke that provides the humorous twist to his work.

tions in modern theatres, the details of the older Flynn create an elegant atmosphere.

FTPA has a four phase restoration plan that extends into the indefinite future. Phase one includes purchasing the theatre and making immediate roof, electrical, and plumbing repairs. Below stage construction of a two-level area with shower rooms, chorus rooms, and dressing rooms; modernization of mechanical and ventilation systems; replacement of theatrical equipment including lighting, rigging, and sound devices, and a temporary thrust stage make up phase two. Phases three and four would be addressed as funds became available. General refurbishment, new seats, a permanent thrust stage, and building modifications are part of these plans.

FTPA sees no conflict between their goals and the plans for a new Burlington Civic Center. They feel these two facilities would serve different functions.

To raise money, FTPA is tapping businesses and the private sector. Rogers says that the drive is going well but continued enthusiasm is vital if the project is to be a success. The titles "Angel of the Flynn" ($50,000), "Honorary Producer" ($20,000), "Honorary Director" ($10,000), and "Benefactor" ($5,000) are awarded to established philanthropists. Your name will be put on a seat for a $750 donation. Perhaps more relevant to culturally aware students is the "Friend of the Flynn" option for $10. Whatever the donation, Rogers says, "everybody counts in this."

anyway. And Surico can really get stumped sometimes. "Sometimes you get a slew of ideas," he says, but then other times are dry. Nevertheless, they come up with something.

Kevin Coburn, a senior majoring in History, has never had his work published before, although it is not his only artistic outlet. He is a member of the Commercial Arts Suite in the Living/Learning Center, engaged in such work as poster drawing and graphic arts. He says that his cartoons are "nothing serious" in the way of future work, at least not at this point.

For freshman Matt Surico, the same holds true. Drawing is his outlet, but not his professional goal. "It's more of a hobby," he says, while his main concentration at UVM is getting through the pre-med regimen, which is something his parents have always cautioned him about. He does like to draw more serious work, admitting that when he draws, he "goes into his own world."

Strange, isn't it, that the two people who give the Cynic a humorist's touch will probably cease to create comics in a few years? Ironic also, that the life about which they so delicately stab at with their tiny ink pens, and which is so 'serious' and 'complex', will be the governor of their lives when they graduate. One would hope that they will carry their humor with them when they go. But then again, that would put all our future cartoonists out of work.

The idea of a model is not quite the same for Coburn as it is for Surico. While Coburn admires the more famous political cartoonists like Oliphant and Trudeau, he says that he strives for individuality. Matt Surico is influenced in his drawing by Shultz' work and one sees the caricatures of Peanuts in Theo. One sees no other real influence on Coburn. There are only a certain amount of ways that one can comically draw Ronald Reagan and his cohorts, so obviously Coburn's scope is limited.

Having to come up with something to laugh at every week is not as easy a task as it may seem. Coburn scans the papers for ideas, although he says that he reads the papers

Barry Cutlass...

Read Between The Lines

By Sonny Valentine

Even with his dark sunglasses on, our hero, Barry Cutlass, squints to read a Sherlock Holmes book while sitting on the white beach in Acapulco. Vacationing with his secretary, Missy Featherdress, the danger and intrigue of his regular escapades are far from his mind.

Cutlass looks up from the page to gaze at the blue sea that swirls around his feet, and notices three official looking men struggling towards him, their black leather shoes filling with sand.

"I knew this peace and quiet was too good to last," Cutlass mumbles.

"What did you say, Barry?" Featherdress asks, looking up from her fashion magazine.

"Looks like our vacation may be preempted a bit, honey."

"...you will be richly rewarded for your efforts. The task deals with cocaine smuggling."

The three men arrive panting. The shortest man inquires:

"Senor Cutlass I presume?"

"That's correct. What can I do for you?"

"My name is Juan Bolez. I am the chief of police here. We have heard about your skills and I am here to request your help."

"I'm on vacation. I'm sorry I can not oblige you."

"Please, Senor Cutlass, the work will not be time consuming, and you will be richly rewarded for your efforts. The task deals with cocaine smuggling," Bolez pleads.

"Well I'm almost through with this book and I might have some time tomorrow. What's the problem?" Cutlass reconsiders.

Bolez tells Cutlass about an elderly librarian who they suspect is the primary cocaine exporter in the resort city. The police have had him under surveillance for many months, but Senor Vulpina, the librarian, is very crafty and remains elusive.

"We hope that you, Sr. Cutlass, as a foreigner, can investigate Sr. Vulpina without arousing his suspicions," Bolez says.

"I'll see what I can do for you, Sr. Bolez," Cutlass says absent-mindedly, his mind already busily working on the case.

The next day, Cutlass and Featherdress enter Vulpina's library acting like any tourists. Cutlass approaches the small man behind a large desk and begins:

"Senor, I am very interested in the writings of Luis Borges. Can you direct me to his works?"

"Ah, yes my friend. I am also very fond of the work of Sr. Borges. Come right this way," the grey-haired man says as he leads Cutlass through dark corridors of dusty books.

"Here you are. You may borrow as many as you wish."

Cutlass peruses one of the books while the elderly gentleman makes his way back to his desk. At the desk, the librarian asks Featherdress, "Do you read much, Senora?"

"Oh, yes I do. But I am not familiar with any Spanish authors."

The old man informs the pretty woman that many people enjoy authors who write in Spanish, and continues:

"I can tell that you are Americans by your accents and dress. Where do you live in the U.S.?"

Featherdress tells the librarian and he exclaims, "Ah ha! I have a very close friend at the university in that town. He and I exchange books. In fact, I have one to send to him right here. Would you mind taking it to him? The books sometimes get damaged in the mail."

Featherdress naively agrees to take the book for the friendly man.

"Here, please be very gentle with it. It is very old and delicate," the librarian warns.

Cutlass emerges from the stacks with a small book in hand.

"I would like to borrow this one, Senor."

"My friend, you may have it as my gift. Your wife is doing me a big favor, and it is the least I can do."

"Thank you very much my friend. May I ask your name?" Cutlass inquires as they are leaving.

"I am Henrique Vulpina. Please return often," he says with a wave.

As they walk through the warm city, Cutlass asks, "Well, did he give you a book, Missy?"

"Yes, Barry, it's in my bag. I can't believe that nice little man is a drug smuggler. How did you know he was going to do that?" the slightly tanned Featherdress asks.

"When Bolez described the librarian and his operations to me, I knew that he had to be working with tourists. They are the only people not scrutinized by the local police."

"Yes, but so what?" Featherdress continues.

"When we get back to the hotel, we'll take a look at that book Vulpina gave you. I'm sure that the pages are cut out and a package of cocaine is snugly wrapped inside."

"Oh Barry, what are we going to do?!?" Featherdress panics.

"Nothing my dear. We're going to go back to the beach and read our books. In fact, we're going to read between the lines, if you know what I mean, my dear."

Women's Ice Hockey Ends On Moral Upswing

By Ceally Anderson

The ice may have melted from the Gutterson rink, and the echoes of rebounding pucks faded to those of tennis balls, but the spirit which holds the Women's Ice Hockey team together remains as strong as ever. The annual awards banquet held Friday gave the players and coaches a chance to reflect on the season not as a parade of games and scores, but as a series of shared experiences that shaped distinct individuals into the cohesive, spirited group which wore the UVM uniforms out on the ice.

Five members of the team were recognized by their coaches for outstanding efforts throughout the season. Katie Dunbar received the Barb Bates award for sportsmanship; Junior team captain Mary Glowka was named the Most Valuable Player, and President Alix Manny was honored as the player making the greatest overall contribution to the team.

Recipient of the "110 percent" award for outstanding effort on the ice was Bonnie Daley, and trainer Lauren Elliot was named "Greatest Outside Asset" contributing to the team during the season.

Seniors M. A. Patch, Katie Dunbar, Quila Burr, Ellen Gray and Kim Dunkley will graduate, leaving a large gap in next year's roster. Though absent from the ceremony due to overseas study, first semester Captain Sarah Dougherty was remembered for her leadership and organization which enabled the team to begin what ended as a rewarding 7-9 season.

Reflecting on the progress of the team, Coach Tom Halpin stated: "Never having coached a team before, I didn't expect the job to be without obstacles and difficulties. While problems did arise, the rewards far outweighed any apprehensions that I had. It was very satisfying to work with a group of people, watch them come together as a team and play a better brand of hockey than even they had hoped for."

The three coaches, Halpin, Bill Roberts and Ted Cremer, voluntarily organized the daily practices, travelled to the contests played at other colleges and are now helping to arrange the schedule and budget for next season. According to Roberts: "It was gratifying to see the girls make a sincere contribution to a unified effort. I'm looking forward to starting next year with the same commitment and enthusiasm that we have now, at the end of this season."

The players expressed their thanks for the great contribution of the coaches by a presentation at the ceremony. The enthusiasm of the players, coaches, trainer and fans all contributed to the vast improvement in skill and high degree of team spirit developed by the end of the season.

Utah Tops UVM Skiers In NCAA Meet

By Lon Brettell

The University of Vermont's men's ski team won three of the four events in the N.C.A.A. ski championships at Park City, Utah, but came up just short of winning its second straight national title.

Vermont jumped off to a three point lead over Utah after the first day's event, the giant slalom. UVM's Tor Melander placed first with a time of 2:08.41. Scott Hoffman of Utah finished in second position with a combined time of 2:08.56 and John Teague of Vermont was third with a time of 2:08.81. John Morrissey of Middlebury placed fourth. He was followed by Seth Bayer of Colorado, Al Innamorati and Bjorn Gefle of Utah, and Pete Murphy, Chris Mikell and Dave Bean, also of Vermont.

Vermont used superior depth and talent to overcome a misjudgment in the weather and increased its lead to five points with the 15 kilometer cross-country event.

Utah's Bernt Lund finished in first, and Trond Solvang finished second for Montana State. Pentti Joronen of Northern Michigan and Egil Nelson of Colorado finished third and fourth, just ahead of Vermont's Pal Sjulstad and Jon Zdechlic. Todd Kempainen finished eighth and Rick Solie finished tenth for Vermont.

The event which both Utah and Vermont claimed to be their strongest proved to be costly for the Catamount skiers. Vermont lost two skiers on the first run of the slalom held Friday.

In a soft slushy course that favored the western skiers, Utah took a decisive victory with Scott Hoffman and Mark Halvorsson taking the first two positions, and teammate Per Nicolaisen finishing tenth. Vermont's finishers were Melander in seventh place, Teague in twelfth and Mikell in fifteenth. Vermont finished the slalom in fourth place, 20 points behind Utah.

After three events, Utah had taken a 15 point lead over Vermont and only had to place second in the 3x7.5 kilometer relay race to assure its first N.C.A.A. ski championship.

UVM's Zdechlik ran the first leg of the cross-country relay and opened up more than a one-minute lead over second place Utah and third place Colorado. Zdechlik tagged Vermont's second runner, Kempainen, who handed Sjulstad a five second lead over Utah's Bernt Lund.

Entering the final leg, Sjulstad came across the finish line 13 seconds ahead of the Utah runner. Utah's second place finish gave them the national championship with Vermont finishing second.

Vermont's head coach Chip LaCasse is already thinking of better things for next year, knowing it won't take much more than this year's team to win the N.C.A.A.'s.

Tor Melander and John Teague were named as first team All-Americans from the alpine team. Pal Sjulstad, Jon Zdechlic and Todd Kempainen were all named to the first team for cross-country events. Rick Solie was named to the second team for cross-country events.

Judi St. Hilaire: Star Of Lady Runners

By Vicki Johnson

I have to admit the first time I met nationally ranked, long distance runner Judi St Hilaire, I was pleasantly surprised. I had just interviewed Coach Kusiak, and it had been the standard "how-do-you-see-the-team's-prospects" type of discussion. What I really wanted was a few words with St. Hilaire, the best runner on the team. I met this woman that afternoon, and in doing so, met one of the most exceptional and reserved athletes at UVM.

In fact, the first time I talked to her she asked me to downplay herself and focus on the freshmen. "It will build their confidence to see their names in print."

Judi was not always as confident as she is today. As a freshman at the nationals, she could not break a five-minute time in the mile trials. "I wondered what I was doing here and totally broke down in front of Coach Kusiak." This year smiles replaced the tears of long ago as Judi finished fourth in the 3000 running event. Judi's constant training (13 miles a day) and perseverence have paid off. A great many of the fans at meets come just to see Judi run.

University of Vermont was not Judi's first choice. Unfortunately as a senior in high School, Judi was unable to break A five-minute mile, a prerequisite that prevented her from attending North Carolina State and Colorado State, two universities that draw exceptional runners. UVM was the only school that offered her a scholarship. Coach Kusiak realized her potential from the start, since few Vermont high school girls can run a mile in 5:07.

So Judi came to UVM and finally, as a freshman, ran a 4:57 mile. "That was the turning point in my running career, then as a Sophomore I began road racing." It was during these long races that Judi realized she had the potential to be a great marathoner. "I can run at the same pace forever."

When asked which year of the four she liked best, Judi stated flatly: "This year has been by far the most enjoyable. As a freshman I found the team full of cliques. Also the team was composed of mainly short distance runners. Now the team predominantly focuses on the distance events."

Judi will be heading for Bermuda on spring break with teammate Anne Schiavone to run in a 10 kilometer race. Then the pair will head to Cape Cod to run in the Falmouth Races. Next year Judi will be living in Boston where she will continue to train with the Liberty Track Club under Coach John Babington. Over the past four years, Boston has become a distance runners' haven, with an influx of western runners moving east. Judi feels she needs this competition to improve her running. During this past season she lost only on the national level. "In a race I like to lead from the beginning. It's much easier to maintain my concentration. I suppose if I wasn't winning, I wouldn't be so confident and wouldn't enjoy it as much."

The Los Angeles Olympics are very much on Judi's mind. If the Olympic committee votes to include a 5000, 10,000 or marathon run, Judi will be there. Right now everything is up in the air, but "hopefully they will include the marathon."

Promising Crop To Senior Skaters

For the final time, Sylvaine Turcotte plays goalie for Cats.

By Greg Weimer

With an impressive 9-4 win over Harvard, the University of Vermont Hockey Catamounts ended its disappointing 1981 season with a 4-16-2 record. On a sour note, the team is losing six strong senior skaters; the most notable loss among them will be Craig Homola, who accounted for 19 goals and 27 assists this year. Graduation will also claim the number one and two goalies in Sylvain Turcotte and Andy Ashforth as well as co-captains Mark Brown and Billy Ford. Also graduating is forward Chris Zimmerman. These losses will no doubt hurt the Catamounts, but should not be over-estimated. Leading scorer Kirk McCaskill, who had 28 goals, will only be a junior next year. Three other high scorers, Matt Winnicki, Mark Litton and Tony Messina, were just freshmen this season, and will be returning to add to next season's offensive punch.

The goalie situation is not in as bad a shape as one would think after the loss of the number one and two goalies. Tom Panagoulias, who has not seen any varsity action in his two years at UVM, is very quick and showed he has what it takes to play when he faced the West German team in an exhibition game his freshman year. Another strong contender for the spot is Freshman Tim Camisa who looked good against Middlebury this year. Defensively, the Cats are returning such strong hitters as Bill Kangas, John O'Connor and Yves Robitaille.

Baseball Cats Head South

By Beverley Hall

This season, the University of Vermont baseball team will make its debut south of the Mason-Dixon line. From March 27 through April 5, the team will play 16 games in six different states. They will travel as far south as Virginia to be hosted by the University of Virginia, James Madison University, and the University of Richmond.

The southern trip marks the unique comeback the team has made from a mere club activity to a strong, varsity-level sport. From 1972 to 1977, there was no such thing as a Vermont baseball team. Coach Jack Leggett helped form a club team in 1977, and it had a very short season, playing other Vermont teams only. The next spring, the team regained varsity status for the first time since 1971.

Who Shot J.R. Richard?

By John F. Boitano

The Houston Astros baseball team's fans, players and media alike accused James Rodney Richards (the Astro's starting righthand pitcher) of faking and loafing when he complained of having arm troubles (fatigue) and pains. When J. R. Richards collapsed during a workout at the Astrodome on the morning of July 30, 1980, these same people began to question their insulting accusations. The news that Richards had suffered a severe stroke, which necessitated an immediate operation, quelled a still doubting general public.

Before the stroke, Richards was at a professional athlete's prime. He had never before suffered any major injuries and was enjoying unsurpassed success. In 1978 Richards became the first National League pitcher to strike out over 300 batters in a season with a mark of 303. In 1979 he struck out 313 batters, shattering his previous record. And in 1980, he was enjoying a 10-4 record, 1.89 ERA and already 119 strike-outs. A doubting public, combined with the stroke, could have put his promising professional career to an end.

Richards became the absolute example of martyrdom in professional sports. His teammates, fans and media claimed to know the man better than he himself did. When he complained of troubles, we, the public, deafened our ears to his prophetic cries. A blood clot had been discovered in an artery leading to Richards' right arm, but doctors deemed the blockage stable and advised him to work out under supervision. Thus, with the increased public pressure and reassuring medical advice, Richards went forward by working out, while instinctively realizing that something was wrong.

Richards' natural instincts were proved correct in the near-fatal stroke. Who is to blame for this tragic situation of James Rodney Richards? A public which clearly pushed him too far and beyond his limit, or a system of professional sports which demands crippling sacrifices from its members? Clearly both the public and the system are at fault when their demands, aspirations and edicts result in the near destruction and waste of human potential as in the case of J. R. Richards.

A second operation on Richards has produced the result that he will be able to live a fairly normal life and probably will be able to play professional baseball again as well. If Richards is able to return to the world of professional baseball, how will we treat him? Will we still insist on knowing his physical and psychological capacities better than he himself does? Or, will we treat him as a rational individual who clearly realizes when he's not feeling up to par? Clearly, an individual's well being is more important than the game of professional baseball. For who is better suited to judge an individual's well being than that individual himself?

NL EAST:

Expos Should Grab Crown

By Rich Bateman

Although the Montreal Expos have the best record in the National League over the last two years (185 – 137), neither season resulted in a championship. With Mike Schmidt's 11th inning home run last October 4th came the end of Montreal's season – one game behind the World Champion Philadelphia Phillies. The Expos have done little to improve themselves over the off-season, but management is hoping for a return-to-form of many valuable players.

Because of injury, the combined home run total of Ellis Valentine and Larry Parrish dropped from 55 to 28. In addition, Gold Glove centerfielder Andre Dawson also slipped in power production. With an emphasis on "power and pitching," the home run slack will need to be picked up if Montreal is to win. Tim Wallach, who hit 36 home runs playing for Denver (American Association), could help in the power department. He and 21-year-old Tim Raines are the Expo's best rookie prospects for 1981.

Another player who will be counted on heavily is catcher Gary Carter. Carter is gradually earning acceptance as the best all-around catcher in the National League and has had two consecutive productive seasons. He led all major league catchers in 1980 with 29 home runs and 101 RBI's. He'll have the task of handling a pitching staff that includes Steve Rogers and Scott Sanderson, both 16-game winners, Bill Gullickson (10 wins as a rookie), Bill Lee and David Palmer. Like many other teams, Montreal's success depends upon the pitching staff. The starters are set, but the relief corps is questionable. Woodie Fryman was last year's savior (17 saves and 2.25 ERA), but at the age of 41, he is questionable and while Elias Sosa had a respectable year (9 wins, 9 saves and 3.10 ERA), he was not a "stopper."

The Expos desperately needed another right-handed and left-handed reliever, and came back from the winter meetings with lefty Rich Wortham. He could be used either as a starter or a reliever. If Montreal can make do with the staff it has and its run production is again high, look for them at the top in October.

While the Expos are faced with the challenge of finally winning the divisional title, 1981 offers the Philadelphia Phillies an even greater one: successfully defending their world title. The Pirates couldn't do it in 1980, nor could the Yankees the proceeding year. After a successful yet controversial season under manager Dallas Green, the internal strife will again play a major role in the success of the team.

The Phils are solid and will pose the biggest threat to Montreal. Consistent players such as Mike Schmidt (The NL MVP with 48 home runs), Bake McBride (.309 avg.), Pete Rose and Manny Trillo teamed with pitchers Steve Carlton, the National League's Cy Young award winner at 24-9, and Tug McGraw (5-1 record with 13 saves and 0.52 ERA after July 17) form the heart of the Phillies.

Besides Carlton, the workhorse of the Phils' pitching staff, the starting rotation consists of Dick Ruthven (17-10 last season), Bob Walk, Marty Bystrom and Larry Christenson. With Tug McGraw and Sparky Lyle, the Phillies have excellent short relief. Dickie Noles, Ron Reed and Warren Brusstar will handle middle relief work. Nino Espinosa, still coming off a shoulder injury sustained in 1979, remains a question mark.

The dark horse of the pennant race may be the St. Louis Cardinals, although Manager–General Manager Whitey Herzog may have made one too many deals. In a busy week of trading, 13 Cardinals changed uniforms and nine new players came in. If not for Herzog's last deal, which may preclude the Cards as serious contenders, St. Louis could have been the pre-season favorite to win the NL pennant.

Following the signing of free-agent Darrell Porter and shortly before the end of the winter meetings, Herzog engineered a deal that sent Rollie Fingers (acquired in an earlier deal with San Diego), Pete Vukovich and All-Star catcher Ted Simmons to the Milwaukee Brewers in exchange for Lary Sorensen, Sixto Lezcano and two rookie pitchers. The public strongly criticized Herzog for this deal. Last season's fourth place finish was attributed to the Cardinals' poor pitching staff. As a team, St. Louis ranked last in pitching (3.93 ERA), but first in hitting (.275 avg.) in the National League.

The St. Louis rotation in 1981 will include Bob Forsch, Bob Shirley (acquired from San Diego), Sorensen and rookie Andy Rincon. All (excluding Rincon) had mediocre seasons last year and are counted on to rebound. Silvio Martinez and Mark Littell, both bothered by injury, could improve the staff if they can regain their form. As far as relief pitching is concerned, St. Louis is stronger than last season, but maybe not strong enough.

A long shot in the competitive NL East is the Pittsburgh Pirates. The World Champions of two seasons ago, the 1981 team is surrounded by "ifs." The Pirates virtually fell apart and dropped from contention last season due to numerous injuries. Even Pittsburgh's optimistic manager Chuck Tanner realizes that there are doubts, but he also knows that if his pitching staff can stay healthy, he'll have another contender. Outside of 19-game winner Jim Bibby, the remaining three men in the rotation – John

Candelaria, Don Robinson and Rick Rhoden – won only 24 games combined. All suffered through injury-plagued seasons. Of the three, Rhoden showed the most improvement last September and predicts he can win between 15 and 20 games this season. Bob Owchinko (acquired from Cleveland), Rod Scurry, Eddie Solomon and rookie Pascual Perez will compete for the starting spot vacated by the traded Bert Blyleven.

The bullpen was not as effective in 1980 as it has been in past years partly due to an off-year by Kent Tekulve, the ace of the Pirates relief staff. Tekulve has a loss of concentration and lost his last seven decisions. If he can turn around, the relief corps will have adequate depth with Enrique Romo, Grant Jackson and Victor Cruz (acquired in the Blyleven deal).

The New York Mets will probably battle the Chicago Cubs for the cellar position, but should end in fifth place. There is realistically no hope for a higher finish. Manager Joe Torre is a good leader, but he simply lacks the talent to produce a contender. Last season, the Mets finished last in the majors in home runs as they did not even have one player that hit 20 or more; only two teams, Chicago and St. Louis, had worse pitching and despite one hot streak, they finished with only 67 wins.

An attempt to sign free-agent Dave Wingfield failed and it looked as if the Mets would not have a power hitter again this year, but recently Dave Kingman was reacquired from the Cubs. Oddly enough, only the lowly Cubs salvaged New York from a fourth consecutive last-place finish in 1980. With the likes of Montreal, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and St. Louis in the same division, the acquisition of Kingman will not make a big difference for the Mets in the standings.

Future is the key word because it'll be some time before the Mets become contenders. The Chicago Cubs are in the same position and will face hard times in 1981.

The off-season trading period has hurt the Cubs more than it has helped. Chicago acquired Ken Reitz, Leon Durham, Joe Strain and Steve Henderson, but more importantly, they lost their second best hitter in Mike Vail, their top home run hitter in Jerry Martin, their best power hitter (when he's healthy) in Dave Kingman and baseball's best reliever in Bruce Sutter. If it had not been for Sutter, the Cubs may have lost 28 more games.

At the moment, it looks as if Buckner, the league's best hitter last season at .324, will play first and 29-year-old Ken Reitz (acquired from St. Louis) will take over third base. With an improved Ivan DeJesus at shortstop and Strain (acquired from San Francisco) at second, the infield is sound defensively. The outfield on the other hand is questionable.

1981 should prove to be an exciting year in the NL East with only the New York Mets and Chicago Cubs excluded from the race. Because of Philadelphia's and Pittsburgh's lack of improvement and St. Louis' lack of steady pitching, Montreal should finally come through and win the title. It'll be an interesting race which probably won't be decided until late September.

Predicted order of finish

1. Montreal
2. Philadelphia
3. St. Louis
4. Pittsburgh
5. New York
6. Chicago

Lady Gymnasts End Outstanding Season

By Karen Jareckie

The women's gymnastic team had a very successful year, with a final record of 10-3. The Vermont team is in Division II while the three teams the team lost to, Northeastern, Brown and URI, are all Division I schools. The Cats put up their best fight against these Division I schools, with their highest score, 115.15, against Brown.

There was much improvement through the season. Early in the season routines were somewhat choppy. By the end of the season, the girls had more challenge in their routines, and the acts flowed together. The team scores throughout the season were proof of this improvement. Scores went up from 101.45 to 115.15.

On Saturday, March 7, the Gymnastics team hosted an invitational with the University of Bridgeport, University of Connecticut, Long Island University and Dartmouth College. Vermont placed first over all the teams with a score of 112.8. Individuals on the UVM squad also did extremely well; Vermont swept first and second places in most events.

Two of the Vermont gymnasts have qualified for the EAIAW Regionals at Slippery Rock College in Penn. on March 21 and 22. They are Lisa Reitzas and Maureen Conger.

Coach Debbie Dunkley would like to commend the team individually. Co-Captain Nancy Kane was very consistent in her beam routine, and the team could always depend on her scores. Amy Stark had the highest average for the season on the vault – 7.92. Peg Griffith increased her beam score by 1.7 points during the season.

THEATRE

Broken Glass

By Mark J. Cadigan

"You live in a dream; you manufacture illusions!"

—Amanda, speaking to her son, Tom in Tennessee Williams' The Glass Menagerie

The manufacture and maintenance of illusions is the crux of The Glass Menagerie. Each of the three Wingfields exists within a self-made dreamworld, and the fourth (the father) exists only as a grinning photograph on the living room wall. As his wife Amanda describes him, he is "a telephone man who — fell in love with long-distance!"

The absence of Mr. Wingfield profoundly affects his family: Amanda regresses into her Southern past and "seventeen gentlemen callers" in one day; Laura, her crippled daughter, retreats to her father's worn records and her glass menagerie until "she is like a piece of her own glass collection, too exquisitely fragile to move from the shelf;" Tom, who yearns to be a poet, suffers through a warehouse job to pay the family's bills.

I see the lives of the three remaining Wingfields symbolized in the candelabrum (with three candles) used in the latter part of the play. Amanda says that it "was melted a little out of shape when the church burnt down," just as this family was permanently altered when Mr. Wingfield abandoned them. When Laura blows out the candles in the last scene, this gesture is the same as kissing their flickering existences goodbye.

A candle burns brightest just before it goes out, and the same is true of this distraught family. Their lives reach an emotional peak when Tom invites his friend Jim home. Amanda turns on her Southern hospitality, Tom even seems hopeful, and Laura thinks a man is genuinely interested in her. Their optimism crumbles when Jim reveals his engagement to another girl. One by one, their illusions are slowly extinguished.

Tom describes Jim as "the most realistic character in the play, being an emissary from a world of reality that we were somehow set apart from. But since I have a poet's weakness for symbols, I am using this character also as a symbol; he is the long-delayed but always expected something that we live for." As such, Jim's role is pivotal in the plot — his presence evokes the climax as quickly as his words help to bring about the inevitable solution.

Amanda in a rare somber mood

Connell McGrath was a believable Jim. Although his portrayal of childlike enthusiasm and inflated self-pride was a bit corny at times, he brought life to the character with fluid energy and an easy-going stage presence. Mark Nash, as Tom, didn't share that comfort on stage, and he seemed stiff in contrast to McGrath. Some of his lines were spoken too fast, overemphasizing their narrative aspect, and he didn't always inject his words with the vitality necessary to bring out their full meaning. Tennessee Williams said that since Tom has to "escape from a trap, he has to act without pity." In this context, Nash physically expressed Tom well — never smiling and acting with a bitter sarcasm that you could feel throughout the theatre.

Lydia Snow's subdued Laura was the perfect complement to the outgoing natures of Tom and Jim. Since she had only a few lines to speak, she needed to rely primarily on gestures to portray her inner character. Snow handled this skillfully as she recreated Laura's timidity. When questioned by Amanda about dropping out of a typing class, Laura twitched noticeably enough to convey her nervousness, yet not so much as to be farcical.

Also, Snow's handling of her glass animals and figures was particularly effective. She cleaned them with the utmost care and precision in one scene, and clutched them as if her life depended on it in a later scene (when Amanda and Tom were furiously arguing behind her). Her treatment of the glass menagerie reflected the same extremely careful manner in which she treated herself. Such subtlety was typical of Snow's outstanding performance.

Priscilla Newton Oliver, absent from UVM Theatre since 1938, was also outstanding in her role as Amanda. In fact, her radiant nature and genuine ease on stage made her the focal point of the production. She turned Amanda's Southern charm on and off with the same nonchalance as flicking a light switch.

Williams writes of Amanda: "Certainly she has endurance and a kind of heroism, and though her foolishness makes her unwittingly cruel at times, there is tenderness in her slight person." I was definitely convinced of her tenderness, but Oliver's overwhelming charm glossed over any cruelty in Amanda. Whether due to Edward Feidner's directing or Oliver's acting, Amanda did not come across as a multi-dimensional woman, at least not to the degree that I think Williams intended.

The directing of Feidner and scenery/lighting of W. M. Schenk added to the depth of the play. In particular, the latter's lighting was very effective — intermingling soft blues, purples, and reds with an occasional harsh white spot. The fusion of professional and student talent, always present at Royall Tyler Theatre, involved the audience with the power of illusion in Tennessee Williams' The Glass Menagerie.

Cover Personifies "A Race of Strength"

By Paula Paye

Jennifer Cover dramatically portrayed Black Heritage through her vibrant interpretation of the poetry and music of Black artists and slaves in her one-woman show "Still I Rise!" Her incredible talent and versatility were evident from the moment she walked on stage.

Cover brought the audience back through history to the deep South with her characterization of an elderly slave. Clothed in an orange print dress, green smock, and orange turban, she walked comically around the stage and greeted the audience like they were old friends. Using a Southern slave dialect and excellent facial and bodily expressions, she described the antics of the white people at "The Party:" "Everything was rich and prime... we just had one scrumptious time!"

The changing emotions involved in young love were illustrated in "Encouragement." A young woman greeted her beau at the door, in anxious anticipation of a marriage proposal. Her charm turned to frustration when he didn't cooperate, and she urged him to "speak up Ike, and 'spress yourself!" After much cajoling and defiant persuasion, Ike finally responded.

The next two segments flowed naturally in sequence, depicting the transition from marriage to motherhood. "Little Brown Baby" was a gentle, playful portrayal of a mother with her young son. A note of sadness foreshadowed the tone for the rest of the performance: "I wish you could always know ease and clear skies... could always stay a child at my breast."

In 'W'en Dey 'Listed Colored Soldiers," Cover poignantly expressed the fear and pride of a mother sending her son off to war. This portion of the show was certainly a tribute to her proficiency as a performer. When the character learned of her son's death, her change of emotion was believable and complete.

At this point, Cover left the stage, and her husband, Wardell Payne, sang a sorrowful spiritual from backstage. His deep, resonant voice and piano accompaniment, along with Robbie Greenberg's subtle lighting changes, supplemented the actress' performance throughout the presentation.

Cover returned to the stage wearing only the print dress, which allowed her greater freedom of movement. Her stylish appearance reflected the updated focus of the rest of the show.

The feelings of contemporary Blacks were expressed in the title piece, "Still I Rise!" In a strong, triumphant voice, Cover proclaimed their powerful ability to overcome oppression and adversity: "You may kill me with your hatefulness, but still, like air, I rise."

These sentiments were also presented in "Dream Variation," "Heritage," and "The Negro Speaks of Rivers," which blended to reflect native African culture. Cover used free-flowing dance movements and song-like rhythms to accentuate the vitality of this poetry.

Photos by Heidi Racht

"For My People," the most powerful piece in the show, was a dedication to the fortitude of the Black race — an appeal to recognize and rejoice in their cultural heritage: "Let a race of strength now rise and take control."

In contrast to this optimism, there was a cynicism concerning a discrepancy in White/Black relations: "What I don't understand about my new beauty is why it's not reflected in your eyes."

It's unfortunate that this was Jennifer Cover's last performance at Royall Tyler Theatre; her energy and talent will certainly be missed. Hopefully, she will be able to share her gifts with others when she and her husband move to Washington in June.

"Still I Rise" was presented by the UVM Center for Cultural Pluralism and the UVM Theatre Department. All proceeds from the show will go into a fund for the Ossie Davis/Rudy Dee Award, presented annually to the outstanding performance of Black Theatre.

RTT Stained Glass:
A Web of Theatrical History

By Sophy Chaffee

The dedication of the Wilnetta Sproul Taggart Memorial last Wednesday, March 11, revealed the intertwining facts which bind the Booth family, Mrs. Taggart, and Mrs. Pricilla Newton Oliver in a web of American and Vermont theatrical history. The memorial itself is a stained glass window bearing the coat of arms of the Booth family, one of the greatest of theatrical families. Mrs. Taggart, for whom the window is dedicated, was a theatrical dynamo in Burlington from 1932-1954, running The Burlington Theater Club and various UVM productions. Her protege, Mrs. Oliver, from the class of '38, gave a superb performance as Amanda in the University's production of The Glass Menagerie, which opened that same Wednesday night.

Prof. Edward Feidner of the Theater department served both as the coordinating historian for the project and as the focal speaker at the ceremony. In his remarks, he linked the Booth window to Mrs. Taggart by equating the Booth motto ("I will be what I hope") to Mrs. Taggart's dedicated and vivacious spirit: "She was what she hoped to be, and therefore many owe their theatrical experience to her." Also, he noted that the coat of arms, and three boars and a lion (symbolizing courage, determination and intelligence), further bonded the memory of the family and the woman. Later, President Lattie Coor presented Mrs. Oliver with a

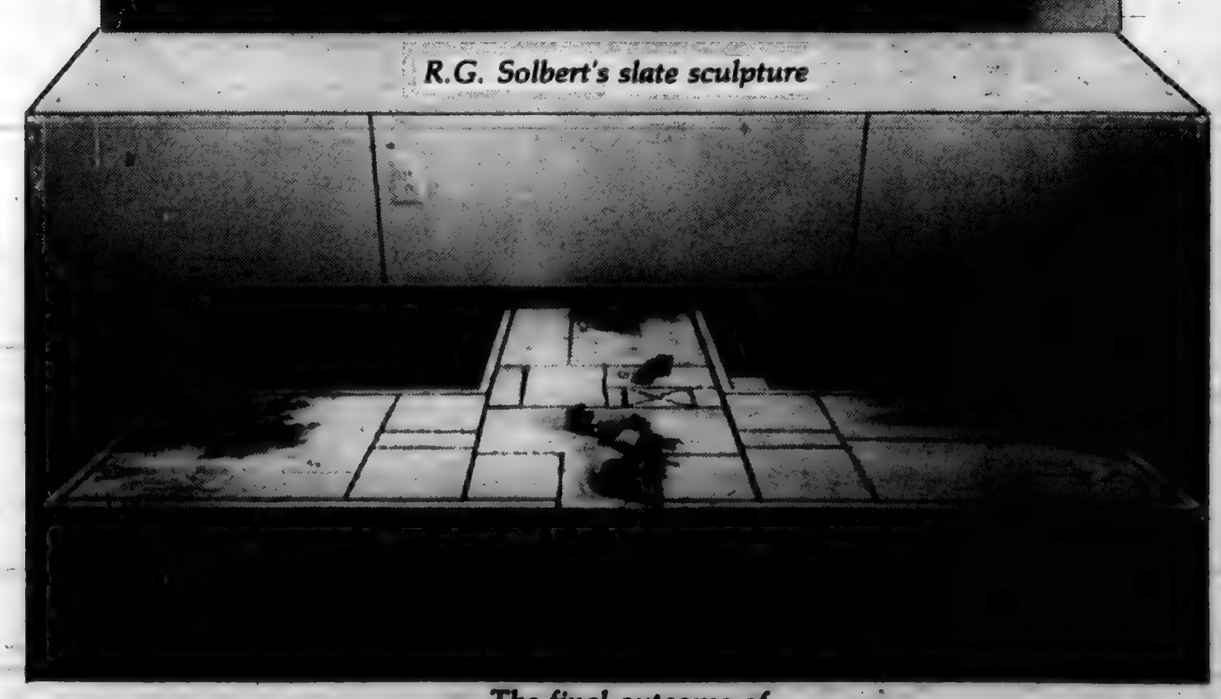
The Booth window was acquired through a series of complicated events beginning with Professor Feidner's purchase of Sydney Barton Booth's records of his yearly earnings. The window was eventually purchased with Mrs. Taggart's fund and a generous gift from Mr. and Mrs. Oliver, and now serves as a memorial and an award.

The theatrical career of Mrs. Taggart was very rich – she directed, managed technically, and acted in productions for The Burlington Theater Club. Most community members regarded her final production of Elizabeth the Queen as her finest, especially in her lead role, which she reportedly created with extreme and inspiring power and motivation. She elevated and enlivened theater in Burlington, for as Prof. Feidner said, "She created for a goodly number in the Burlington community and UVM students a love for the art and discipline of theater. She did whatever she needed for a play to work well."

Her diligence gained the club quite a reputation – so great that Alexander Wolcott, foremost critic of the time, suggested to Thornton Wilder that he should give the club the rights to his new play, Our Town. Wolcott deemed the Vermont production better than the original and assisted the young actress who played Emily with the start of her Broadway career. That actress was Priscilla Newton (Mrs. Oliver).



Wolcott aided her by arranging auditions for various plays on Broadway. She acted in Farm of Three Echoes with Ethel Barrymore and My Sister Eileen. Later she was involved in the U.S.O. tours and performed on Orson Welles' radio show (Mercury Theater), recreating her role as Emily. Mrs. Oliver's sensitive and powerful homecoming performance as Amanda also seems to revive the memory of Mrs. Taggart. Mrs. Taggart's love for the theater and vivacious, but gentle, spirit seem to live on in her protege.

The history and links between the Booths, Mrs. Taggart, and Mrs. Oliver do show, in Prof. Feidner's words, "how young the American Theater is and how close we are to it."

Metheny at UVM: A Musical Learning Experience

Photos by Peter Guyton

By Peter Alcorn

Last Thursday night, Ira Allen Chapel played host to an event that turned into a musical learning experience for all who attended. It was also a reassurance that Pat Metheny has not sold out his musical integrity for "big bucks." The second show opened up with what has become the theme song of the group, "Phase Dance." At that early point, I was a bit concerned about the format of the rest of the show, since so many "successful" artists go on stage merely to get the audience excited enough to go out and buy their albums after the concert. This is not so with The Pat Metheny Group.

After the first familiar tune, Metheny went into a lot of brand new, "experimental" music, most of it still unnamed. The show progressed through such songs as "Offering" (inspired by Ornette Coleman), where Metheny made his guitar sound like a saxophone, and "It's For You," where keyboardist Lyle Mays (and other group members) explored the synthesizer. At that point, people began to notice Brazilian percussionist Nana Vasconcelos, who had been playing background bells up until that time.

Vasconcelos gradually became more prominent onstage. While Metheny was juggling guitars and trying things "weird" and "kinda different," the percussionist was doing some experimenting of his own. By playing a berimbou (a single steel wire on a curved tree branch with a gourd attached to it) with flipping and twisting motions, he created a multitude of exotic effects. Halfway through his unusual solo, the crowd roared its approval, letting Vasconcelos know just how they felt.

It seemed like the only limitations on the band's music were the time they had to play it in; nevertheless, they covered a variety of musical types during the night. Vasconcelos performed on a number of instruments: bells, triangles, cymbals, drums, tortoise shell, thundersheet, torpedo snare, shakers, xylophone, as well as the variations of his voice (chants, whispers, etc.). Nana communicated especially well with drummer Dan Gottlieb, whose lessons with ex-Brubeck drummer Joe Morello have definitely paid off. They exchanged leads, and Gottlieb was constantly switching beats to accommodate the musical craziness surrounding him. The varying rhythms, melodies, and harmonies of The Pat Metheny Group were nothing less than exceptional.

Although bassist Mark Egon is no longer with the band, new bass player Peter Rennier has filled in efficiently. He showed outstanding skill as he bowed and plucked acoustic and electric basses. Keyboardist Lyle Mays also got his licks in, and he has been working closely with Metheny in writing some of their new music. The new material was warmly received, and the audience greatly appreciated the two-and-a-half hours of Metheny Mastery.

When a group such as this becomes the subject of mass attention and caters to such a wide variety of people and tastes, there are bound to be pressures. Those pressures involve producing music that is within the mainstream of what the people, the record companies, and the radio stations want. The group has felt these pressures, particularly with the loss of bassist Mark Egon to Carly Simon's band. Yet, Pat Metheny is not on the bandwagon – he is true to the jazz tradition – the music comes first, then the money.

NRBQ's Hot Tunes at Hunt's

By Jennifer Weiss

"NRBQ! NRBQ!" vibrated through Hunt's this past Monday night. A large crowd was chanting for the New Rhythm and Blues Quartet to start shaking the walls down with their outrageous music... and that they did. The final show of four in two nights (Sunday and Monday) began at 11:40 p.m. with a hot rendition of "Don't She Look Good." The fans left their seats and didn't return throughout the hour-and-ten-minute show.

Composed of four extremely talented men, the band played so hard that they nearly blew the roof off of the building. Al Anderson (Big Al) played a mean guitar and bellowed out the lyrics of NRBQ's rowdy tunes; while Terry Adams fervently pounded away on his keyboards. Adams also sang, and at times enhanced the music with a harmonica. The sounds that Joey Spampinato created with his bass guitar held together the rhythm of every tune, and he joined Al and Terry on vocalizing their wild lyrics. Tom Ardolino – who had never played with a band until he met NRBQ – beat on his drums with every ounce of energy he had. Prior to the show, Terry called Tom's drumming "primitive and amazing!" Also amazing were The Whole Wheat Horns: Don Adams on trombone and Keith Spring on tenor saxophone.

Waterbury, Connecticut (around 1974) was the origin of this versatile band. Since they first pooled their individual talents, NRBQ has released eight albums, each one better and more diversified than the preceding one. After recording with Columbia and Mercury Records, they signed with Red Rooster/Rounder Records, their present label. Their latest album, Tiddlywinks, is another funky masterpiece.

Attempting to classify their music is an impossible feat, since their scores include ballads, rhythm 'n blues, jazz, and rock 'n roll. Al, Terry, and Joey write the group's original lyrics and instrumentation. In addition to their own tunes, the band played their unique versions of Barbra Streisand's "People" and The Chipmunks' "Things We Like To Do."

Everyone seemed to have an excellent time during the concert – dancing, drinking, and just listening to the fantastic music. Terry teased and crooned to the audience while vibrantly pounding his keyboards. At one point in the show, Al held his guitar like a gun and pretended to shoot the audience.

When the band took a break and remained onstage, the crowd begged for more music – which they finally got! Each of the band members had a chance to solo while the others provided background accompaniment. Some of the hits they performed were: the all-time favorite "It Was An Accident," "Ain't No Free," "Shake, Rattle, and Roll" (which everyone did), "Me and the Boys," and some mellower tunes such as "Never Take The Place of You."

The concert ended after a three-song encore, with the final one, "Get Rhythm," as Al's last piece of "advice." NRBQ, after an exhilarating night of hot tunes that kept everyone (including themselves) jumping from start to finish, strutted offstage to cool off and relax. The crowd, hot from all the excitement, walked out into the cold Vermont night – weary, yet thoroughly satisfied.

From Burlington, NRBQ travelled to the University of Massachusetts to reunite with Carl Perkins, a former member. They will release a single featuring Captain Lou Albano (their wrestler/manager) on vocals in about eight to ten weeks. Their next album, described by Al as "more great talent on wax," is expected to go on the market in four or five months. The band calls their music "great!" How right they are!

Dance For Those Who Can't

By Mark Cahill

Danceability made 50's rock so popular, and this week will see its return to Burlington. UVM's Acacia Fraternity will sponsor a benefit performance by Danny and the Juniors at 8:00 p.m., March 20, in MAT Dining Hall, for the Multiple Sclerosis Society.

Danny and the Juniors are a noted 50's rock band from the New Jersey area. Their dance-oriented rock will certainly make for a memorable night, while also benefitting a noble cause.

Proceeds from the dance will go to the Multiple Sclerosis Society, another generous offer in Acadia's fine tradition of public service. These young men are to be commended for their efforts and thanked for showing the positive aspects of fraternity life.

Tickets are on sale at Bailey's Music Store and Upstairs Records. For further information, call 656-2422.

Willie Nelson

By Ed Stearns

Due to the success of such shows as Soundstage and Austin City Limits, regular viewers of Vermont ETV have come to expect the best in musical entertainment. As concert ticket prices continue to rise, more and more people are staying home to see their favorite musicians perform.

This week, Vermont ETV presents one of the most impressive lineups of country musicians in recent memory on "Country Classics: The Best of Austin City Limits." Where else but on public television could you see Willie Nelson, The Charlie Daniels Band, Jimmy Buffet, John Prine, Earl Scruggs and more, all on the same show?

This 90-minute retrospective, produced by station KLRN in Austin, Texas, highlights some of the best country music from the last five years. Willie Nelson performs such hits as "Nightlife" and "Blue Eyes Cryin' in the Rain," and the Charlie Daniels Band performs "Trudy" from one of their first appearances on national television.

Even people who have never considered themselves to be hardcore country music fans will enjoy the wide variety of talented musicians appearing on this show. Other notable performers on this special edition of Austin City Limits include Larry Gatlin and the Gatlin Brothers Band, Chet Atkins, Ray Charles, Merle Haggard, Mel Tillis and The Texas Playboys.

"Country Classics: The Best of Austin City Limits" will appear Thursday, March 19, at 8 p.m. and again on Saturday, March 21, at midnight. So grab yourself a nice cold beer and get ready to enjoy a great evening of country music on Vermont ETV/UHF channel 33 or cable channel 10.

THE VERMONT CYNIC

VOLUME XCIX NUMBER 8 APRIL FOOL'S DAY

Communications Department

Tip Of The Iceberg;

Arts And Sciences To Be Phased Out By 1986

CONFIDENTIAL
PROJECT HARBIZ

By Flannery O'Russell

The Vermont Cynic obtained over 300 pages of "confidential" documents Monday which indicate that the University of Vermont is in the midst of a seven-year plan to phase out its College of Arts and Sciences.

Five reports, authored by UVM Vice President for Academic Affairs Robert Arns and Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences John Jewett suggest that unless federal grants to the University increase 187 percent over the next two years — the possibility of which one report termed "zero," admissions to the Departments of Chemistry, Philosophy, and Political Science will be suspended in September, and all admissions to the College of Arts and Sciences will be terminated effective February 1, 1982.

According to a document titled "Project Harbiz," much of the money now budgeted to Arts and Sciences will eventually be reallocated to the Business Department, which is scheduled to separate from the College of Engineering, Math and Business Administration (EMBA) later this year and become an independent school.

Although the reports' apparent objective is "a re-evaluation of the direction of the University as it enters the 1980s," one informed Administration source said privately, "Taken together, the documents represent a extraordinarily bald attempt by Jewett not only to rid himself of a lot of problems in Arts and Sciences, but to emerge afterward as the Dean of a new, more prestigious school that happens to be flush with cash. The idea of abolishing the entire College of Arts and Sciences is ludicrous. If the faculty, students, and particularly the State of Vermont puts up with this, I'll be astonished."

University of Vermont President Lattie Coor confirmed Tuesday that a reevaluation of Arts and Sciences was underway, but denied the existence of any specific plan to phase out the College, and said that the recent proposal to eliminate the Communications Department, which is within Arts and Sciences, was unrelated to the overall reassessment.

"We are aware that the quality of education in many of the Departments in Arts and Sciences has been unacceptably low for some time, and we are equally aware that for an unknown reason, many of these departments have been unable to attract qualified applicants to the University," said Coor. "Dr. Arns, Dean Jewett and myself have been considering a variety of solutions to these problems, and we will resolve them with the interests of the University as an entity as our primary consideration."

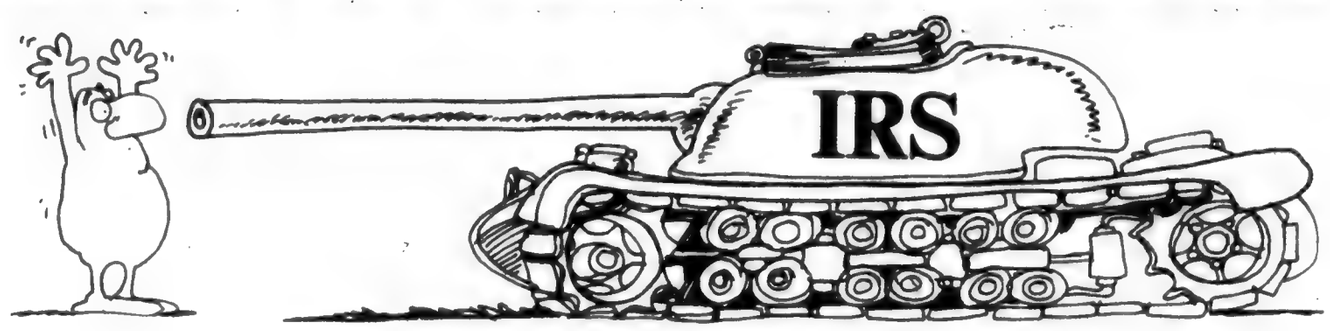
Communications Is Second Stage

Coor's remarks Tuesday directly contradicted an Arns/Jewett outline which indicates that elimination of the Communications Department is the second and "pivotal" stage of a four stage plan to phase out Arts and Sciences.

As early as September, 1978, according to the documents, Jewett withheld hiring of tenure track faculty instructors in 14 departments in the College, in order to create a shortage of faculty, overcrowded classroom conditions, and a broadly lower quality of education in Arts and Sciences. Labeling this action "Stage I," Jewett told Coor in a memo dated July 5, 1979 that "Induced classroom crowding and reduced faculty effectiveness should foster the campus sentiment necessary to support a consolidation of weak departments into one which would function properly."

When the number of unfilled tenure track positions exceeded 35, a level reached last December, Stage II, the announced phase out of the Communications Department, would begin. The "project Harbiz" documents labeled this phase "pivotal, since once campus opinion has been established for such a move, the broader logical link to phasing out the College is rather simple. In terms of logistics, too, it would be most difficult to reverse course beyond this Stage."

Disembowelment Follows



In Stage III, to follow six months forward, admissions to Arts and Sciences would be curtailed. The final stage, to occur eleven months after Stage II, would be marked by the suspension of all admission to Arts and Sciences, and the transfer of "less than 10" faculty from "hard science" departments into the College of Agriculture, and movement of "less than seven" faculty from the Economics and Psychology Departments to the Business Department, where they would teach business-oriented courses.

Reaction to the reports was swift and caustic, on campus and around the State.

In God's Name Kill Communists

America's failure to stand up and face the danger that exists far away in the hills of El Salvador smacks of godlessness, and is clearly the result of a weakness in American character that has poisoned this country since the dark days of Vietnam. Only decadence, the moral amnesia of our times, and the denial of God's will could leave this nation paralyzed with indecision over such a simple, clear cut issue. Just at the time when we should be moving quickly and with extreme prejudice into El Salvador with our howitzers blasting the Communists, we sit and discuss the lack of consideration for the supposedly "oppressed" Salvadoran people, and scan the dream horizon for a "political alternative" to military intervention, which is a bunch of hogwash in the real world.

We thought America had survived the darkness and reached the divine light when it finally ousted the Eastern bleeding heart Democrats and others sympathetic to the poor and the Kremlin in last November's glorious election, ousted the hedonists that almost ruined this country by sending hard earned tax dollars to every dreg in the country who wanted to suck the taxpayers' blood. Its about time we cut aid to all the black and Hispanic parasites who drive around in their Cadillacs screaming "honky" and blowing their noses at the truly free Christian way of life here in the U.S. No, the massive cuts in food stamps and medical care and other federal charity are both timely and responsible, and they'll get America's butt moving to be sure.

But here we are, with Communist overtures all around us and a great man in the White House who knows just how to get things done with the Reds, and we can't admit to ourselves and to the world that America should simply blow the Salvadoran Communists and their Soviet comrades off the map.

Salvadoran President Duarte has tried his best to resist the Reds in his pitiful little banana republic, but the strong Soviet undercurrent of arms and ideology is pulling his regime apart. God knows Duarte's government was one of the most gracious and God-loving in the the world until the Catholic Church bumbled their way into things. No doubt the Church found itself saddled with quite a guilt complex when it suddenly found it had done very little over the past few hundreds of years for its Hispanic peasant friends in South and Central America. So it started calling for land reform and other communist-type redistributive policies in El Salvador that belong only behind the Iron Curtain, and not on the doorstep of the United States. God knows that, which is why that Archbishop and those nuns are only memories now. Meanwhile every Communist in the land slithers out of the hills with an AK-45.

History shows that the Soviets take quick political advantage of countries plagued by peasant unrest. They move right in and manipulate everything. In El Salvador, the Soviets will arm those little anarchists to the teeth so they can squirm their way through the Salvadoran hills all the way to Washington, and then we'll be reading the Communist Manifesto before breakfast every morning and we'll be dipping our french fries in vodka and dungarees will cost $3,000 a pair. We'll have to memorize Das Kapital just to receive a ration of Kleenex. Our Good Comrade vacation once every five years will be a weekend for two at the Purge Hotel outside Vladivostock, where we'll censor ourselves and judge wall paintings for their degree of Soviet Realism. We'll all be wearing grey suits with pocket miniatures of Lenin.

Step back and assess the situation, America. You are now a nation blessed by the Almighty with a truly American president who has the stuff of the greatest American since J. Edgar Hoover , and possibly John Glenn. Given the mandate to do the righteous thing in El Salvador, President Reagan will lift us from the fiery depths of our hell to the glorious apogee of the modern free world, where we once stood firm and righteous in the eyes of Jesus Christ.

Ask Secretary of State Haig. He knows. He experienced first-hand the political blundering that prevented our boys from doing napalm's full poetic justice to those crazy Soviet-backed phantoms in the jungles of Vietnam. He understands what a devastating affect a divided public at home can have on a gallant invasion abroad. He knows that nothing feeds the furnaces of American industry quite like a war does. And he knows, and the Cynic agrees, that it's prime time for a U.S. military victory. How glorious it would be, and we'd forget about Vietnam and that fiasco in Iran and we'd feel good about ourselves again.

God, Lord, we've got to kill Communists.

Letters to the Editor

Dear Sirs,

Here's the New Words to my song. "Passion in Finbars... Passion. Passion in Doolin's... Passion. Passion at the Chickenbone... Passion. Passion in Billings... Passion."

Now can I play at Hunt's?

To the Editor:

Three years in a row the Cynic has promised a scratch-and-sniff centerfold. Where is it? A scratch-and-sniff of Billings Den or Chittenden third floor men's room would definitely work. You should consider this a responsibility.

Keith Miser

Editor's Note: Back off, Keith. Perhaps the Dean of Student's Office would like to dish out the cash and the stench sample for the scratch-and-sniff.

Dear Sirs,

From now on I'm out of tonight's special... permanently and just try and get a seat on Lasagna Night. And who says pasta and politics don't mix. What about that new senator from New York Al Tamato... or is it Al Tomato?

Dear Sir,

OK, so maybe I was a little smug and maybe I ran up a big bill at Nectors but that's no reason to bounce me out. Tell you what. If you make me mayor again, free parking and the bars are open till four a.m. but hurry up, huh. This guy Sanders is drinking my Scotch and smoking my cigars.

To the Editor:

Referring to Lenin's letter in the August 21 issue of the Cynic, I think it's clear that UVM education -- not imperialism -- is the final stage of capitalism. Anyway, do you idiots and this paranoid plebe Lenin know, that Comrade Bernie Sanders is considering a post at the Heritage Foundation? Drink heavily, baby.

Bernie's Mom

To the Editor:

Just as I support UVM investment in corporations that sell arms to South Africa and love my fiduciary responsibility to this glorious state institution, I will now back a proposal to the Board of Trustees that would make prayer mandatory in all UVM classes. Mandatory prayer is what we all need here. The choice is easy. And I must lead you into moral battle, for I have a mandate. Onward!

Dear Sirs,

We'll all meet up Sunday at noon, behind the Grange Hall. Remember to tell the little lady we're on a little vacation. Floyd and Buford are driving so bring gas money. The guns and ammo will be there and I got a Spanish-English dictionary too. Don't forget the coppertone. Oh yeah, how do you spell El Salvador?

Dear Sirs,

So what if I used to play ball, so to speak, with Paquette. Can you blame me? Suppose Bove's Bistro opened up in the town hall? Then where would I be, huh, besides I'm stuck with old chew 'n screw Paquette's bill and I'm behind on my payments on the Camaro.

Dear Sirs,

The New York Times called me a "self-styled socialist." Well I'm here to say that ain't the half of it. I'm also a self-made man who is self-effacing and I happen to be a self-taught piano player. Come on down for a scotch and stoogie.

To the Editor:

The Cynic once again has failed to cover an important event right here at UVM. Senior political science student James Zitz recently had published what many predict will be a bestseller, "Hogs and Herpies on the Gonzo College Trail" (Random House, $14.95). It's a phenomenal treatise that deals with "Over the Hump" parties and their consequences on campuses across the nation. "Pimple" Zitz deserves coverage and proper acclaim. Clearly, "Hogs and Herpies" is college life in a nutshell.

FindaRed, TwistaMind, MakeaWhore

By Alex Worthington

FindaRed TwistaMind MakeaWhore

It is the stamp of a perfect crime to leave no victims; or rather, to leave no one who feels he has been slighted in the smallest way. Indeed, it is the hallmark of the polished criminal to have his unconscious victims return again and again, asking, if not demanding, that they be used and abused. Of course, the victims do not know they are being exploited, because, by the time they return, begging for more, they have been thoroughly brainwashed by the master's persuasion.

On the whole, crimes which leave victims do not pay. Once a person feels he has been cheated, even in the slightest materialistic way, he jots it down in his memory of credits and debts, and waits for the proper moment for revenge. Thus, the pattern of the simple criminal is that he enjoys his profits until his enemies gain the necessary advantage to destroy him.

But the benefits of crime should not be temporary, for crime demands too many sacrifices for its rewards to be violently stripped away by some vengeful victim. The skill should be learned at an early age and should allow the criminal to advance to great wealth, by allowing him to reap the benefits of his earlier work. In short, it should have an increasing rate of return.

Whoremaking is a skill which, once learned, can produce loyal, money-producing servants, who will willingly and gladly give their lives to their masters. A properly trained whore is a slave; she gives up the only thing she has of value: her body. By giving up herself, for the profit of her master, she breaks the law. Prostitution is a punishable crime, and let there be no mistakes about this. However, the law perceives it as a victimless crime – they are wrong. The whoremaster knows the victim. He has trained her; and if he has intelligently trained her, she will, in similar fashion to the law, consider her self-abusive, self-degrading actions as a natural, and positive way to live.

Although the act of prostitution is a crime, the making of a prostitute is to date legal; and if done correctly, undetectable. The law cannot punish psychological abuses of people. We all know it can punish physical violations of one's rights, such as kidnapping or personal attack, but how can it punish for psychological detainment or the twisting of a mind, when the tools – the words – the weapons – the evidence disappears into the air? The only evidence of brainwashing is the victim; and if the victim does not perceive herself as a victim, there is no punishable crime, and more importantly, there is never revenge.

Whoredom requires at least one of two types of dependency: physical and emotional. Either one will suffice, but by far the strongest bonds are evoked by shades of each type. Physical dependency is the tangible need for food, clothing, shelter, money, transportation, medical attention – and in short, all that is necessary to live. This dependency is the ground work, the laying of the foundation, for the edifice of emotional slavery. It takes capital and investment, and personal sacrifice on the part of the master. An excellent example of this process can be had through the statement of a Harlem pimp, Big Red.

Red worked for Stern's Realty, up on the fifth floor of 115, 129th Street. He was paid half of one month's rent for finding apartments for customers. He was the lowest paid man in the office, and because he was so unsuccessful, he was given the poorest assignments. His customers were women. Typically they were never new in town, coming from the suburbs, looking for work, and leaving a lot of problems behind. Red knew that any girl who came to a Real Estate agency in the first place, to find an apartment, was a little naive. City girls went directly to the landlords and skipped the brokerage fee.

When greeting a customer, the first thing Red would do would be to find out their financial situation. The girls would already know how much they wanted to spend, but would answer Red's questions, considering them to be in their best interest. Any good salesman relaxes his customer, and then befriends him. Red, filling the role of the good Samaritan, would offer his services: "Do you need any one to help you move in?" "Are you looking for work? Mr. Harrison might have a position for you at the grocery store – it'll be a start." Slowly, through questions, Red would find out how alone the girls were. He would ask them out on dates, and find out as much as he could about their families – concentrating his questions on their fathers. Some of them were already entirely cut off from their families – they had broken up with their boyfriends to move to New York and were absolutely alone. Others had left home due to minor disturbances – and Red knew how to aggravate these disturbances into isolation.

Once he assessed a girl as being completely alone, with no one to turn to, he would break into her apartment. Everything would be stolen: furniture, money, pots, pans, silverware, rugs, clothes, and even the soap, if he thought it necessary. The girl would turn to Big Red's outstretched hands. As soon as she moved in, Red would have Mr. Harrison fire her. If the girl worked for someone else, Red would do his best to upset her boss by showing up for work and telling him "to keep his fuckin' hands off my woman." Soon enough, the girl would be unemployed, without money, without friends, without an apartment, in short, totally dependent on Red.

At this point, a girl would quickly grow indebted to him. He would offer to buy her clothes, but he would insist, since it was his money, that she dress to his tastes. Cheap, shiny dresses were ostentatious, but they were better than Red's pants and shirts. A young innocent-looking girl, dressed like a prostitute, would be propositioned by her perspective employers, rather than given a job. Hence, Red never was the first to suggest that a girl become a whore. Slowly, with everyone considering the girl a whore, and with Red the only person to take refuge in, a girl would begin to adopt the identity of her dress. "How much do these girls make?" she would ask Red; and then consider the economic possibilities.

Once she brought the topic up, which was as commonplace in Harlem as talking football in Giant Stadium, Red would lecture about the virtues of prostitution. "The oldest profession in the world. It's legal in Europe. Everybody's happy, no wrong in that."

After the ethical lectures, Red would throw a party. The guests would be prostitutes and friends – normally dressed, and behaving like respectable people. The crowd would "drug out," then Red would drag an old whore into his bedroom. A friend of Red's would "come-on" to the new girl, and persuade her to seek revenge against her lover. He would take her home and pay her. Soon enough the girl would return to Red, and she would be broken into regular, profitable service.

Needless to say, not every girl was the same, and therefore not every procedure was the same; but each procedure was similar in its slow progression which calculatingly reduced a person to a dog. Some girls were failures, some were hard, while others easy. Red was intrigued by the more difficult ones, and said "once broken, they are the most loyal servants."

Claiming that Red only used physical dependency and physical persuasion would be false. Red would use any means to achieve his ends. He would use psychology just as quickly as religion or theology, if he thought it would achieve his goals. In Harlem, however, the training always would start out being physical, and then advance, as time and money rolled by, into the realm of emotions. But even the emotions that Red manipulated were those associated with poverty: isolation and fear.

However, the raw-material for prostitutes does not come singularly from poverty. On the contrary, it can be had from all walks of life. Whether they be high school-runaways, college coeds or middleclass housewives, they can, through different methods, be converted to the faith. Red was an expert on poverty; he had grown up in poverty, and had experienced almost every emotion he manipulated. And likewise, those desiring to deal in college coeds, for example, had best know the entire spectrum of emotions experienced in these "dehumanizing institutions." Experience is the catch word; one must have gone through the trauma to know the shades of emotions. Literature, such as honest confessionals, are blueprints to the emotions. In autobiographies, not so much in those of great people but in those of the more average people, rests the key of slavery, for they document the way people feel and the way these feelings are influenced into actions.

In any case, once the emotions are outlined and understood, that is, the specific emotions of frustration of the housewife or the specific emotions of rebellion suffered by the teenager, the power of suggestion must be mastered. The emotions alone, such as fear, hate, jealousy, revolution, rebellion etc, will do nothing to intrap a subject, rather it is the way these are manipulated into actions and opinions that domesticates the animal. For example, when the victim feels rebellious, it is the artist who supplies the proper figure to rebel against. The fool, in contrast, will not detect this emotion and allow the subject to feel resentment towards him. In short, he will become the authority figure and his past labors will crumble, whereas the master knows if this resentment is directed towards the girl's father, husband or even an institution, it can further cement his own authoritarian rule. If the master is not perceived as the authority figure, and if it is suggested that a husband or a father is, a normally virtuous woman can be tricked into prostitution under the guise of rebellion.

Suggestion is the key to control. People do not act out of argument. They act out of beliefs which have been formed from suggestion. The belief in God, the belief in the devil, and the related belief in concepts of right or wrong are not formed from arguments but are paved and built on suggestions. The power of this device is practically infinite. Hypnosis, for example, is a group of well ordered suggestions. And Hypnosis, as those who have seen it done are aware, is no insignificant phenomena. The fruits of Psychoanalysis are also a result of suggestions. The major suggestion being "Go back into your past. Can you remember the first present your father gave you? Can you remember when your brother was born? Can you remember the first time you had a girl?" Psychoanalysis is, in itself, a discipline which could be used for profit. Think if the bond experience between the analyst and the patient could evolve into that of a master and a whore?

In the first stages of brainwashing, perhaps the most important thing to suggest is that there is a bond between the future convert and her master. Over-

You're J.R. Enough Don't Worry

Contrary to the opinions currently making the rounds in some circles relating to the approaching "bad" years and the self-imposed austerity that these doom-sayers feel is required to deal with it, there remains ample opportunity in the on-coming years for those devout hedonists still true to the cause to pursue their pleasure under a number of guises. The axiom for the eighties, therefore, is a hybrid of the me-decade axiom of looking out for number one and is now make sure that no one is out looking for number one and make yourself number one when it comes to being out looking. The trick is to build yourself an army of the disaffected "booboisie," as H. L. Mencken used to call them. The tempo of the times is such that single issues are virtually popping up all over and they need only a champion, one willing to set morals aside for the time being and lead the charge and as they proved in the West the only way you can know what a lynch mob's doing is by leading them yourself. I bet you're saying right now "sure that's great for him but I'm just not J.R. enough to do it myself," well swallow your pride, Pilgrim, and let me say, welcome aboard.

The first step towards your new outlook is to dissolve the moral question. Just remember that there are ten zillion starving africans over there who would sell their mothers for a ritz cracker so all questions of ethics are purely regional. Also, at the right time and in the right place people are capable of absolutely anything, even greatness. Now that you've overcome that little stumbling block, it's time to be born again. Nothing is more important to being born again than the setting and that is directly related to what advantage you wish to achieve by it. For example, if you see your road to riches paved with the greenbacks of poor ignorant rural folks, then you be well suited having your vision of god in a Kenworth 1800 with Dolly Parton (god bless hers) on the radio. If your background happens to include a prison stretch or two all the better. In their eyes, the more heinous the crime, the more miraculous the power of God and that my friends is the only infinity they can conceive of. If, however, your interests lie in more temporal matters and you intend to apply the born-again method to the world of business, then travel abroad is the best setting for your conversion to unfettered capitalism. Tell the boss how you've been to, say, Haiti, for example and how even in so poor a country as that there can still be some rags to riches storybook family like the Duvaliers who have lifted themselves up from the poverty around them to be loved and venerated as symbols by their fellow countrymen of what they too can become. Tell him how your trip to England really changed your mind, how all the people slept late cause the government was socialist, and how ever since you've thought the government should get off the backs of the people and the oil companies and build more nukes. Wear one of those little American flags in your lapel the way Nixon used to. Tell them you feel the bible forbids homosexuality and that you personally don't believe in "petting" before marriage. They'll think they've got a god-send and in a way they have.

The next step for you born-again purveyors of thumping bibles and healthy profits is to create a few symbolisms. Burn a few books, ban a few movies, complain real loud of how God has been forced out of the schools or if business is your religion, hire someone to dig up all the federal, local and state regulations that have any relationship to your enterprise, whatsoever and take a calculator and do some juggling to come up with some Reaganesque if-then scenario that ends up with a graphic example that the folks at home can easily understand of how government paperwork is preventing you from cheaply disposing of toxic wastes or turning your senior citizens' homes into condominiums. Solicit corporate donations for your citizens' committee to promote deregulation and with the money they shovel at you buy some of those computer-mailing lists. Saturate the bunch with patriotic sounding appeals to preserve what America stands for by mailing in a check right away. By now you should have appeared on Phil Donahue and have politicians eating out of the palm of your hand and before you get too carried away it's good to remember that power tends to corrupt and you're only in it for the money, which by now you should have seen and salted away a great deal of.

The final stage in your meteoric rise to the top is the making of contingency plans in the event that the Security and Exchange Commission or Mike Wallace show up at your office. The first step is to make sure all your assets are in things like Krugger-rands or diamonds, which no matter what anybody says, everybody takes. The next step, depending on the scope of your operations, is to keep either a packed suitcase in the closet or a fueled, Lear jet on the runway. Next secure the services of a good literary agent and just when the tide of the times is turning cut loose for a fling with some young girl. As the rejuvenated Liberals take charge, you'll be cashing your fat advance in some fancy bank in Zurich and as the new permissiveness you spotted coming takes hold, your book will assure you some sympathy in their hearts as merely a misguided hedonist gone wrong.

The Key is Perception, or Rather Deception emphasizing a bond will bring a confession; and a confession will bring needed information to the surface; along with proof for the girl that there is a bond. The phenomena is circular: the more she thinks there is a bond, the more she talks, and the more she talks, the more she perceives her bond. And confession is, like psychoanalysis, evoke emotions – emotions which can be twisted into ideas of love for the master.

This brings us to the topic of association. People do not clearly understand their emotions; they mistake security for love, fear for hate, and at times even hate for love and love for hate. This is especially true when confronted with a new situation or a new level of emotional stimulation. Moreover, they feel something new and are at a loss to define it. Obviously, it is the task of the master to manipulate these feelings. To illustrate this, we can see by suggesting the emotion of fear to be the hate for someone else (perhaps hate for a father or an old lover) how the victim can be lured into our camp. It must be added that people do not like to hate by themselves, they want companionship and this should be nurtured into dependence.

The master recognizes that positive emotions, such as friendship and love, are not only difficult to cultivate, but they are undesirable. True friendship requires equality; and equality is founded on mutual sacrifice, mutual trust, and a type of mutual confession by both parties. Of course this is undesirable, for although trust is necessary, we want a total sacrifice and confession on the part of the whore, while the master remains mysterious – feared – and superior. As has been noted before, the beginning of the relationship is founded on confession. But why does one completely reveal all their past failures and tramas to a complete stranger? Because they want to. Put them in an environment where they are afraid, coax them along, and out will come enough information to enslave them for a long valuable time.

The key is in perception, or rather deception. The whore is made to believe that what she is feeling is real, positive, unselfish love. She is coaxed into believing that she is emotionally elite; that she, unlike the common housewife, (and similar to characters in emotional dramas) is a "true lover." This is her gift or quality. But the master must never mistake this emotion he really has evoked, or rather, misinterpreted for the girl, as actually something else. It is difficult to label this actual emotion; it is fear, but it also is, if cultivated correctly, emotion from the girl's past. With a confession comes emotions, and it is the job of the slavetrainer to warp these outdated feelings into a new profitable bond. Moreover, deceive her into the belief that past loves and past hates are "really" present feelings of love. Again, confessions are excellent for this, for they stir up those past feelings; and once on the surface, the girl is convinced that old feelings are new feelings – feelings of "love," as she interprets them, are awakened by the presence of her "lover."

The "definition" is the strongest suggestion. The slave can not be allowed to use this device; her self-concept must be authored by the master, as well as her concept of the majority of the people she contacts. In our account of Red, we can see how he let other people suggest, at first, the self-concept that the girl would eventually adopt. Because she was dressed like a whore, she was treated like a whore, and after this treatment, she eventually adopted the opinion of others. Most people need others to supply them with a definition. The master is superior only because he authors his own definition and the definition of others. The girl is slowly made to redefine all of her past "positive" relationships – all of her friends and family which could offer her refuge – as negative and even destructive. She is taught to interpret every personal accomplishment as either insignificant or detrimental. Indeed, the only things she is allowed to remember are those which brought her pain. At the very least, every past emotional relationship is made to seem insignificant, trite, and petty in view of her love for her master.

The manipulation of a different sort of definition can yield great rewards when combined with an argument. Let's examine the word "natural." First off, everyone wants to consider himself natural. Who wants to be a freak? So an argument surfaces, a pre-existing argument, which can be seen in all works of myths, literature, philosophy, and religion, that one should do what is natural. But what is natural? Homosexuals will claim Homosexuality to be natural. Priests will claim religion is natural, while Capitalists will state capitalism to be natural. What is natural for the whore is defined by the master to be what is in his best interest. Moreover, he employs this "do what is natural argument," redefining the term natural, to evoke whatever behavior is in his best interest. Whoredom is then defined as natural – and therefore it is the thing to do.

Bonnie Prince Wants Deans Head

Yorkshire, England (OOPS) – Prince Edward of England, the youngest brother of the recently engaged Prince of Wales, has made a surprise change of plans for further education. Edward, who recently passed his public exams with flying colors, has backed away from his proposed Cambridge placing. He is now in Burlington, negotiating a freshman position with UVM President Lattie Coor.

Prince Edward chose UVM over other more notable schools because of its "simply spiffing Communication Department, which Mummy really adores," said the Prince in a recent interview. It may be the Tower of London for Dean Jewett.

Feces on Reagan Predicted

Richmond (OOPS) – Meterologists are predicting another strange climactic year for the United States and surrounding countries. In a report issued by the National Weather Bureau, several new developments are predicted. It will rain much more heavily in southern and western sections of the country over the summer. Fall temperatures in the New England area will be cooler than normal, the southeast will experience a drought, and it's going to shit on Ronald Reagan all year long.

Thatcher Takes Lesbian Stance To Foster Understanding

London, England (OOOPS) – Britain's first female Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, shocked the British Parliament and the rest of the world yesterday when she announced that her sexual preferences had changed. She announced, before the entire House of Commons, that in order to keep up with her "Iron Lady" image the P.M. was adopting a lesbian stance that he/she hoped would make everyone concerned a little more concerned.

Bader Takes Over C.E.Q.

Washington, D.C. (OOPS) – President Reagan announced Tuesday the appointment Tuesday of Donald Baeder, former chief operating officer of Hooker Chemical and Plastics Corporation, as the new head of the Council on Environmental Quality. The move followed the firing of the council's entire professional staff on March 19th.

Baeder, a close friend of Interior Secretary James Watt, was unavailable for comment, but Watt said that the former Hooker executive was selected because of "his obvious expertise in handling chemical waste and citizens' perception of environmental hazards."

Reagan also announced that his long time friend Bonzo was dropped from consideration when the primate's interest in banana trees was discovered during routine House committee questioning.

"It's shocking," the President said, "especially after all the recent evidence we've gathered on the amount of pollution caused by trees."

The President added that Bonzo was still being considered for the position of United States Ambassador to Guatemala, but conformation hearings will not begin until early May.

Reverand Falwell Answers Center Spread Ad in Playgirl

New York (OOPS) – Answering an advertisement for "well hung white boys," the Reverend Jerry Falwell, leader of the Moral Majority, successfully beat off his opponents for the spot of center spread in the upcoming April issue of Playgirl Magazine.

The estranged congressional wife, Rita Jenrette, who had recently posed naked for Playboy Magazine, passed comment on the religious leader's new position. "Frankly," said Jenrette, "I don't know what the hell those girls at Playgirl are playing at. If they think Falwell's their man, I think they're losing their marbles."

Who would Jenrette give her vote to for the full frontal in April? "Tip O'Neill," said Jenrette, "because he occupies such a commanding position."

Mexicans Bring Good Herb; UVM Coverup?

By Hart van Hamburg

No one noticed it at first. Short smelly Mexicans creeping around the campus greenhouse in the middle of the night with little bags under their arms. The ponchos probably hid the contraband more than anything else, but for whatever reason, the damage was well on the way before the authorities could pick up a trace.

In what is being described by authorities as the biggest drug bust in the history of the FBI, the UVM campus was awash with feds and local police as a roadblock and searching operation went underway to uncover 48 tons of marijuana reported by an RA in Wills Hall following sightings of very "fucked up individuals wandering around Converse Hall in the middle of the night."

As reports filtered back through the tight security net thrown over the operation, amazing stories took shape concerning alleged payoffs, homicides, and fabricated "suicides."

"The issue is utter nonsense," said UVM President Lattie Coor in an on the spot interview. "We here at the University of Vermont are very concerned about our out-of-state students, and I do not believe that what the authorities are doing has any substance to it."

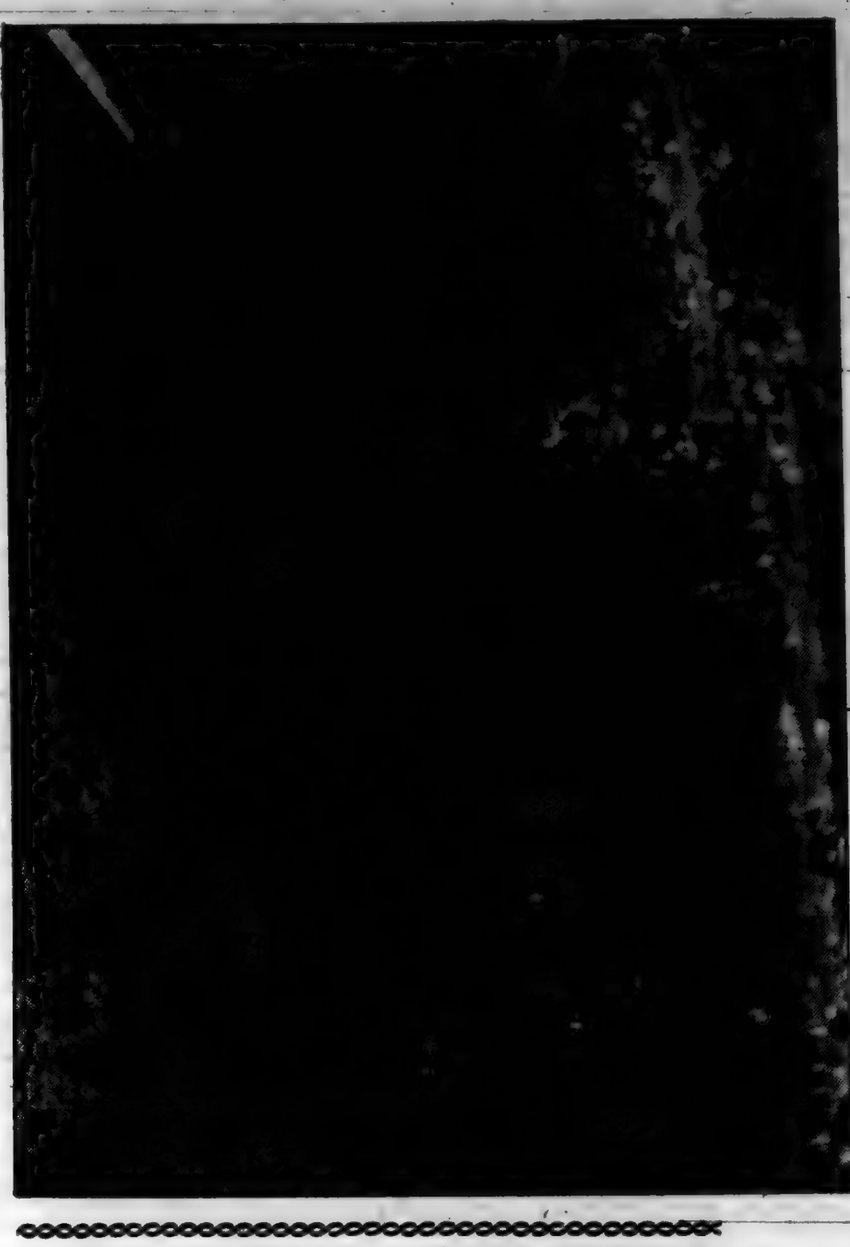
During the interview, conducted in front of Bailey-Howe Library, federal marshals were hauling bails of a strong smelling grass out of the Marsh Life Science Building. According to reports from a very reliable source, the marijuana is being taken to Boston where it will be used for the treatment of cancer victims in a new project known as Blow Before You Go.

It is alleged that students working in the greenhouse, as well as work-study students, were given payoffs in order to buy their silence. Said Jose Rodriguez, the now imprisoned ringleader of the operation, "we just gave the kids two ounces of Hawaiian Gold a week, as well as a few hits of speed, and it was like taking candy from a baby. Pretty soon we had them breeding hybrid strains, and harvesting phenomenal amounts of high quality shit. And it was no problem for us with Security either. Can you imagine the look on the Department head's face when some stoned out speed freak comes blubbering into his office, giggling incoherently about smelly Mexicans growing weed in a campus greenhouse in the middle of one of the most inhospitable winters in Vermont's history?

Rumors of a coverup on the part of the administration are also circulating as freely as the weed on campus. One student claims that he met middlemen from the President's office, and passed off dope in order that they prevent any word reaching the President.

The first hint of any trouble came from the UVM faculty union. In one of their recent meetings, comments were made about many students coming to class looking worn out, sleeping during class, and giggling incessantly. Professor Harry Orth, ignoring the bloodshot secretaries in Waterman, reported the incident to the president in person. "He threw me out on my ear when I told him about the possibility of drugs," said Orth. Similar statements were issued by other deans. They all steadfastly refused to believe that the students were the victims of such a cruel, inhumane, bloodcurdling coverup for the biggest drug ring north of Columbia.

When S.A. President Mike Deutch was approached for comment, a Cynic reporter was confronted by a joint being thrust under his nose. We are unwilling to report the ensuing meeting. Reports were confused.



The authorities were finally convinced when WRUV studios hinted about a possible inside line on the story. Program Director Howie Lincoln reported an incident involving a conversation with a friend who is a hall advisor on Redstone Campus, to UVM Security. Security followed up on the lead using wire taps and hidden tape recorders, and soon had their suspect. Last Saturday night they raided a first floor room in Coolidge Hall, and discovered thirty pounds of marijuana.

Following the raid, Security, unknown to the suspect, had her roommate bugged and followed, which led to the larger operation being uncovered. The roommate had tried to convey the message of the bust to Rodriguez, and they were both caught red-handed in the greenhouse. Additional forces bagged a handful of illegal immigrants as they tried to escape from the Plant and Soil Science Building through a back door entrance, which led back to the hidden stash of dope.

When questioned about distribution of the illegal drug, Rodriguez refused comment. Suspicions are being checked out about the possibility of using the circulation desk at the library as a drop off point.

Further allegations are probably being brought forth, including an LSD manufacturing outfit in the Cook Physical Science Building.

Blow Before You Go

UVM President Lattie Coor successfully upheld his role as moral leader of the University community last Wednesday by killing a vampire that had been spotted in front of Billings. "He's my hero," exclaimed one of the on-lookers.

Freshman Margo Davis narrowly escaped death Monday as a 45-pound Golden Retriever attacked her on the green in front of Chittenden Hall. The dog, which was captured and put to sleep after being tested for rabies, apparently went berserk in Billings Den after a student refused to share her sandwich with him, ran out back, and attacked Miss Davis. She is listed in stable condition in Mary Fletcher Hospital, suffering from multiple abrasions and a broken arm.

UVM TO MAKE GREEN BLACK

By Hart Van Hamburg

In a move approved by both the Board of Trustees and the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG), the UVM administration has given its blessing to a project that may once and for all alleviate the chronic parking problems experienced by all who work or study at the University. The plan calls for paving over the entire "Green" area in front of Waterman and Billings, between Pearl Street and Main Street.

"We are well aware of possible resistance to the project," said UVM President Lattie Coor, "but the fact of the matter is that we just can't afford to waste this valuable space." There are a number of other schemes being built into the construction plans though, mostly in an effort to "pacify" the members of Slade Hall and the Environmental Program.

The additional ideas include preservation of the trees that have been growing on the Green for over 300 years. "Obviously the trees have to stay," said a source in the Grounds Keepers' Department. "They will serve as a memento to the way things used to be."

Security seemed to approve of the plan, too. The centrality of the parking lot will make it a great deal easier to keep track of violators, and create a new source of revenue to the Security Dept., due to a foreseeable increase in parking tickets.

The new facility will not be free; a nominal 25-cent-a-day charge will be levied on users. Entrances will be on the east and west sides of the Green. Using the statue of Ira Allen as a booth, the attendants will sit inside, sheltered from the elements. A wood heating stove is planned for installment, using the inside of the statue as a chimney.

"We are really psyched, I mean really psyched," said Eric Kilburn, the assistant director of VPIRG. "We talked all this over with Dr. Coor, the Trustees, and other interested groups around Burlington. The general concensus is that while the idea "sort of sucks, we realize that these conservative, capitalist swines are going to get their way no matter what we do. We're damned lucky that the trees and the statue are staying."

Kilburn also added that VPIRG has been commissioned to do a survey on the idea from the standpoint of air quality as a result of the new parking lot. The results of the tests are not fully known, but sources in Montpelier have hinted that the air temperature in Burlington may rise by an average of .5 degrees Fahrenheit every year. At the present time, however, Burlington does not have a polar icecap, and the rise in temperature will not be of serious consequences.

Gran Nola, the head of Slade Hall, UVM's environmental dormitory, has been more vocal in his opposition to the parking lot. "We've been predicting this for years, and at last we're being proven right," he said at a recent "coffee house" to benefit SAP (Socialists Against Parking Lots). "If the UVM administration was more student-oriented and long-term looking, I'm sure that this kind of thing wouldn't be happening."

Nola also hinted at the idea that the Republican government in Montpelier was partially responsible. "One of our members, who is in charge of "teach ins" about parking lots, said she overheard Governor Snelling say "screw those commies in Burlington, we'll show them who's

Astute, Decent Young People

By Soar E. Su

The FBI announced yesterday that arrest warrants have been issued for University of Vermont Student Association Treasurer Jennifer A. Flesher, Assistant Treasurer Karen A. Griffiths, and former Treasurer Suzanne E. Kelly on charges of extortion.

University of Vermont Dean of Students Keith Miser told a press conference Wednesday that the school had filed charges against Flesher and Griffiths for allegedly extorting $23,000 of Student Association funds this year, and against Kelly and Griffiths for extorting $34,000 last year.

The three students left Burlington Tuesday night following a heated confrontation with University officials and state police on the Burlington Airport runway. Because the three are believed to have crossed the state's borders with some of the extorted funds, the FBI was called in by the Vermont state police. If, as according to one source close to the three, the students have flown to Barbados, one FBI spokesman said the CIA may be called in.

Miser told a press conference yesterday, "This affair disturbs me more than I find myself able to explain. I had understood these individuals to be outstanding young women. I mainly hope this does not discredit the majority of astute, Puritan, and decent character of most of the young people attending this University."

The three seniors apparently diverted funds from the S.A. budget into the account of an unrecognized club, "Women for a Moral Society," in which the accused were high officers. According to S.A. records, over $50,000 has been allocated to this unrecognized club over the last two years.

S.A. President Michael Deutsch, who appointed Flesher and Griffith to Treasury positions last May, told reporters Wednesday "That was my only mistake for the full term. Really. And you also have to take into account that I didn't have much experience or know either one of them at the time."

In a Hollywoodesque departure at the Burlington Airport Tuesday night, the three accused drove down a runway chased by University and police authorities to Kelly's family-owned Lockheed, which had apparently been prepared in advance. Calling to the frustrated pursuers before closing the latch door of the then moving plane, Griffiths reportedly said "too bad, suckers," followed by "Ah, men..."

A state police source reported yesterday that although no official warrant had been filed, officials were investigating evidence that Student Association Secretary Sally Jordon has been extorting student government funds over the last six years. The sources said investigators are most interested in the Secretary and her husband's recent purchase of the historic Schooner Richard Robbins, which is valued at $550,000. The couple's net financial worth has been determined to be $58,000.

"I thought it was a nice boat," said Jordan.

Eliot, why all this white space? Ron

On Friday, March 13 Walter Cronkite ended his career as anchor man for the number one rated CBS evening news. With his replacement Dan Rather substituting in the following Monday, the major networks battled for the number one news spot.

Frank Reynolds hosts ABC's World News Tonight, Harry Reasoner anchors NBC News and Dan Rather anchors CBS Evening News.

In a recent national poll taken by the R. Igged Polls, it was found that all three network news ratings have fallen since Dan Rather's replacing Walter Cronkite March 16th. Reasons for CBS's decline were due to Walter's absence and recent dislike for the remaining anchor men.

In response to questions given by this national poll, the general feeling of the public were typical of those given below.

"Do you watch CBS Evening News?"... "I'd Rather not..."

"Do you watch NBC News?"... "I see no Reason to..."

"Do you watch ABC World News Tonight?"... "Frankly no..."

The latest poll has put Rather and CBS at the bottom of the ratings. Dan Rather will hence be defunct this April and the new anchor man will be Bill Felling of WCAX TV3 in Burlington, Vermont. Responses to the new appointment of Bill Felling taken by the poll ranged from "Who?" to "I've got a felling he'll be good."

Recreation Groups Will Use UVM Slime

The construction sight at the athletic buildings, as it appeared on Tuesday. Experts say they are finding more junk each day to give to local recreational groups.

By Ceally Anderson

Plans for additions to the physical plant of the UVM Patrick Gymnasium have been recommended for considerable modification since construction began in late September. In an initial evaluation of the project, released Monday to the Cynic and major wire services, it was disclosed that a number of changes will be made in the execution of the project, delayed 7 months since its implementation 6 months ago.

An ad hoc committee representing the UVM Board of Trustees, the Athletic Department and the Water Ballet Team has concluded that "it is financially indefensible to continue on the path set forth in the original proposal. The present production figures, placing the completion date one month behind schedule for every month of work, seems reasonable to us, however the statistics of the financial analysis are becoming slightly more difficult to reconcile with those of the accounting firm representing our interests. For this reason alone, we recommend that someone change the plans."

Several suggestions for alternative uses of the partially completed areas to the east and west sides of the gymnasium facility have been proposed by representatives of various special interest groups in the UVM and Burlington communities. One of the most popular proposals from an economic standpoint would preserve the present terrain configuration of the areas, including large mounds of primordial slime, interspersed with rivulets of oozing fluid and abstracted by vertical orange beams, for the use of survival, military and recreational groups.

It is certain that many other proposals for completion of the project exist, however, the last-minute nature of this investigation prohibited the inclusion of any concrete, factual information at the time of publication.

A Royal Pain In The Ass

By JFB

George Brett, the all-star third baseman of the Kansas City Royals, has contracted yet another severe case of hemorrhoids. Brett, who endured this perilous, agonizing, "bloody" and decrepit physical ailment throughout the 1980 season and World Series, received the news with a "bottoms-up" attitude while lying on his stomach on his physician's examination table. News of a definite second surgical intervention on the "rearside," surely must have discouraged the already inflammed Brett.

When asked about his serious condition at a Royals press conference, Brett responded emphatically by stating, "It's a Royal Fucking pain in the Ass, but surgery should rectify the situation."

Brett put all serious questions and doubts concerning his future play to rest by saying, "I've played with this sort of thing in the past and I don't see why I can't play with it in the future. This isn't the first time that the 'fates' have dealt me a bum hand."

When asked if he thought he could play professional baseball while enduring the agonizing and frustrating pain of a second case of hemorrhoids, Brett replied: "It isn't the pain that bothers me the most. Pain is purely a psychological attribute which any objective professional Athlete can block-out. It's the damn fucking itching which truly pisses me off! The immediate satisfaction derived by an innocent scratch every now and then results in a over-all inflamed and irritating condition in the long run. To put it simply again, it's a royal pain in the ass for myself and the Kansas City Royals organization."

Brett's mother commented at her son's serious condition by stating at the Royals' press conference, "It truly is frustrating. Georgie and I've tried everything you can imagine. We've purchased Preparation H by the case from the local drug store. Icing down the extreme swelling provides instantaneous relief which wears off after a few short hours. Why, I have to hand-cuff Georgie's arms to each of the bed posts every night to quell any of Georgie's instinctive scratching aspirations!"

So, the next time you see George Brett on a nationally televised game, with his fingers forcefully hidden in a place where let us say "the sun doesn't shine any more" give him a break. After all, the man's in pain!

Steinbrenner Announces 'New Deal'

By Rich Bateman

Following ten straight preseason losses and a series of internal conflicts, Yankees' owner George Steinbrenner has set up many surprising tentative deals.

If these deals should transpire, stars such as Reggie Jackson, Tommy John, Ron Guidry, Willie Randolph, Rich Gossage and Dave Winfield can expect to be in different cities by April 1st (the trading deadline). There are rumors circulating among baseball people that every Yankee player is on the trading block. If the tentative deals take place, this will be the largest shakeup in baseball's history. Disgusted with the players' attitude on and off the field, Steinbrenner said, "It's time to change the Yankee image."

Probably the biggest surprise stemming from this news is the proposed trade of newly acquired outfielder Dave Winfield to the New York Mets. The Yanks recently signed Winfield for $13 million over 10 years. Asked why he was trading Winfield, Steinbrenner said, "I felt sorry for my buddy Frank Cashen (Met's general manager).

He's done a fine job with the Mets and deserves a shot at the pennant. With Winfield and Dave Kingman, his chances are good." He also added, "Frank is a good ole boy and an asset to baseball." Incidentally, the Yanks would receive the rights to play in Shea Stadium.

The tentative deals involving Tommy John and Ron Guidry, the aces of the Yankees' staff, represent the possible dismantling of baseball's finest pitching staff. But Steinbrenner is not worried. John outraged Steinbrenner last week when he demanded a new 10-year contract that would last another 10 years. After all, I'll only be 48," John said at a recent press conference. Steinbrenner thought otherwise and has engineered a possible deal with the Boston Red Sox. In return for John, the Yanks would receive Jim Rice, Carney Lansford and Tom Burgmeier. Reflecting on the possible deal Steinbrenner said, "I hate to see Tommy [John] go but it had to be. Also, I hate to get ripped off [by the Red Sox] like this." He also remarked that "I was hoping the Red Sox would throw in Jerry Remy, but Haywood Sullivan is a stubborn man." This deal will transpire if John and the Red Sox can reach a contractual agreement. Sullivan enthusiastically expressed that he feels a 10 year contract is very reasonable.

A player who does not fit in with this "new image" is superstar Reggie Jackson. Jackson, whose current contract expires soon, is coming off his finest all around season. With the probability that Jackson will ask for a new contract which will make him the highest paid player in

WHAT A TRIO!: Incompetent sports writers Johnson, Cook, and Boitano display their usual dumb faces and demonstrate to their readers that they have absolutely no idea about what they are writing.

Why Read Cynic Sports?

By Vicki Johnson

When you read an article in the sports section of the Cynic, do you wonder just how competent the staff is? So do I. Just who are these half-dozen baffoons and why should you spend your precious time reading it? Believe me, if you read this section you are a member of a very very small minority. I ask you — who really gives a flying fart about the women's hockey team and track team or how badly the men's hockey team lost by this time?

Listen, I'm not proposing that the section be done away with. Actually, I enjoy spending my entire Saturday night watching a typical UVM team get blown away by some nothing team from northern New York and then spending several hours writing the story and bringing it all the way over to the Cynic office. The fact that no one reads the section doesn't bother me, it's the assholes on the staff that really annoy me. No one ever wants to cover the really important sports at UVM. When was the last time the cockroach races at Buckham Hall were covered? The squealing pig races at Sigma Nu is another biggie, or the roof jump at Delta Psi. Face it. These should be major media events. Why did sports writer Chris Fiorini lunge at the chance to cover men's basketball? Could it have been the fantastic body of Corey Weilgus? Tell everybody about it, Chris. And why did Greg Weimer cover hockey? Was it because he secretly wanted to play, or the fact that Sigma Nu rejected him?

Lon Brettel, another Cynic Dynamo, requested to cover the UVM ski team. He forgot to tell sports editor Andy Cook that after 12 years of lessons he still couldn't ski. (It shows, Lon.) By now you can tell that all of the Sports writers are frustrated.

But perhaps the most frustrated of us all is Rich Bateman. You see Rich is a journalism major, a slight oversight on his part since UVM has no journalism department. Any normal person would have figured this out two years ago, but Rich keeps plugging along, writing boring pompous 11-page articles, meeting deadlines, and living in a fantasy world of someday writing for U.P.I.

Then there is Harry Eastman. Only someone like Harry could do something as dumb as writing that UVM won a track meet by a score of 30 to 65 to 70. I'm rather surprised that Coach Ed Kusiak didn't tell him to fly a kite after than one. The brothers of Delta Psi said that Harry Eastman didn't know his ass from a shot put, and having seen this weird looking guy, I would have to agree with this judgment. But Harry is from Danville, Vermont and his only experience in writing sports was covering the cow races in his back yard, so you have to sympathize with him.

Don't get me wrong; the staff really does try. Really it does. Often I see Cook working overtime at the Last Chance with Ceally Anderson (how can he see in that dim light?). Don't get the wrong idea; Andy is really a good editor, in spite of his sexual forwardness toward the female sports writers. (Remember, that night at the White Mouse, Andy?) He does have his problems, however, as he frequently impersonates Brent Musberger. Realize his slight imperfections, and play along with him.

I can't fail to mention some of the lesser known writers; Bill "plagiarism" Sawch, John "B.J." Boitan, and Mary Anne "never heard or seen from after her first article" O'Mally. Maybe she is the smartest one of the bunch, realizing the uselessness of the sports section. Could it be that my talents are being wasted? Well, there's always the feature section or maybe Arts or...

Wouldn't It Be Nice if. . .

By Bill Sawch

Wouldn't it be great, just for once, if a UVM athletic team of any kind could produce a professional player? It's not that I really care or anything like that, but it would be nice to say "Hey, you know that guy out there... he went to UVM." You say, 'big deal who cares?' Well for one thing it could be a boost for our somewhat horribly-run athletic program. It could make a name for UVM. People out on the west coast might finally realize that there is a state called Vermont somewhere in the northeast region of the U.S.

If someone was to tell me now that some past athlete from UVM is a professional ballplayer, I'd look at the guy as though he were some sort of a quack. Perhaps I am coming on too strong. Maybe I'm asking a little too much. Let me start over.

Wouldn't it be great, just for once, if a UVM athletic team won a lot of games. They wouldn't have to do it all in one year. Spread it out over a couple of years. Hold on. Am I still asking too much? Let me try something different.

How about just having a fucking football team. They wouldn't even have to win. Just put a team on the field. I don't care if they get their asses kicked. As far as I'm concerned, they could all be blind. But it would give the students something new. A chance to relax, watch a game on a clear, brisk autumn weekend. Maybe they could get drunk and even sick in the stands. I'm talking school spirit now. Wouldn't it be fun? After all, isn't that what college is all about? Rah-Rah, Go team go, and all that other shit.

Hopefully when I graduate from this school located somewhere in the northeast region of the U.S. I will be able to say "Yes, I went to the University of Vermont, the school that put out so many fine teams and athletes to go with them." I'll even settle for a "Yes, I went to the University of Vermont, the school that fielded a geriatric football team, which was winless every year." At least I can say we had school spirit.

Sayonara, Reggie . . .

baseball, Steinbrenner is brewing a deal with California Angels owner Gene Autry. Jackson claims he is the greatest and says "if Dave Winfield is worth $13 million, then I must be worth at least twice as much!" Jackson also claims that he "was offered $10 million to fight Muhammed Ali this summer." Asked what he felt about all the money players are making, Jackson stated, "What's the big deal about money anyway? Last season I only received $1700 per at-bat!"

Steinbrenner reacted to Jackson's comments by saying, "Jackson is the greediest son-of-a-bitch I know. If he thinks I'm going to pay him more than $1 million per season then he must do more drugs than people realize." About how the contract negotiations are affecting Jackson, Steinbrenner said, "If Reggie would only grasp his 'always open' palms around his bat, he might perform better." The sarcastic remark reflects the obvious strife between Steinbrenner and Jackson.

Steinbrenner is stressing a new approach to baseball in 1981. Like the Twins' Calvin Griffith, he will refuse to foolishly dish out money. He states that "I am not the type of man to waste my money and I will not begin now." Although the Yanks are winless thus far in pre-season and the possibility of a team face-lift exists, Steinbrenner is as optimistic as ever. He says, "I feel confident that we can win it all this year. If we don't, the fans will see an entirely new Yankees team next spring along with a new manager. I'm going to change my ways and make changes for once!"

Oral Majority

Foams At The Mouth

By Hope Ime Payedagin

"We picked the name for a couple of reasons. We're obviously oral, because we, uh... sing. We're a majority because we play whatever the hell we want to and condemn everything and everyone else, which is what a majority should do."

—guitarist Jerry Foulwell

With all the disco/pop/bubblegum rock/middle-of-the-road/sickeningly sweet music that infests our society, it's reassuring to know that there are still bands who like to shatter glass with ridiculous volumes of straight-ahead rock n' roll. Oral Majority, a group of assorted people from Burlington's underworld, is just such a band.

The members originally met in The Chickenbone Cafe one Wednesday night. Their diverse personalities meshed so well that they decided to drive around all night, guzzling a half-gallon of Jack Daniel's whiskey and snorting heaping spoonfuls of methamphetamine. As the sun rose on Thursday, conversation became increasingly difficult. Sputtering, incoherent drooling was all they were capable of producing. One rational sentence, "Let's start a band" (they forget who said it), initiated their musical growth.

Vocalist Bonnie Black, who usually dresses in silver gloves, ebony pants and tuxedo jacket, recalls her impressions of the band's first jam session: "I've listened to classical music all my life. I only recently became interested in popular music, but Oral Majority dazzled me right from the start. The way they blended pounding bongos and unbearably loud drumming with the screeching feedback of a guitar and the incessant wailing of a harmonica was simply brilliant. It reminded me of Tchaikovsky."

The other band members also have strong opinions about what they do... so strong, in fact, that they're often misunderstood. Joey Slick, the versatile instrumentalist (harmonica, acoustic guitar, bongo drum) of the group, says: "When I go onstage, I'm outta my mind. Most of the time, I jes play whatever comes into my head... the band understands. Plus, I'm usually so wired that I keep playin' even after the song's over."

Another member with an insistent viewpoint is drummer Johnny Trenchmouth. Shirtless, with dungaree jacket and jeans covering his body and mirrored sunglasses covering his bloodshot eyes, he mutters: "Drummin's good terapy fo' me. When I get pissed, I sit behin' my set 'n swing at everythin' in sight. It's like, what the hell... I'll hit somethin' sooner or later. Some people say my drummin' souns like shit. So what ?!" At this point, he tilts forward and waves a finger at me, saying: "You probly can't play drums, eithah!!"

Such musical braggadocio also creeps into bandleader Foulwell's description of his approach to guitar playing. With his face beaming — almost beatific — he whispers: "Sometimes I really get into banging one chord over and over for about twenty minutes. It's an amazing feeling... so hot... it's almost spiritual."

Percussionist Dead Bongo rocks slowly in his chair, nodding his bandanad head. Leaning back and closing his eyes, he exults: "When I'm playing, I'm communing with my inner self as well as the environment that surrounds me. In essence, I become my bongo." To check out my suspicions, I rapped his fuzzy head, and sure enough, it was hollow.

During this time, Bonnie Black has been caressing her moist lips with a sticky tube of glossy red lipstick. She stops momentarily, saying: "You know, since we are an Oral Majority, I feel that I'm expressing the views of a lot of people, not just the band or myself. So, when I sing "Chili Eggs" or "Fork Over the Cash, Schmuck" or "All I See Are Blue Lines," I know that I'm vocalizing the tastes and beliefs of a large segment of society."

Surely, Oral Majority won't go unnoticed for long; the band plans to start performing in some of Burlington's nightspots next Wednesday. Drummer Trenchmouth quips: "We'll show 'em how good we are, no mattah how obnoxious we hafta be ta prove it." Right on, Johnny — the climate's right for an Oral Majority to take over this country's music industry.

LIVE ART / CONCERT

Omnivorous Aesthetic Appetite

By Mr. Chow

He spreads a lot of joy. Sid's life vacillates between obvious libido churnings and the most refined endeavors. Mostly in thought, he wanders through the streets in search of pleasure. He is known as a street urchin. His occasional social appearances at the theaters or movie houses indicate his affinity for vicarious thrills. He is generally restless, so the snack bar provides temporary relief. His public autoerotic gestures are social euphemisms for what he really does at home. But his real arena for self-expression is found when making surprise, unexpected visits. Shirley appears startled in this picture. "Eeeeeek," she screams. Fortunately, she is only taken aback for a moment. It must be the clumps of hair on those hands. Hey, we're talking short and curly neanderthal tufts. Passive resistance with the semblance of nonchalance gets Shirley out of this bind. She finds the event exhilarating and is even carried away with herself. She falls into a long conversation with herself about how one of her old boyfriends would shave his entire body. Sid is a little bored with the prattle and begins to grope around for something to eat. He paws around the cupboards, finds some raw spuds and begins to stuff his face. You can imagine all the slurping he makes while eating. It doesn't last long, thank God. He's not the only soul accused of eat and run. Off he goes in search of some primordial stimuli. He may be looking for something of lasting value or maybe just immediate gratification. Whichever path he decides to take, let's hope his foot does not get stuck in your mouth. Refreshments were offered at a recent cocktail party, but Sid was not there. He knew about the affair and thought it might be truly gala, but he was just not in the mood. Sid knew that she would be there, but he wanted to stay at home and eat his own crackers. He is a moisture seeker by nature; he likes to get wet. Sid did not know what to do next. It was dusk, a strange time of day indeed, because the rods and cones in his eyes did not know whether to be limp or stiff. Sleep was a possibility, but the world of dreams was not enticing enough at that time. Now he wanted action, action, and more action. Games, amusements, and sundries offered him no desirable titillation. What to do, what to do? A surprise, unexpected visit sounded good to Sid. He decided to drop in on some people. Luckily, they were just sitting down to eat their dinner. "Feed time," thought Sid. The vittles were graciously received with excellent conversation. He left at the right time. Waves of heat flushed Sid's face as he felt the need to squat upon the porcelain convenience. Fiber, he thought. That was easy and relieving. Now that he could resume breathing, Sid went his way. Each moment brought either suspense or monotony.

GRATEFUL DEAD TO BILLINGS

By Camel Driver

Plans have been finalized for a Grateful Dead concert on the steps of Billings Student Center "sometime in May," according to Jerry Garcia, lead guitarist for the band. All proceeds from ticket sales will go to benefit The Vermont Cynic.

"We wanted to find a cause so miserable, so bogus, that the only thing that could possibly save it would be our overinflated, egotistical presence," said the musician-turned-God. "Besides, I wanted a chance to catch up to that Sam Wear character."

In an exclusive interview with the Dead following the Hartford concert on March 14th, the plans for the band's return to Vermont were unveiled. Reportedly, they had a two-day vacancy in their scheduled tour of the Northeast in May, and felt like "blowing off some steam."

"I really love Vermont," said Bill Kreutzman (the band's senior percussionist), "and pushed hard for the concert. It's been so long since we've done a benefit. It should be fun."

Rhythm guitarist Bob Weir added that he wanted to do a couple of shots of whiskey, "cause then girls round here start looking good."

The turning point in deciding to come here was seeing the February 12th issue of the Cynic. Garcia said: "The first thing that hit me was the overall incompetence exhibited in the paper. If I hadn't been so pissed off when I read Sam Wear's letter, I would have used the issue to light a joint. The kid's obviously jealous that my friends will travel hours to see me, while he sits alone at home every night. Art is everywhere, Sam, and Boston is certainly a part of everywhere."

That feeling of gratitude and pity led the band to offer their services to the paper, and to give UVM a chance to "have a sold-out concert again."

"The Talking Heads?" said Weir, as he rolled off the bed, laughing hysterically.

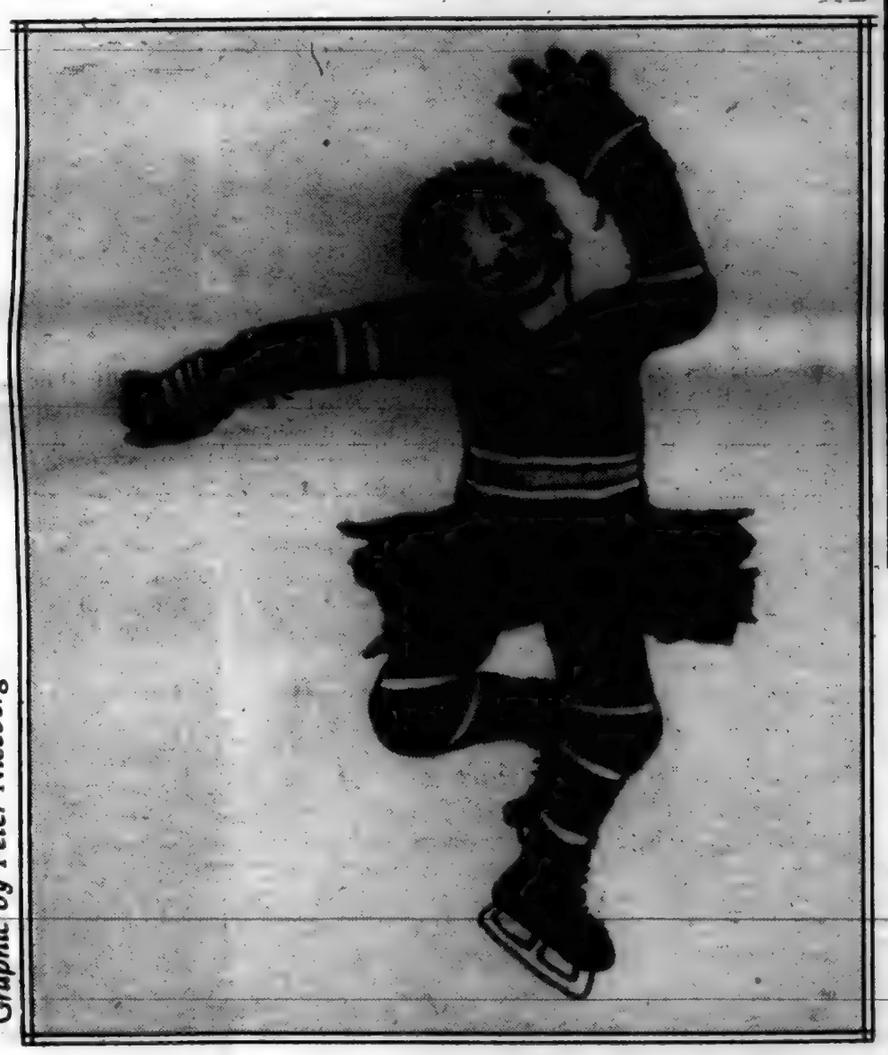
Ballet Of The Brutes

By Tamara Nite



Not to be outdone by professional football teams, the UVM Hockey team followed the trend of having dancers lead warm-ups, and brought it one step further last Thursday night. The unprecedented move by the all-male hockey team of performing Tchaikovsky's "The Nutcracker Suite" was, considering all obstacles, a huge success.

The lights went down in the now ice-less Gutterson Rink. Amid the expectant voices of the audience could be heard the familiar opening strains of the overture. The lights rose on a makeshift stage erected in the center of the rink, and the ballet began.

sticks from under their tutus. A choreographer walked out on stage, blew a whistle and interrupted the dance, signalling a cross-checking penalty. The ballet was suspended for two minutes as the dancers had to spend that time in the penalty box.

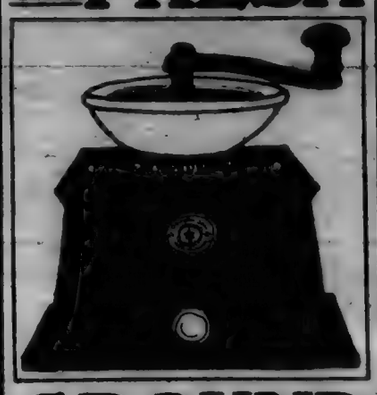
The high pointe (pardon the pun) of the evening was definitely The Dance of the Snowflakes, with Billy Kangas as the Snow Princess. Confetti made of shredded hockey programs fluttered down into the stands, transforming Gutterson into a winter-wonderland.

But, of course, the performance was not perfect. The fact that there were no women in the

Graphic by Peter Niceberg

Kirk McKaskill, Billy Kangas, and Chris Hodgson fluttered an on pointe – gracefully for all their weight. Hodgson's performance as the Sugar Plum Fairy was only slightly marred by the fact that he continued to wear his skates until halfway through the second act.

Sylvaine Turcotte played an utterly convincing Prince to Kirk McKaskill's Laura. Their duet dances, pas de deux, were utterly amazing. They brought to mind images of Nureyev and Fontaine during their lifts and leaps, despite the hockey-players-turned-dancers habit of wearing shin guards, shoulder pads, helmets, mouthpieces, et al.



Only during the battle between the Mouse King (Andy Ashforth) and the Prince did the ballet look more like a coup d'etat than a pas de bouree releve detourne, as the dancers somehow conjured up hockey troupe marred the ballet from the start. Also, the acoustics in the Field House were such that the orchestra sounded like a badly scratched record, and personally, no matter what the boys are used to, I found the playing of the national anthem at the start tasteless and distracting.

Overall, the boys did well. Choreographer (and sometimes coach) Jim Cross was heard saying in the dressing room amid the greasepaint and hot lights: "Our regular season wasn't that good. This helped to make up for it. Next time, I'd like to try "Swan Lake" and see if maybe the Women's Hockey team will give it a go."

And the players? They're just as positive. Says freshman Tim Comisa: "My heroes are, uh, Bobby Hull, and uh, Mikhail Barishnikov."

My personal congratulations to a troupe's job well done.

Fear and Loathing at RTT

By Lance Pudman

Gonzo Theatre hit the Queen City with the tenacity of a bull elk in heat, in the form of Raoul Duke's stage presentation of Hunter S. Thompson's Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas. The presentation (March 19th at 8:00 p.m.) was a part of Royall Tyler Theatre's "Bad Craziness in American Theatre" week. It was certainly the most savage, bent play that this writer has ever seen.

The play's comments on reality in theatre were at times too blatant, especially when clouds of mace drifted into the audience in the third act. This harsh reality motif ran throughout Duke's version of the novel. Other playwrights would have used mock lizards for the infamous "lizard scene," whereas Duke used live alligators, fitted with ray bans, Hawaiian shirts, and bermuda shorts. One of the gators, enraged by a student's izod shirt, snapped off the young man's leg and then attempted to drag him backstage to be finished off.

Renaldo Sawtooth's portrayal of the notorious Hunter Thompson was flawless. From his wounded water buffalo-like bellow to his uncanny consumption of dangerous drugs, he was all Thompson. The play opened with Thompson driving in the desert... enter huge hairy bats stage left. He flew into a drug-induced rage and opened up with his .357 magnum, dropping three of the buggers with his first four shots (costuming note: the bats were played by a group of pigeons who had mattress stuffing glued to their torsos).

Duke's treatment of the scene involving Thompson's adrenochrome overdose was amazing. Adrenochrome "makes pure mescaline seem like ginger beer." As Hunter tasted the drug, the theatre was rocked by Jefferson Airplane's "White Rabbit," played at a high decibel level, in conjunction with an awesome light show. This dream-like, multi-media fantasy put the audience right into the ozone with Thompson. As this happened, the viewers were treated to a short dialogue by Dr. Gonzo (Thompson's attorney), played by Oscar La Bartha: "Goddamnit, you took too much. You're about to explode. Jesus, look at your face."

The opening scene caused a great deal of controversy among the UVM faculty, due to the large number of bullet holes left in the woodwork of Royall Tyler Theatre and two UVM students. It should be noted that the .357 magnum is quite a large handgun which leaves enormous holes in whatever it strikes. There is now some discussion about limiting the caliber of guns used in RTT to a measly .38 caliber. I feel this proposed change would restrict the artistic freedom of RTT productions and that this rule must be fought to preserve the integrity of theatre at UVM. There was no mention of limiting the caliber of handguns used to blast apart UVM students, as the faculty feels they have no jurisdiction in this matter.

There is also much confusion concerning the disappearance of the entire Theatre Dept., Theatre majors, and a fair section of the UVM student body. The punch that was served at the reception was spiked with what UVM chemists have called "the purest LSD-25 we have ever seen, synthesized, or consumed." The missing people are rumored to be on the road to Las Vegas.

...and the sky was full of what looked like huge bats

FILM

Dead On Arrival

By Wax Weed

I've seen some strange things in the cinema before, but nothing so bizarre as the latest film by Andy Warhol. The man who brought us such "classics" as Trash and the infamous Frankenstein has returned to the silver screen with Andy Warhol's Cinderella a movie which, to say the least, sets new lows in standards of taste and intelligence. Mr. Warhol has decided to use "ex"-movie actors in his main roles, and I don't mean retired, I mean dead, as in pushing up the daisies.

The late Marilyn Monroe was pulled out to "play" the lead role, and the body of former rock star Jim Morrison was dug up for the part of the handsome Prince. Hollywood legend John Wayne gives an encore as Morrison's father, the King, and his acting dead is almost indistinguishable from his acting when he was alive. Warhol gives us another odd twist by casting Truman Capote as the Fairy Godmother. Of course, we all know that Truman Capote is not dead, but his performance in Cinderella is so hilariously wooden that you would never know the difference.

The plot, such as it is, has nothing to do with the original story. Actually, there was no plot as far as I could see, which was an unexpected relief.

The real story, however, is in the use of dead people. In a recent interview, Warhol tried to explain his motives for this. "I must say it was quite an undertaking," said Warhol, "Getting these former greats was not easy, but some of them were preserved quite nicely and did an adequate job of acting."

Why would he actually want to use dead people in the starring roles, though? "Well, I thought that I would try something that no one had ever done before, or would likely ever want to do," he said. "Stars today just don't have the same charisma as these people did. I personally think Jim Morrison dead has as much ability and magnetism as Dustin Hoffman does alive." Can't argue with you there, Andy.

"Besides, I've saved a bundle in salaries, and these bodies don't give me any trouble on the set," he continued. "Some living people are so temperamental... you just wouldn't believe it. With this film, if I wanted Marilyn or Jim or John to do a scene, I just moved them myself. I had total control over my actors this time."

Motion would seem to be a real problem with actors who are for the most part dead, since they just can't move around as well as they did in the past. Warhol, however, solved this problem by putting the bodies on battery-operated rollerskates and having their arms manipulated with strings. The total effect of this was like watching a necrophiliac Muppet Show.

The voices of the ex-stars were dubbed in by a little-known actor/singer named Bronco Noodleman. His was indeed a virtuoso performance, doing all the voices in the movie (except Truman Capote, who plays his part in limp-wristed sign language). Yet, he made Marilyn Monroe sound like Howard Cosell, and his characterization of Morrison was like Kermit the Frog on acid.

I've seen some actors give stiff performances before, but this is the first time I've ever seen stiffs give acting performances. —

HAL DAVIS MAKES MORE DECISIONS IN ONE HOUR THAN MOST RECENT COLLEGE GRADS MAKE ALL DAY.

"I'm a cavalry platoon leader, in charge of 43 men," says Hal. "I'm responsible for their education, their training, their well-being. So you can bet I'm making rapid-fire decisions all day. Decisions that have an impact on people's lives."

Army ROTC is a great way to prepare for being an Army officer. ROTC helps you develop discipline of mind and spirit. As well as your ability to make decisions under pressure.

Taking Army ROTC pays off in other ways. Like financial assistance —up to $1,000 a year for your last two years of ROTC. You could also win an ROTC scholarship, as Hal did. Each scholarship covers tuition, books, and more.

2nd Lt. Hal Davis was an industrial management major at the University of Tennessee and a member of Army ROTC.

If you'd like to step out of college and into a job with responsibility, do what Hal Davis did. Step into Army ROTC now.

And begin your future as an officer.

Campus Canine Calls For Consolidation

By Milton Overdonne

"We the members of the campus dog pack have a bone to pick with UVM. We tolerate you people over-running Billings, and being thrown out of there and classes by our ears. But we can not tolerate the refusal of stingy students to pass along food scraps to us in the Den."

These words and many others were barked to me by Rasta, the spokesman for the expanding campus canine herd. No longer the carefree, bounding, frolicsome rascals that the pups have been in the past, several whelps have bonded together in a fist-tight clan to protect themselves from the tyrannies and abuses of a university geared entirely to the education of humans.

However, there has been some reluctancy on the parts of many fur-covered citizens to join the movement. Many dogs want only to settle down to the completion of their college careers, hoping for some stroke of luck to break into the job market upon graduation.

Rasta, a smallish, scruffy light brown fellow with a fox-like face, spends much of his time in Billings and around campus rallying support for his unionizing efforts. He is often seen running full tilt in random directions, barking out his ideas to anyone who listens. "I haven't had a whole lot of success with it so far, but the idea of an organized effort is hard for some of these guys to grasp," Rasta said. "Most of these fellas are content to chase after the few bitches we got up here. Heck, some of the guys try humping each other."

Brief conversations with some of the campus beasts revealed the diverse opinions on this latest attempt to unify the animal students.

Jed, a Malamute-Wolf-Black Lab, stands above most other campus dogs. He hails from Longmont, Colorado, "where the hip dogs meet to trip," and does not have much interest in the movement. "I spend most of my time out of class on campus on a leash. But when I do get free, I try to rid the campus of macho male dogs. I'm mellow and I like it quiet."

"I got my own solution to the whole campus problem," Jed continues. "Tie the people to trees. A couple of days out in the slush rain will wipe away anyone's reluctance to let us attend classes and hang out in Billings." Jed plans to spend spring vacation writing a Philosophy paper and a Russian History paper.

The mysterious Burlington Flasher shocks downtown strollers. Authorities have few leads, but suspect the UVM pack for the recent rash of public degeneracy.

Spater (later in German), a mid-sized, long-haired, black dog, also has no time for the socialization push. "I'm a loner and don't really fit in with the pack. Sure I scuffle with the boys once in a while, but usually I just hang with Max, my human," Spater confides. "We go camping and ice climbing. We made the summit of Mt. Washington in January."

"I'm not really into classes, but I love the movies. Seventh Samurai is my favorite. As far as the Billings issue, I'm no muttier than anyone else."

The UVM pack has been a predominantly male organization in the past, with strict initiation rights. Yossarian, a ten-month-old Black Shepherd, passed one of these initiations last week when his testicles descended, gracing him with a deep and menacing growl. "My buddy's going to throw me a bow-wo-mitzfa later this week," Yos grumbled. "After that I will fight a few older pack members and carve me a place in with the guys."

Yosarian also pooh-poohs the strategies of Rasta. "I'm into new wave. Can't stand bandanas. I may dye my whiskers green and dance like my T.V. hero, Devo Dog, between classes. I'm getting a cassette with head phones at my party."

The pack recognizes Buni, an exchange student from Kenya, as a token foreigner. His name means "coffee tree" in Swahili. "I am called this for my color of tan. My plane ticket cost many dollars, $600. I do not know of the plan to make a dog club. I dislike plywood boxes because they remind me of the plane. I dislike black men because they hit me in Kenya. I sleep outside and get very cold. What is a Billings?"

Baffin, a six-month-old Newfoundland, is too young to run with the pack. "I'm still growing, but when I finish, I will be eye to eye with any food in Billings. Right now I'm just into dinner twice a day and heavy petting. I usually bag my classes and just drool on chicks. They love it. I'm planning to hit Vegas for spring break. I found a babe with a rich old man, so I'm going to gamble my paws off. If she cans me, I can always sell my body there, so I'm not worried."

Duncan, the pack lawyer.

Baffin plans to dominate the pack within a year.

One of the few canine chicks on campus, Jessie, a Border Collie, calls herself a "flirt. I like to play frisbee, but all the boys jump on me. I wish they would keep their roughhousing to themselves. When I'm waiting for my human outside of class, they show off in front of me. They're funny. I'm not going to tell them I'm spayed."

Sarge, the familiar "down town hound" known to last year's Cynic readers, still rules the streets of the Burly Town as the badest James Dean of Dogs. Cool as a cop, this part Beagle can be seen motoring in any section of the city.

"I've got no need to go joining any union," Sarge quipped. "I dig hanging out behind the Pearl St. liquor store mostly. The guys bark at my window at night and we hit the streets. I'm always in by 11:00 p.m. though, contrary to popular modern myths about me."

"I'm getting a good liberal arts background at UVM, but my favorite pastime is swiping food from Billings," Sarge confessed. "I wait, dart in when the coast is clear, and cruise. They catch me once in a while. The manager threatened to put me in a round trip to Kansas City, but I keep cool."

Steve O'Brien, the manager of the Den, knows Sarge and the other dogs quite well. "Oh they are cute, sure, but some people don't like dog saliva on their sandwiches. The mayonnaise is bad enough."

To combat the dog's possible rise in power through unionization, O'Brien supports "sending the trespassers over to Given Medical Building. If not claimed after two days in the pound over there, use them for experiment specimens."

Rasta was outraged when he heard this suggestion. He hit the ground running to spread the word. "We want our own food line in the Den. The reason we steal is that the cash registers are too high," Rasta growled before leaving.

Wheeler, a Black Lab-Husky (Siberian Lab) with short hair, blows off his classes to chase females. "I've got my priorities straight. I can kick the most ass of anyone in the pack, so I don't have much trouble getting my rocks off," Wheeler claimed. "I hang around Finbar's on weekends to get hotdogs from the lady, but most of all I like singing. I howl the blues with soul when I hear a harmonica."

Duncan, a brown labrador, is a poly sci major and the most outspoken student in the pack. "I bark, bitch, and whine when Nivola starts off on a tangent. Shoot, the material is tough enough without his digressions."

Concerning politics, Duncan said, "I totally support Rasta's efforts to get us dogs together. If he succeeds, the dogs will assume the dominant position once again on campus. We need this leverage to get our points across. It won't be easy though. The way some of these fellows spend the days cavorting and fornicating is disgusting. They will find out what the real world is like when they graduate."

Another female named Jessie, a yellow lab, does great impressions of Ronald Reagan. She also flirts with all the guys while maintaining a 3.4 average. In her business classes, Jessie controls the professors. "I usually let out a good, loud sigh ten minutes into the lecture if Professor Greif is cranking up for another sleeper. Then, with about five minutes left, I start to scratch and jingle my tags. The professors usually get my message and dismiss the class. Then the boys from the pack escort me home."

Jessie sports half of her daring Pucci bikini she will unveil in FT. Lauderdale this vacation.

"As far as the union goes, it will never happen," Jessie predicted. "Those brutes can't even agree on which lawn to wrestle on much less how to form a club."

It's clear that Rasta has his paws full trying to get this group of independent souls together. He is currently enrolled in a personnel management course and hopes his new skills will help him with his task.

"I'm approaching this like any bitch of a problem," Rasta said, "from behind."

Can Your Gas Save World Energy

By Indeed Very Goodspeed

Nuclear, solar, wind, and water power have disadvantages which everyone is familiar with. There are too many if's and but's associated with these energy sources. What is needed is a cheap, definite source which can be easily acquired. Farting is the answer to the future energy problem.

Disgusting, foul, and an utterly impossible idea are probably your first thoughts. But this has to be looked at rationally. Everyone farts! It happens to everyone practically everyday (and it is quite a common occurrence while you are sleeping). Even if you really don't fart often, a certain intake of a variety of foods can produce, quite consistently, very large ones.

How can farts be transformed into usable energy? It is quite a similar process to that used with "natural gas." Farts are gaseous when taken from their source: deep within the winding, flowing bowels of the intestinal tract. And since every human has intestines, every human can produce them. Animals can also be very productive; come sit next to my dog for more than an hour after he has eaten a can of chicken-liver flavored Alpo. Yet back to the process of transformation.

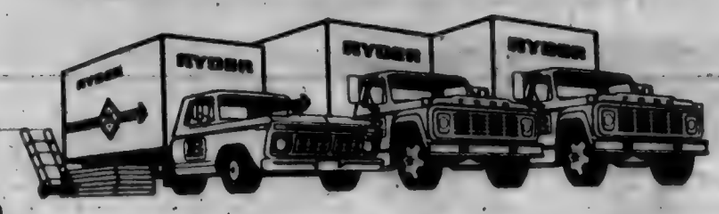
It is not the fact that farts are gaseous which is important, but that they are quite combustible. Just ask any high-schooler who has experimented with dropped drawers and a lit match. Any combustible material can be a potential energy source.

Your next question is probably, "how can you turn billions of farts, which are scattered across this huge country, into one supreme energy source capable of running the industry of America, turning the wheels of millions of automobiles, and sending men to the moon?" Save your farts! That's how it will be accomplished. Saving them, in large quantities, can be done through compression. If this proposal is carried through, everyone will carry with them a miniature version of a scuba tank. These will be about five inches long and close to two inches in diameter. They can be easily attached to your belt, or tucked under your shirt. Most likely they could be bought in various colors, to suit different clothing styles and moods.



In order to catch the gas, a small tube will run from the tank to special underwear which everyone will be required to wear. They will be similar to women's panties, only airtight. Perhaps public utilities can become involved; if you happened to forget your tank one day, booths, similar and just as common as telephone booths, could be set up around the world to tap your gas. Yet instead of paying, as you do to make a phone call, you will receive money, depending on the amount given. "Fart Booths" they will be called. Maybe even "fart accounts" could be set up. In this way individuals can contribute to the world's energy sources. Imagine the contribution when everyone in the world is doing it.

Larger tanks can be set up in the home, allowing the family members to pool their individual tanks. These tanks could be placed in every kitchen, becoming as American as the refrigerator. Psychologists and Sociologists are becoming aware of the scarcity of the close-knit family; perhaps farting could become a focal point for the family. It could replace the nightly family meals which were once so common. Remember, a family that farts together, makes energy for the nation together.

Once the tanks are full, trucks from the separate fart companies will come and empty them. Of course monetary benefits will be received. These trucks will then add to the larger reserves, thereby adding to the energy resources of the country, and even to the world.

Much research would have to be done in this area of flatulence, and careful consideration should be given to the contents within this proposal. However, the future is rapidly approaching, and it won't be long before our present energy supplies will decrease to a dangerous level. I hope this proposal will not be just an S.B.D. (silent but deadly), but a giant fart for mankind.

Blab It To Veronica

By Becky Bare

Dear Veronica,

I am firmly supporting of the furtherment of continuing later education (like college). Recently, however, my school, the University of Vermont, all of a sudden from out of nowhere just now decided that my interest in communication is not good enough, or something like that, and then they are going to be from now on next year, they're going to drop it or something. Now I am thus a bit upset because I do not know how to study any other stuff. I would just drop out of school but as I previously stated before I believe in going to school to learn stuff for after I get out and go into the real world. Besides here I like to play hockey and the guys are good guys. So what should I do for now.

Sincerely,
Rocky LeBete

Dear Rocky,

Have you tried counseling? I see here by your letter that you sent that it is noticeable that you have a dilemma. But look on the bright side, you can always take sociology, like me.

Dear Veronica,

What's all this I hear about how rotten fraternities are and how mean the boys are? Me and my girlfriends have so-o-o-o much fun going to the beer blasts and playing spin-the-bottle and other nifty games. Sure sometimes it's not as great, like when this boy threw up on my feet and I got beer dumped on my head. Anyway, my mom taught me how to sew, so the rip in my coat will be easy to fix and the burn holes in my sweater can be patched. And what's more, that fruity punch DOES come out with six washes! So what's the big deal about fraternities?

Signed,
E. Norma Stitz

Dear Norma,

Honey, have you tried counseling? It sounds like you're having a ball of a time at these parties, but there's more to life than spin-the-bottle. Have you tried Thumper, Quarters, or Post Office?

Dear Veronica,

I am a basically honest student except when it comes to Sex. In this class I find it very difficult to keep up my rigid morals. My eyes wander over everyone and their papers, making it difficult not to cheat. This came to a head at the last exam when I came late and had to sit in the front row. I had to rotate in my chair to get a good look at a paper. The professor caught me in the act with my pants down, so to speak, so I may fail the course. I have never cheated before, but Sex is too great a temptation. What method should I use to protect myself?

Urgently,
Hugh G. Rection

Dear Hugh,

You need counseling. Call me immediately at 656-4221.

Meditation Student Attains Coma

By Tim B. Shiver

By following the instructions of his meditation instructor, Dave Thatcher, a UVM sophomore, passed through his alpha level of consciousness and placed himself into a coma. This self-induced coma state was heretofore unprecedented.

"I always knew he was a great student," said Guru Mushead, "but I never suspected that he would go beyond everything that meditation students have ever done before. Not even the Siddartha got that far!"

While Mushead is fascinated with Thatcher's breakthrough, his father is busy trying to contact medical specialists willing to tackle the unusual case.

"I knew that he should have never gotten mixed up with that Chinese menu stuff," his father said. "If a guy needs to relax, he should take a nap, not dream himself into a coma."

Thatcher's mother was jolted into shock by the news. Mr. Thatcher hopes to use the same doctors for his wife and son.

While negotiations for the boy's treatment are being carried out, the patient sits in the lotus position on a rug in his living room.

"All his vital signs are stable so there is no need to put him in a hospital," his father said.

Meanwhile, philosophers and religious figures around the world are speculating on just where the boy has gone. Some eastern philosophers believe that the lad has reached nirvana and does not want to come back. Several Catholic priests feel that the young man has been called to heaven.

"What ever has happened to him, we can be sure he is in no pain," said Dr. Smithson, the family practitioner who has treated the Thatcher family for years. "David is completely numb, but very comfortable," the doctor said.

Mr. Thatcher, a Burlington native, is not very worried about his son and wife. "The house has never been more quiet. As long as they are both healthy, I think I'll just enjoy the peacefulness. Hey, maybe this meditation stuff works after all."

Bruise 'em Carol!

By Rona L. Bareit

Dateline – Hollywood – All Tinseltown's abuzz this week as the spectacular show trial of Burnett vs. the National Enquirer goes into its fifth day and believe me the hottest ticket in town is one of the gallery passes handed out every morning at the small stucco courthouse on the corner of Sunset and Vine. The issues involved in this case are, in the eyes of everyone from mogul to make-up man, cut and dried; does this two-bit scandal sheet have the right to spread lies and distortions about America's best-loved stars all the while hiding behind cheap retractions and the first amendment. In the eyes of this reporter, I might add, it's this kind of swill, this kind of pandering to the public's baser instincts that gives all publications, Cynic included, a black eye and there's nothing me and half of Hollywood would like better than to chase the scoundrels down Wilshire Boulevard with a horse-whip, anyway let's get back to the trial.

Ms. Burnett showed up for court the first day in a high-necked white dress that exuded the authoritarian air of an angellic dominitrice, lacking only the spiked heels that so many of us would have liked to have seen her drive into the tortured flesh of the Enquirer's attorney as he screamed for more. The judge greeted her entrance with a lecherous smile that immediately ended all speculation of his involvement in a homosexual love triangle with the bailiff and an unnamed, famous TV talk show host. The dewy-eyed Ms. Burnett quashed all the rumors of her suffering from a fatal disease by personally taking the stand. Her stinging testimony had the Enquirer's attorney repeatedly removing his glasses to rub the roadmap-red eyeballs that those who know claim are the first sign of alcoholism. The judge had repeatedly denied motions by the attorney for a two-week recess so that he could go one up on his battle with, what some say is, latent syphillis, at a health spa in Mexico.

Believe me there is nothing this reporter would like better than to keep covering this test case on the evils of non-objective and sensational reporting, but being the dyed-in-the-wool newshound that I am, I'm off to cover what could be the biggest scoop of the century. An Iowa man has offered me exclusive rights to a UFO story that he claims, and why shouldn't I believe him, refutes all World History before 1930.

Fly UVM Airways To Florida!

Security, Financial Aid Fund Subversive Activities

By F.F.

The protectors of democracy at UVM have succumbed to power and greed. The Cynic has learned that the Security force merged with the Financial Aid office several years ago, bought out all the Aid stock, and then replaced the Financial Aid staff with Special Olympic medalists. Funds were siphoned yearly by Security through Financial Aid "mistakes" and the accumulated capital was recently used for the purchase of two armored vans and four student retention units (see sketch).

Security is also planning an upgrade of their own staff and a list of proposed changes has been obtained: (1) Applicant must pass the eye test; (2) Applicant must pass the hearing test; (3) I.Q.'s must equal or exceed the state speed limits; (4) Applicants must have thorough knowledge of Green Eggs and Ham, the Security training manual; (5) Applicant must complete one week combat training at an area elementary school; (6)

Applicant must sit through five screenings of "Triumph of the Will," (a German training film); (7) Applicant must pass the driving competency exam by going out to Burger King, over to Dunkin Donuts, then back with the food still palatable; (8) Applicant must survive Security initiation night.

The Cynic has also learned that Security instigated the recent fraternity scandals and evidence has been uncovered for a similar conspiracy at a local sorority, Alpha Delta Pi. A check payable to a radical men's group was discovered by a student when he found it used accidentally as a parking ticket on his bicycle. This men's group is a combination of Red Sox fans and Green Peace members, who live together in Provincetown, Mass. Spokesman and leader for the group, Will Hugh Buggermi said they were made aware of the extortion and cult murders going on at ADPi by a phone call from the Security office. At a demonstration in front of the sorority, Buggermi had a big sign with the words, "Stop It You Brutes You." He also mentioned that this demonstration would boost present stock prices, increase attendance at the next function, and raise money for summer formals.

The students have decided to form their own group in response to the mounting security threat, the Student Defense Club. Organized through the energies and generosity of some local women, the first meeting will be posted.

UVM SUMMER SESSION

Combine studies and sunshine at UVM this summer. If this sounds intriguing, consider the possibilities . . .

FOUR GOOD REASONS WHY:

1 A LEARNING EXPERIENCE. Imagine sitting on the green at Redstone Campus, your books piled around you, and the vista of Lake Champlain and the Adirondacks spread before you.

2 LOWER TUITION. Vermont residents pay $53.00 per credit; out-of-state students pay $75.00 per credit. (Medical courses have higher rates.)

UVM Bunny Likes Chicks

By Hare Doubleday

Admitted on the Equal Opportunities to Clever Mammals Act passed by Vermont Senator Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), MacArthur, the only officially enrolled rabbit at UVM, enjoys his celebrity status.

"I'm riding two scholarships to be here. Since I am a New Zealand rabbit, I get money from that country's consulate in Washington, and the EOCM act covers everything else and more. I usually have enough cash left over to entertain a few bunnies."

Entertaining bunnies is what MacArthur really jams on. "I don't have much fellow rabbit company, but I find human bunnies quite enjoyable. They dig my ears."

A typical evening with MacArthur includes dinner and stories.

"I usually have my dates whip up some Hungarian goulash (my favorite) and I bring the wine. After dinner we pet and I tell stories of my travels. I've been to Disney World, Ohio, and Maine in a car. I'm fluent on seven C.B. channels."

While in class, MacArthur rarely takes notes.

"I keep up for the first eight minutes or so, but after that my eye lids just get too heavy. A professor caught me once and threatened to get Welsh with me, whatever that is."

The only complaints MacArthur has about UVM concern the library.

"For some reason, the librarians think I'm a dog, and keep ejecting me from the place. I have to show them my I.D. everyday."

MacArthur started out as a botany major but says his "mouth watered too much in class. Now I study sociology so I can understand my family. Psychology was useful for the first one hundred kids, but now I have to understand their feelings as a group."

MaCarthur sneers at a sign that causes him much grief.

Find Direction in Your Life

Have you ever been hiking and wanted to strike off on your own away from the crowded trails but been worried about getting lost? Knowledge of the proper use of a compass and a topographic map can help prevent you from getting lost and also provides a way of becoming more in tune and aware of your surroundings when you are out in the wilds.

If you are interested in developing some map and compass skills, come to Living/Learning C-170 on Thursday, April 9 at 6:30 for a free workshop.

Study In Exciting El Salvador

Dean Jewett today announced plans for a new foreign study program. The program, run through the UVM Communications Dept., will offer 15 credits to students spending a semester in El Salvador. Students will study at the University of El Salvador, San Salvador Branch. Fields of study will include "Communications and the Oppressive Regime," "Torture and the Modern World," and "Advanced Genocide." Inquiries should be directed to the UVM Office of Intervention in Foreign Affairs.

VSPA Means Business

If you are interested in meeting the business community, making contacts, or just learning to be comfortable with business people VSPA can help. The Vermont Society of Personnel Administrators is a local group affiliated with a national organization, ASPA.

This organization consists of 25 students of all majors meeting Thursday evenings at 7:00 in 319 Terrill Hall. Gatherings are informal and there is no charge for joining. Past events have included a workshop in Stowe on the changing roles of women in the business world, and another on compensation. After dinner and guest speakers, cocktails were served, as students mingled with area business people. This semester a social event is planned for mid-April, which will be attended by faculty, VSPA members, and guest lecturers. A trip to a southern Vermont industry and an internship program for credits are also in the making.

Learn to Lead a Practical Life

The Practical Life Skills Program is looking for any interested students for the upcoming year. If interested in program and living in Living/Learning Center, please contact Sam (x4417) or Darlene (x4084) for more information.

Seminars for YOU

March 26: The Graduate Student Role in Grants and Grantwriting, 12 noon, Dr. Robert Lawson, Associate Vice President for Research, Dean of the Graduate School.

April 9: Graduate Student Involvement in Grants and Grantwriting, 12 noon – panel of students currently involved in funded research projects.

All of the lectures will be held in the Living/Learning Center Commons on Thursdays from 12 noon to 1:30 p.m. Refreshments will be provided.

VPIRG Internships

The Vermont Public Interest Research Group is offering two summer internships for students interested in working either part or full-time in the Montpelier Office. One internship will involve work on several current environmental issues, hazardous wastes, toxic chemicals in the workplace and the Clean Air Act. The other will focus on the political campaign to renew the Clean Air Act.

Previous experience not necessary; for more info, call VPIRG at 223-5221.

SA for the Precipitation of Nuclear Holocost

The SAPNH has announced it has received grants totalling 56 million dollars from several corporations and foreign investors. President Rock Brickhead says that the grants will go towards establishing nuclear capacity for the fledgling student organization. According to recent reports the group has already designed its warhead and has in its possession the proper amount of U-238. The target date for this student-organized armageddon is Jan. 1, 1981. A sure cure for those post-Christmas blues.

SA Concerts

Freshmen and Sophomores – The Concert Bureau Work Crew applications will be available Thursday, April 9 in the Student Association office, Billings.

Social Work Discussion

Interested in Social Work as a Career? Wondering Where the Jobs Will Be? Considering Going to Graduate School? Discussion of these and allied issues at the Information Session, Thursday, March 26, 4:00 p.m. Rowell Room 110. Sponsored by Adelphi/Vermont Social Work Program (863-5731).

Alter Your Environment

The Slade Hall environmentalist plan an open forum on mushroom growing as the third segment in their "How to Keep Your Environment Altered" program. Topics will include concealing your patch, obtaining cow dung without getting dirty, increasing potency and lying about the quality of your shrooms. The discussion will be preceded by the serving of a large salad and followed by the showing of psychedelic movies. The discussion will take place at 8:00 p.m., March 31st, in Slade Hall.

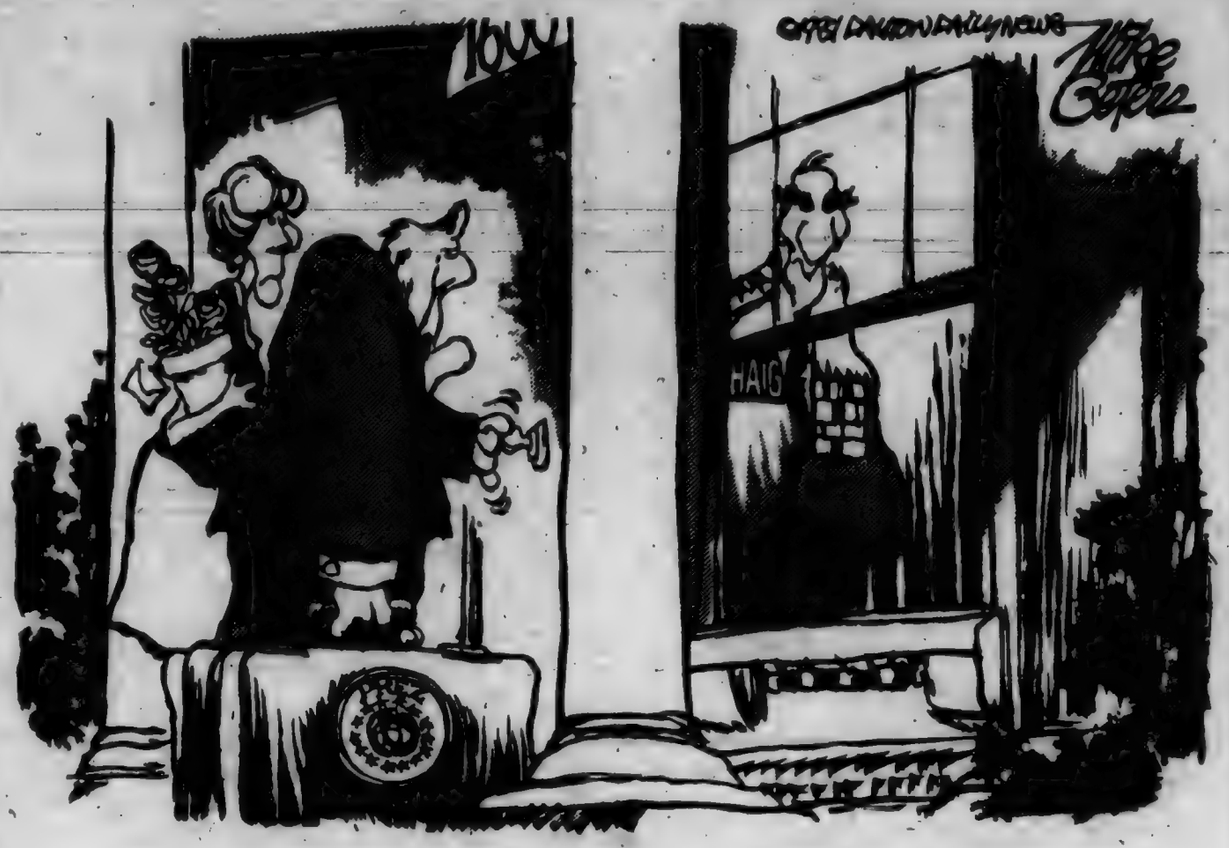
A Decision Based On What Testimony?

The Arts and Sciences Curriculum Committee has returned its verdict: "On the basis of testimony," the Committee has recommended that the Communications department be closed down after those currently enrolled graduate.



On what testimony was the Curriculum Committee's recommendation based?

Most of the testimony, besides that of Dean Jewett and Dr. Manchel, has after all overwhelmingly favored revitalization of the now sub-standard program. The testimony of the Communications students' steering committee and the Communications faculty, the long overdue support expressed by the large student-faculty turnout at Monday afternoon's rally, and a growing campus consensus all call on the Administration to rebuild a department that is certainly not beyond repair, as the Dean insists.

With the support of Dean Jewett— whose ultimate responsibility it is to ensure that all departments in Arts and Sciences are of an acceptable quality— and with the new full time faculty positions it had originally been budgeted and some much needed financial resources, the Communications department would be as vital as UVM departments that are well funded and responsibly administered.

Surely the most revealing "testimony" for consideration is that Dean Jewett chose Frank Manchel to ride the department out the next three years while providing a "coherent program" for those now enrolled in Communications, as the Committee recommended apologetically. Though he may be a fine film critic, Dr. Manchel seems somewhat less than qualified to coordinate a comprehensive communications program, and he has reportedly had a long-standing personality conflict with some of the department's faculty. Furthermore, he will be "chairman" of the department he wants to see dissolved.

It is conceivable that at an American university in the democratic New England tradition, there are some decisions which should not be based solely on the testimony in "closed" meetings at Waterman. In this case especially, the students themselves have shown concern for a university policy that could now harness a new energy source for the Communications department rather than waste it, and that would hire at least a caretaker for the department, not an undertaker.

Letters To The Editor

The High Court Knows It's Hogwash

To the Editor:

The law of Vermont mandatorily requires that Judges be retired when they reach 70 years of age.

In 1974, in a case known as Aronstam vs. Cashman, 132 Vt. 538, 325 A 2d 361, the Vermont Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the mandatory retirement law by saying that when persons reach 70 years of age they pose a threat to high judicial standards and it is not in the public interest for people 70 or over to run for judgeship public office, nor are the people permitted to select such a candidate or to vote for such a candidate.

By setting 70 years as the only standard, without requirement of a competancy examination, the High Court is saying that the 70 year criteria establishes an entire class as inferior to all other adult people in this State.

This is hogwash and the High Court knows it. The High Court, after holding that mandatory retirement is the law of the State, at 70, appointed an 80 year old person to the Superior Court Bench, who has worked regularly for at least the past three years.

What bothers me is the kind of judicial integrity that declares the law, which prohibits a class of people to run for public office and which takes away the right to vote for a candidate of the people's choice, is valid, and after, misuses its power to violate the same law.

UVM Does Nothing; Cynic "Slanted"

To the Editor:

As an alumna of the University of Vermont and former Co-ordinator of the UVM Women's Organization, I am distressed by the lack of action of the University administration on the alleged Sigma Nu rape, as well as the Cynic's coverage of the ensuing demonstration. The "Sigma Nu incident" is not an isolated one and should not be treated as such. Many rapes go unreported. Rape is a problem at UVM, as it is at any other University. Unlike other universities, however, UVM does nothing. Within two days of a rape on the Boston University campus, security was tightened and an escort service started.

Also, I feel the Cynic coverage of the demonstration was slanted. The shouts of "castration" which came from the demonstrating women, were out of anger and frustration at the situation, not out of sheer man-hating which is the impression the article leaves. My contact with other women in Burlington, as well as my faith in the women's community there, leads me to believe the women were not viewing castration as the solution to rape for this would imply that rape is an act of sex as opposed to an act of violence. However, rape is an act of violence, and until it is treated as other violent crimes are, with actions and not only words, we women will continue to be angry and to demonstrate.

Get Your Facts Straight

To the Editor:

Some may call it nit-picking, but I call it stating the facts. Jennifer Weiss' review of NRBQ at Hunt's last week contained some false information which could have been rectified before publication had she done some research.

The group's first album "NRBQ" was released in 1969 and was their only LP on the Columbia label. The group has been together since 1968, as bassist Joey Spampinato mentioned in an interview with WRUV-FM on Monday, March 16 – not 1974, as it was printed. After two releases in 1971 and 1972 on Buddha/Kama Sutra and Amuit Coptis Records, respectively, they began recording with Red Rooster/Rounder, and their only effort with Mercury Records was "NRBQ at Yankee Stadium." Their four LP's since then are on Red Rooster/Rounder Records.

Most people are aware of the fact that Carl Perkins is recognized as the father of rhythm n' blues and rockabilly music, and was the prime innovator of rock and roll during the 50's. His all-time classic "Blue Suede Shoes" was released in 1958, when NRBQ was still banging on pots and pans. Although NRBQ and Carl Perkins recorded an album together in 1971, "Boppin' the Blues," he has never been a member of the group, as was stated.

There is an invaluable musical resource on the UVM campus called WRUV-FM. I'm sure anyone there would be happy to share and verify information when it is needed.

Sincerely,

Individual Responsibility

To the Editor:

The recent allegations of rape against eight men of Sigma Nu is, I feel (and I don't believe that I am alone), a case where justice is, at best, questionable. Yet few would question the edict of "innocent until proven guilty." And surely the victim of the crime cannot be blamed for not pressing charges.

The accused individuals cannot be persecuted on rumor.

Innocence or guilt in no way depends on what has been proven, though.

Now it is up to those people close to the accused to discover the truth. Those who pretend all has been settled simply because "there is no proof" – especially the friends and family of these men – are, in my view, committing a serious injustice and ignoring a very real obligation to society.

If any of these men were an acquaintance of mine, I would have to know, know in my heart, that they were innocent before I could ever consider them a friend.

When our legal system has failed to uncover the truth, it is up to each individual to do so and behave according to the answer.

Canine Capers

To the Editor:

I would just like to voice strong discontent with the "Canine Capers" that constantly occur in the Billings Den. Despite the fact that dogs are a health hazard and violate health laws by being in public dining halls, they frequent Billings Den as if it were a kennel. I've already complained to a supervisor to no avail. Maybe a special section of the dining hall can be roped off for these animals and those who wish to associate with and/or feed them. Ideally, maybe the "powers that be" can monitor the doors to prohibit these unwashed health hazards from entering. Either way, the better interests of those who do not appreciate their plates being licked by starving dogs who have no business being in the area would be justly served. Thank you.

Sincerely,
Tom Nuccio

Vermont Yankee

Another Three Mile Island?

By Paul Markowitz

On March 28, 1979, the United States experienced the worst accident in the history of commercial nuclear power generation. The two year anniversary of the accident at Three Mile Island (TMI) serves as an appropriate focal point for reflecting upon the adequacy and enforcement of safety standards in nuclear power plants. Specifically, this article will compare the lessons and circumstances of Three Mile Island with the state of nuclear power in Vermont, and probe into the question of, "What have we learned from the mistakes of TMI?"

According to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC), Metropolitan Edison (the utility that operates TMI) was in a state of 35 non-compliances (safety violations) at the time of the accident. It is a small wonder that the Presidential Commission established to conduct a comprehensive study and investigation of the accident had this to conclude:

"To prevent nuclear accidents as serious as Three Mile Island, fundamental changes will be necessary in the organization, procedures, and practices – and above all – in the attitudes of the NRC..."

Thirty-five safety violations? What seems incomprehensible about the whole issue is the blatant ignorance and violation of standards that had been established to protect the lives of thousands and thousands of people. How could such a situation have existed? The answer to that question is the crux of the commission's investigation and again I quote:

"With its present organization, staff and attitudes, the NRC is unable to fulfill its responsibilities for providing an acceptable level of safety for nuclear plants."

This conclusion is not all that startling when one considers the inherent difficulties the NRC has in maintaining objectivity in an industry which they have overseen the distribution of billions of dollars.

Estimates of the total costs of the accident range in the billions of dollars, and increased incidences of miscarriages and other adverse health indices are just beginning to surface and will continue to be more prominent in the future. By the nature of radiation, the full impacts of the accident will never be fully calculable. Andrea Chesman, a Harrisburg resident at the time of the accident and now residing in the Burlington area, explains her reactions to the whole situation:

"Two years after the accident at TMI, no real progress has been made on the cleanup. No one even knows who will pay for the cleanup. Preliminary cleanup decisions have been based on cost, not on safety of the people in the area. I left Harrisburg because I felt the radioactive leaks were continuing, and the situation was getting worse, not better."

So, two years after the tragedy of TMI, what have we as Vermonters learned from the experience? The prevailing sentiment can be divided into two segments: 1) A thankfulness for living outside the vicinity of Harrisburg, Pa., and 2) the fallacious misconception that, "It could never happen to us." But can we be so sure?

It is no small secret that the Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Plant has experienced prolonged and continual shutdowns since its start-up in 1972. In 1973 and 1980 alone, the plant was closed for a period of 138 and 100 days, respectively. According to plant spokesman, Steve Stoll, since 1976, Vermont Yankee (and eventually the ratepayers) have paid out to the tune of $11 million in repair to its safety system. To enumerate just a few of the problems the plant has experienced in 1980:

1. In early June, a valve malfunction caused thousands of gallons of water to leak into the containment area and closed the plant for 3 days.

2. A week later a leaking valve in the turbine system produced a "scram" and stopped all systems from operating.

3. A scheduled 9 week shutdown stretched into 3 months with the discovery of leaky pipes in the water cleanup system. A 60 foot section of pipe has a half dozen faulty welds and suffers from internal corrosion. Even Vermont Yankee officials were puzzled as to the cause of the corrosion.

4. The replacement of 39 percent or 3200 bolts to the piping support system after discovering some had been cut short and others had been welded over holes to make it appear as if they were in place.

5. The operation for much of the year without a renewal of its water discharge permit from the Water Resources Board (Vt.)

6. The storage pool contains twice as much nuclear waste than it was designed to hold.

And most recently:

7. The discovery of a hole in a waste drum which leaked out radioactive wastes.

The Vermont Yankee Decommissioning Alliance (VYDA) has requested that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission undertake a full and public investigation regarding some of these and other safety concerns. In a lengthy response to this request, the NRC's concluding remarks contained this statement:

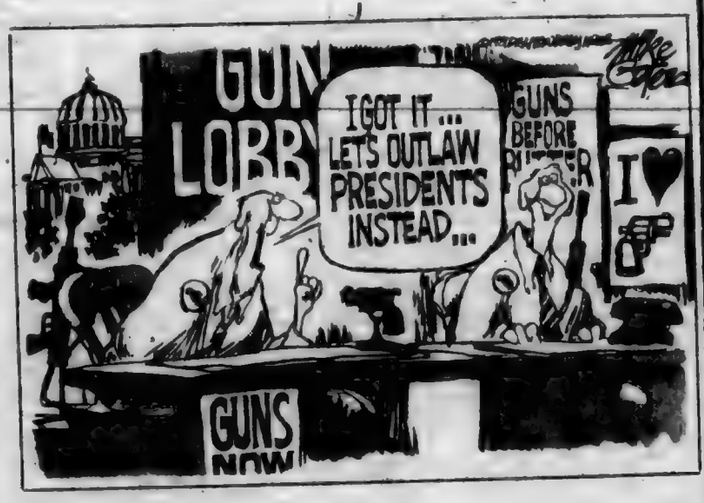
"The licensee (Vermont Yankee) was responsibly addressing previously identified NRC concerns, the licensee's corrective action toward resolution of these concerns is acceptable to the NRC, and there is sufficient assurance that Vermont Yankee can continue to operate without undue risk to the public safety and health."

In light of the previously mentioned Presidential Commission's comments regarding the NRC's ability to fairly monitor the industry's actions, this response was not totally surprising.

The VYDA eventually turned their energies to the state level, and convinced Richard Saudek, Chairman of the Public Service Board (PSB) to bring in an outside expert to investigate the pipe corrosion problem. Prof. Robert Stout of Lehigh University, an expert in metallurgy, examined the situation, and determined the cause of the problem to be a chemical reaction known as "stress corrosion." He is reviewing inspection procedures to assure the pipes will be checked often enough to prevent future leaks, and his decision on whether the pipes should be replaced will be forthcoming following extensive testing. This investigation called for by the PSB is commendable, but the inquiry should not stop there. Repeated incidences of breakdowns and safety violations, only some of which are mentioned in this article, are ample evidence a full and public investigation is required here to assure an impartial and extensive disclosure of the health of Vermont Yankee.

The VYDA has asked Governor Snelling for the creation of a special citizen's commission to investigate safety operations at the plant. The commission would include representatives from the governors of the tri-state area of Vermont, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts; representatives from Franklin, Mass., Cheshire counties; unaffiliated citizens, nuclear critics as well as proponents; and representatives from the tri-state Public Service Boards. The commission will oversee an independently hired staff of contractors, clerical workers and full-time directors who will investigate safety operations and management practices. All findings will be made public and public hearings will be held mid-way through the investigation.

No one party seems willing to take the responsibility for finding the extent of safety violations which exist within the plant. The NRC, as previously mentioned, believes Vermont Yankee has the problems well in hand. Governor Snelling says he doesn't have the authority to initiate such an investigation.

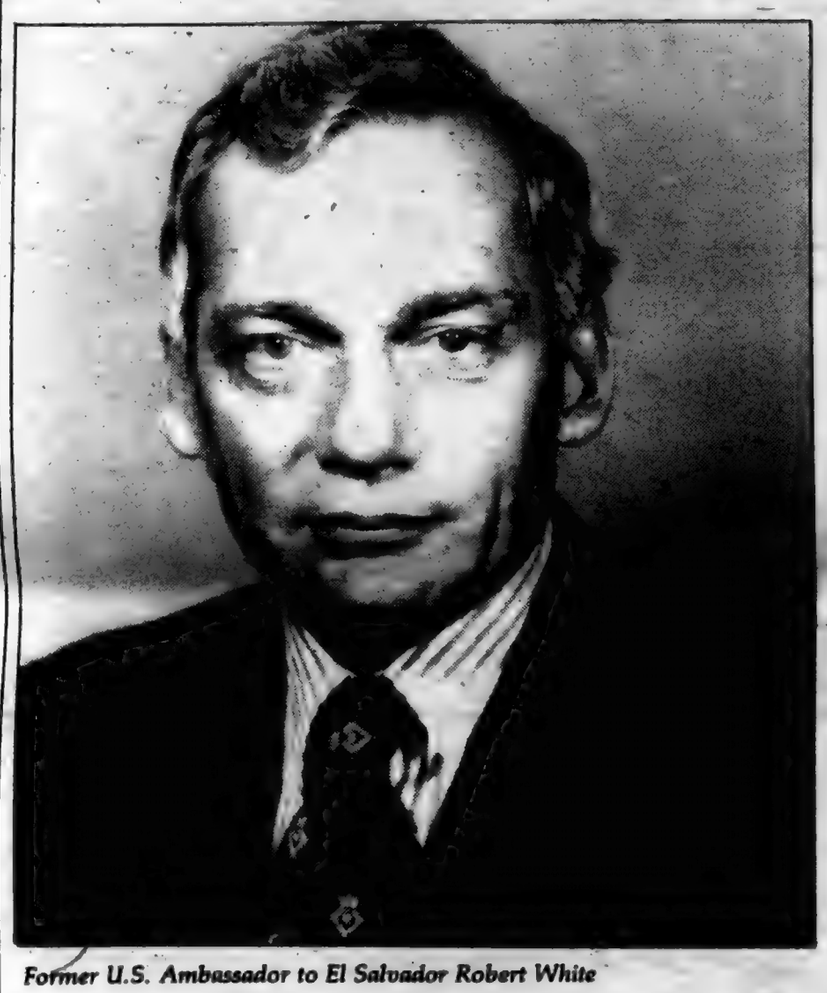


The question is, "Do we want to see another Three Mile Island here in Vermont?" We know the plant has had a history of faulty workmanship – its present history is full of costly breakdowns and safety violations. In the words of Drew Maples, an activist and member of VYDA and Rising Sun Coalition, "What are they afraid of finding?"

The governor failed to initiate a private investigation, and the Vermont Yankee Decommissioning Alliance, along with other concerned groups, staged a Warning Strike on April 5th in front of Vermont Yankee as a means for expressing their belief that the plant poses a threat to "our sacred rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." The time for action is now. Let us find out the full facts of Vermont Yankee's state of health before we see history repeat itself.

Reagan is visionary "mercenary"

Ex-Ambassador: U.S. Out of El Salvador



By Evans-Raymond Pierre

"A short hand version... of U.S. policy towards Latin America since WW II has been fear of revolution." – Robert White, former U.S. Ambassador to the war torn Central American republic of El Salvador.

A State Department employee since 1955, White resigned from his position as Ambassador to El Salvador in late January. At Patrick Gymnasium on April 6th, White told a large audience that the U.S.'s fear of revolution in Latin America "...has been so great that we have... consistently shored up the economic elites and the military establishment... we backed repression throughout the hemisphere. We uncritically supported dictatorships, we winked at repression, we tolerated corruption, and we participated in the perversion of the democratic process."

White hinted that the Carter Administration had initiated structural change in El Salvador. At the same time, the Administration attempted to encourage land reform, opposed the extreme right, attempted to shift the loyalties of the military from the "oligarchy" to the "democratic elements," and to undercut the extreme left's growing appeal.

"When you try to create an intelligent foreign policy concerning Latin America," stated White, "...you have to keep in mind a number of considerations... The American people's craving for simplicity. We want things easy, we want to understand them, we want to be able, to wrap them up in a slogan." This American yearning for simplicity in foreign policy, according to the former Ambassador, has led to two "archtypes" competing for American approval: the "Popeye archtype" of "law and order... through strength and toughness," versus "the archtype of the missionary U.S., helping the poor abroad and bringing its values to those who suffer in the dark." Neither of the stereotypes fit today's world, said White. Instead of carefully analyzing the situation in El Salvador, "Americans prefer to blame other Americans" for the failures of American foreign policy. The "purists," White's definition for the liberals and the leftists, indict the "corrupt, militaristic or capitalist establishment" for what they regard as the failure of the "missionary" duty of the U.S. to do away with the world's political and economic "diseases." White referred to another camp as being "in the grip of a high noon vision of the U.S. and its role abroad," and which blames idealists and liberals for a lack of any understanding of power. Of this latter group, White commented "they have gone dangerously far in convincing... themselves, the American public, our friends and foes, that the U.S. is being dragged into decline by domestic enemies."

Former U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador Robert White

Turning his attention to El Salvador, White cited a Cornell University economic study which concluded that "the highest percentage of landless people in the world live in El Salvador" while the "...economic elites have ruled through the military... since 1933... Elections were always rigged." White described the Latin American nation as having "the greatest disparity of wealth between the rich and poor in the continent."

White did not conceal his support for the present Salvadorean government of the Christian Democrats and Napoleon Duarte. "This government has done more for El Salvador than all the rest of the governments combined over the last fifty years."

White said Duarte's government expropriated every farm above five-hundred hectares. "This land constituted the backbone of the oligarchy of El Salvador." White went as far as calling Duarte's reform the "...most profound land reform in Latin America since Mexico's [in 1917]." He said this reform was "more political than it was economic" since it destroyed the power base of the fourteen most powerful families in El Salvador. Eighty to 90 percent of the "oligarchy," according to White, left El Salvador as a direct result of this new land policy.

But White criticized the Duarte government for its failure to "...control certain elements in the security forces" which he said have been responsible for two-thirds of the approximate 10,000 deaths in the country's civil war.

Again defending Carter's policy in El Salvador, White argued that the State Department was "...trying to assist the Salvadorean revolutionary government to come up with... a program that could serve as a model for social and economic change through the hemisphere." He said Latin America desperately needs a non-communist model for change. "As long as Fidel Castro is the only model – and that is a disastrous example – then you are going to have this constant U.S. temptation to back reaction."

Of the leftist guerillas, White said, "two years ago they could put 200,000 people in the streets. Today they cannot put 2,000 people in the streets. Their mass appeal has gone."

According to White, most of the leftists are neither communists nor terrorists. He described them as people who "...organized themselves against oppression... when they presented their demands to the landlord, the landlord spoke to the security forces, and the security forces drove these people off their land."

With no place to go the leftists turned to Cuba and Nicaragua for political and military assistance. In early January the leftist guerillas called for a final military offensive, and at the same time asked the Salvadoran population to refuse to work and rebel against the government. Their pleas went unheard, and the last offensive ended in defeat at the hands of the army. White made it clear that the Carter administration's involvement in the defeat of the leftists was minimal. "The Salvadoran government defeated the guerillas without one cartridge even coming from the U.S.," he stated.

White lashed out at President Reagan's decision to send military advisors and military aid to El Salvador as "mindless." Neither President Duarte nor the Salvadorean Defense Minister wanted this increased military assistance or military advisors according to White. The Ambassador accused Reagan and his advisors of viewing all foreign relations problems as "East-West confrontations." The Reagan Administration "seeks a military solution to problems that are not susceptible to military solutions." He further complained that the present Administration "...has now left the door open to the right, and it has... rejected an offer from [West German Chancellor] Willy Brandt to assist in a negotiated solution."

White concluded by making the point that the Reagan Administration "delinked military assistance from human rights considerations," thereby providing "to a weakening left which has demonstrated again its political and military weakness... a propaganda victory, by blowing out of all proportion its threat to this government."

George Aiken Lecture Series:

By Eliot Bergson

Due to the American press's "major" impact on the formulation and implementation of governmental policy, the media should seek to do a better, "more responsible," job reporting the news to the American people, said W. Hodding Carter, keynote speaker of the Seventh Annual George D. Aiken Lecture Series held Tuesday.

"As a class and as a rule, reporters are well-informed, serious, and work very hard, but the media as a whole has failed to meet the responsibility that goes along with the First Amendment," the former Department of State spokesman said.

Carter became a familiar face to Americans during the Iranian crisis, leading the daily, hour-long briefings designed to "feed the press."

"The dirty little reality, even in post-Watergate America, is that the press and government are too close," Carter explained. He said the fact that only four or five newspapers – "and none of the big ones" – conducted a rigorous study of President Reagan's "White Paper" on El Salvador is proof of this irresponsibility.

"How well does the media help people understand the world and their nation's policies? Not well enough," he explained. The fact that the media has become such a lucrative business is preventing the industry from doing its job properly, he said, because in some cases, newspapers are reluctant to add more reporters to their staffs because it would not be profitable.

Carter also said that the very nature of the media's process of gathering, editing, and reporting the news today is a shortcoming that has produced "irresponsible" reporting. Television news, for example, cannot include many underlying policies and causes of events in the usual 90 second film sequence. This distorts people's perceptions, he explained, and in turn distorts

Students Rally for Department; Committee Recommends Closing

By Jonathan Goodspeed

Communication students carried their denouncement of Arts and Science Dean John Jewett's proposal calling for the dissolution of the Communication Department to new heights Monday in an open demonstration on the Green. Their efforts, however, may have been in vain for the college's Administrative Curriculum Committee announced Wednesday their recommendation to discontinue the department.

A crowd of about 250 people gathered around the speakers in front of Waterman under warm, sunny skies Monday noon, and listened to Communication students publicly repudiate the Dean's proposal. Incoming Student Association president Dave Stewart also registered his disapproval of the proposal by reading a statement of unanimous S.A. Senate support for the Communication students' position.

"The department is unstable because of the lack of the Administration's support," said senior Tod Warner, standing on the fountain and speaking through a bullhorn. "The decision to phase out the department was made prior to the decision to end admissions." The crowd cheered as Warner and senior Jim Blouin poured water on a copy of Jewett's proposal, saying, "This just doesn't hold water."

Afterward, the crowd walked to Waterman, listening to reggae music supplied by several WRUV deejays. Stewart spoke of the S.A.'s lack of support for Jewett's proposal, and Senior Howard Lincoln, another member of the Student Steering Committee, read a letter addressed to President Coor.

"In our view," said Lincoln, "the College of Arts and Sciences' Administration has been unresponsive to the present and future needs of the students and faculty of the Communications Department, and irresponsible in its most recent recommendation to terminate the degree program."

In accordance with this statement, the students demanded "the immediate resignation of Frank Manchel as Chairman of the Department of Communication, that the President's office appoint a new interim chairperson, that the College Curriculum Committee support the implementation of the 1979 Communication Self Study report, and that admissions to the Communication degree program be reopened for the 1982-83 academic year."

On Wednesday, the College Curriculum Committee, the first of many boards to review Jewett's proposal before it is presented to the University Board of Trustees, "reluctantly concluded that the problems facing the Department of Communication seem beyond solution under the present circumstances. This Committee, therefore, recommends to the faculty of the College of Arts and Sciences the discontinuation of the Department of Communication as at present constituted."

The Curriculum Committee, however, added that they "recommend, before the final discontinuation of the department, a University-wide Committee be appointed to consider the future location of that faculty and the development of a coherent program in Communication at UVM."

Sanders: Enforce Law to Pacify Spring Fling

By Grove Potter

Burlington Mayor Bernard Sanders let it be known in no uncertain terms during a meeting with UVM students last Tuesday that any "stupid acts of violence" perpetrated during the traditional downtown year-end celebration "Spring Fling" will not be tolerated.

Mayor Sanders spoke about Spring Fling to the Student Association during his first day in office, hoping to defuse the blow-out that has left the intersection at Church and Main a veritable wasteland of broken glass and damaged property the day after final exams for the past several years.

"Many kids are not aware that when they do certain things, they are insulting the people of the city," the Mayor said. "All we want is consideration and respect."

Citing what other observers have called preferential treatment towards students by the police, Sanders said that this year everyone will be treated equally. "If you break the law, you can expect to be punished."

"I obviously do not believe in breaking heads," Sanders said. But if someone blatantly breaks the law in front of a police officer, he will be arrested, Sanders said.

The State Liquor Commission will also be working in the area "making sure that anyone who is drunk will not be served," Sanders said. But this commission is undermanned, he added.

The Mayor mentioned the use of student marshals as a possible aid in reducing destruction. He feels that students concerned about safety and interested in helping prevent violence and vandalism at the affair might help calm down overzealous partiers. "In this case, peer pressure can be very effective," Sanders said.

Several S.A. Senators raised questions about the effectiveness of this and about possible retaliation against student patrols. A "buddy system," where friends watch out and perhaps restrain each other was mentioned as an alternative.

"We know it's not correct to say that it's just UVM students" causing the trouble, the Mayor said. In fact, Keith Miser, Dean of Students, said that half of the crowd is not affiliated with any college or university in the Burlington area. The effectiveness of student marshals in confronting non-students was also questioned.

The S.A. formed an Ad Hoc committee to address the problems with Spring Fling and to develop possible solutions to them.

Spring Fling is a celebration and a release of year-end tensions, but the violence connected with it must stop, was the mayor's message. "Celebration and music is nice — hanging around and committing stupid acts of violence is not nice," Sanders said.

Media's Impact On Foreign Policy

By Evans-Raymond Pierre and Lynn Cline

Keith Fuller, President and General Manager of the Associated Press, delivered the concluding address of the seventh annual George D. Aiken Lecture series Tuesday evening, addressing "The Impact of the Media on United States Foreign Policy: View from the Media."

"I'm extremely glad you didn't invite the Mayor of Burlington to greet me tonight. Now there's someone I could argue with," Fuller said of Bernard Sanders, who insisted earlier in the day that the press's corporate interests perpetuate oppression in the world.

Fuller, who has recently returned from Eastern Europe, lost no time in lashing out against those communist regimes, and said "I never found one thing in a communist country that I wanted to bring back to this country."

Comparing the American press to its counterpart in other nations, Fuller declared that in the latter there was "plenty of room for criticism." "It is the exception rather than the rule for a government to be separated from the media," said Fuller.

According to Fuller, the Associated Press "stands apart from the State Department" not because the agency is "anti-government," but because it works as a watchdog over the government. "However, our aims are not that different," Fuller said of the State Department and his AP.

Fuller believes that the American media is much more effective overseas, when people in other nations realize that the American press is not controlled by the U.S. government. "I know," boasted Fuller, "that the AP report is well regarded, believed and read."

While Sergi Losov, head of the Soviet Union's Tass news agency, and other people working for government-controlled news agencies, must "grovel" at the feet of their governments, Fuller declared that he was

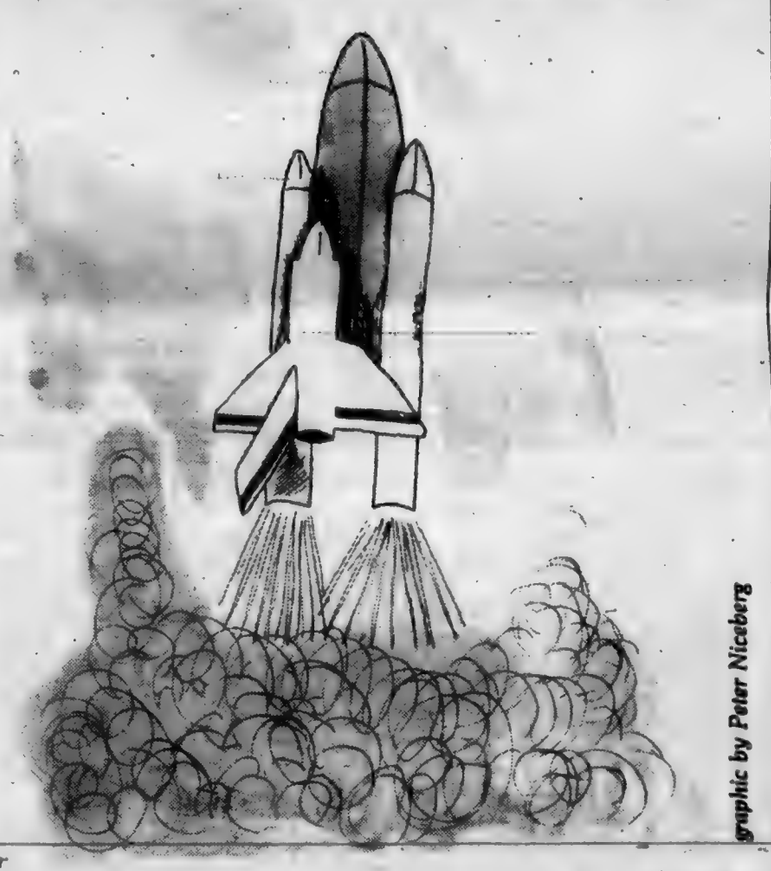
A Perfect Landing on Runway 39-A

By Wendy Goodrich

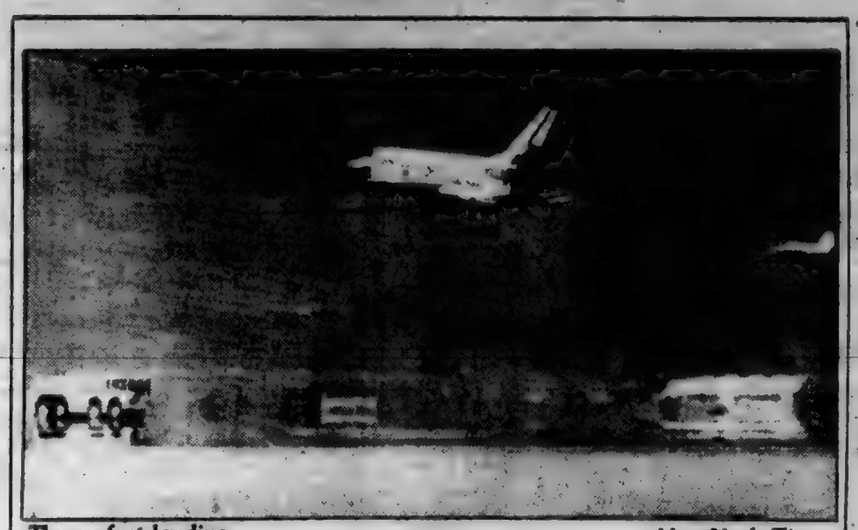
On Tuesday, April 14 at 1:20 EST the Space Shuttle Columbia glided to a perfect landing on runway 39A at Edwards Air Force Base in California. Ushered in by two Air Force jets, the Shuttle came out of the sky and landed "right on the money," Columbia's successful launching last Sunday into the sunrise off the coast at Cape Canaveral, Florida, and its graceful landing on Tuesday, commenced a new age of American space flight history.



"Plagued by delays" has become a popular media characterization of the Space Shuttle over the past two years. At 6:35 a.m. on Friday, April 10, the initial take-off date, the term reaffirmed itself. The back-up computer on board the Shuttle failed to communicate with the four primary computers that controlled Columbia's course on its 54½ hour journey around the Earth. The Houston Launch Control Center described the mishap as "a problem in the software of the computer system," and went on to explain that a simple difference between a one and a zero in the program could cause the computer communications gap. At 9:00 a.m. NASA officials were still pondering whether the Shuttle would get off the ground that morning, and by 10:00 a.m. the announcement was made that the launch would be put off until Sunday morning.

Although the Columbia has suffered numerous setbacks since its construction began, the maiden voyage made all the waiting worth it. The landing, the key to Columbia's unique spaceplane design, was a spectacular display of skill and technological accomplishment.

The Shuttle is the most technologically complex transportation vehicle designed, built, and tested to date, and its success holds vast potential for man's future in space. The objectives of the Shuttle architects — NASA, The Rockwell Corporation, and IBM — were to develop a cheap, reusable flight transport system, hence its name Space Transportation System. Such a system will simplify the building and development of commercial, communications, planetary probe and weather satellites, reduce costs of repeated flights by reusing the same ship, provide a comfortable living environment for two crew men and ten passengers, and allow cargo space for numerous experimental projects.



The cargo area is one of the Shuttle's most interesting characteristics. It was designed to give space to those people who wish to buy payload area. "Getaways" is the term used to describe payload. Canisters can be bought for $3000-$10,000 and can contain material for experimental projects. This idea was meant to expand creative thinking into action in space, and it is generally geared towards young people who wish to exploit the potential that space exploration presents.

By far the greatest outcome of the Shuttle, however, is that it promotes international exploration and development of space. Various European countries are already building a space laboratory that will soon become a permanent part of the space plane. China and Indonesia have also showed interest in joining the U.S. on future Shuttle flights, and many universities around the world have projects ready to test in space.

For the United States, the success of the first test mission of the Columbia restored a sense of national pride and achievement and drew attention away from domestic and foreign problems. In a time of rising inflation and a shaky economy, the $8.3 billion Space Shuttle has many critics, yet the first 68 flights are already booked with "get-aways." One Shuttle can be used up to 100 times over again. Many also fear the "military might" that the Shuttle may come to represent. The military has booked 40% of the Shuttle missions.

The only cargo on the Shuttle's first flight were astronaut test pilots John Young and Robert Crippen. Young had made four trips into space previous to the Shuttle flight, and has been described as the most experienced pilot in the world. Crippen had been a rookie to space flight, yet now has had the chance to experience what he describes as flying "the neatest thing in the world."

Crippen and Young are home safe, as is the continuation and strength of the U.S. space program.

The nation watched as the new power of America shuttled in on Columbia's back. After gracing the heavens the Columbia came out of the sky confidently and steadily, ending an eventful start of a new American "space race." For the men that have been and continue to be devoted to the Shuttle missions, George Page, Launch Control Director, enthusiastically expressed the attitude of the historic test flight, "I'm just thrilled that it turned out this way."

On Monday, April 20 at 7:00 p.m. Students for the Exploration and Development of Space will hold an informal organizational meeting. The National S.E.D.S. Organization was founded at M.I.T. and is now gathering momentum across the country as more and more universities start chapters.

Presently S.E.D.S. is working on getting signatures for a petition to Congress for an Orbiting Solar Power Station. Short-term future goals also entail a pro-space rally in Washington, D.C. some time in the near future.

The goal of the organization, according to its Constitution, is to "enlighten the students and the public about the advantages and resources of space, to pressure the government or public for the funds needed to explore and develop space, either by government or private means, and to organize a forum for the discussion and exchange of ideas relating to the exploration and development of space."

Thus far chapters have been started at Princeton, Yale, and other universities. A UVM chapter would add a great deal to the diversity of students already involved with S.E.D.S. A meeting on April 20 at 7:00 will be a start to organizing support in Vermont. The meeting will take place in the lobby of Cook Building.

Some students think of education as a nine months on-three months off process. In this day of higher costs, it makes sense to use the full year to complete an education program and get into the job market as soon as you can.

The University of Vermont offers over 200 courses in sessions beginning throughout the summer. It is possible to complete 12-15 hours of credit between the close of spring and the beginning of the fall semester.

The summer catalog will be available in April at the Registrar's Office, Waterman Building and Continuing Education, Grasse Mount. Students are encouraged to use the registration material in the catalog immediately to insure a place in class. For further information contact the Summer Session Office, Continuing Education, 656-2085.

Now is the time to begin planning your summer.

governmental policy through feedback.

"To take the temperature at 8 a.m. and 8 p.m. and then make judgments as to the climate of an area is erroneous and misleading," Carter said, "but it often happens."

Another failure of the media, most notably television coverage, is what actually makes the news. Editors and station owners always look for the catastrophic, the conflict, the colorful – "that which stands out" – for the news.

The Mississippi native went on to explain that government officials have a much more difficult job than he was aware of before he entered public service. He added that government assumes that foreign policy information is difficult to convey in a manner understandable by the average American. "Foreign affairs seem so distant and mysterious," he explained.

Lastly, he said an administration has to protect and promote its policies – even if they're flawed. "Any government that didn't do that is a foolish government," Carter said.

The coupling of beleaguered government officials and irresponsible media coverage leads to improper explanations of governmental policies, with the American public as the ultimate loser. "Both groups' ultimate responsibility is to inform the public, but both are doing a lousy job," Carter said.

"The prescription to remedy this is not hard. Government should better use the tools given it by the Constitution, and the press should better use the advantages given it by that document and the lucrative business of media – do it better, do it more often, do it more independently, and let the people make their choice," he concluded.

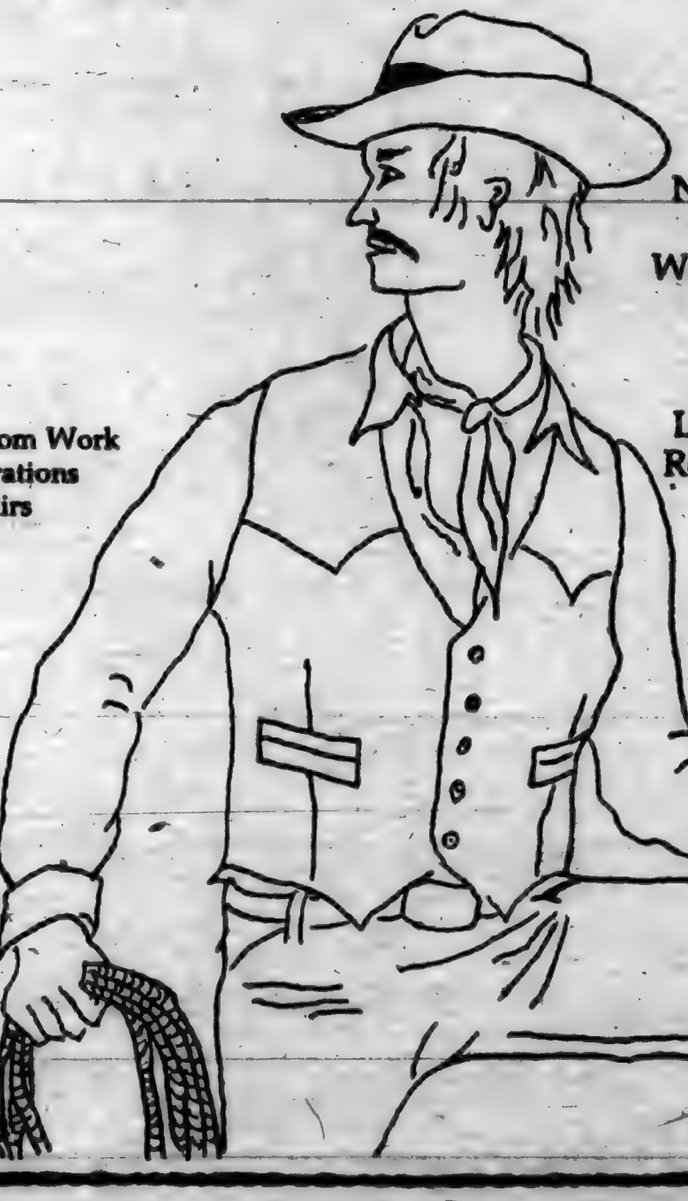
proud that the AP "could report the news freely," without fear of the government.

Fuller referred to the media's scrutiny and criticism of Secretary of State Alexander Haig's "I'm in charge..." statement after the attempt on President Reagan's life as an example of America's uncensored media. Criticism of such a high government official by the media would not have been tolerated in a communist nation, Fuller pointed out.



Briefly turning his attention to El Salvador, Fuller insinuated that American leftists were, as he saw it, "singing in tune" with leftists of other nations who were critical of America's Salvadoran policy. He discussed the State Department's "White Paper" on El Salvador, which concluded that Nicaragua, Cuba, the Soviet Union and other communist regimes were involved in a conspiracy to overthrow the present Salvadoran government. Fuller stated that this report was accurate.

Fuller concluded by renewing his praise of American media. "A free press is the best guardian you and I can have in a free country. We can be proud to live in a country where an imperfect government can tolerate an imperfect free press."

During the question and answer period that followed, Barry Rubin, an assistant professor at Georgetown's School of Foreign Service, criticized Fuller for his comments on the White Paper. Rubin emphasized the media's role to objectively inform the public and he questioned how this could be if a man like Fuller in an executive media position would take such an unquestioning stand on such a controversial issue as the White Paper.

When these reporters question Fuller on the validity of today's media, he admitted that it was not always accurate. He commented on the media's coverage of the assassination attempt of President Reagan: "The early hours of the announcement were ragged, and this gave the public a bad taste." However, he insisted that "the confusion was an honest error" on the part of the media. This further upheld his belief that an unfettered press cannot be perfect.

Regional Red Cross Has Reasons to be Proud

Ed Stearn

By Philip G. Bates

Ed Stearn, one of the "founding fathers" of this region's blood center behind John Dewey Hall, is a person dedicated to improving life for others. He came to Burlington from the National Red Cross Headquarters in D.C. in July of 1950 to help develop a regional blood program for Vermont and New Hampshire. He had been with the Red Cross since 1939 on assignments ranging from domestic disaster relief to working with liberated P.O.W.s and civilian internees in the southwest Pacific. He was administrator of the blood center for 24 years until his retirement in 1974 at age 65.

Since then he has served as a volunteer consultant, and has, among other things, organized the raising of $1,500,000 for the building of the new center in 1976. Thus, he has witnessed the development of the Burlington blood center since its start just over 30 years ago in the fall of 1950.

Mr. Stearn is quick to point out that the blood services are a relatively new facet of the American Red Cross, which in 1981 is celebrating its 100th anniversary. The Red Cross first began a blood program at the request of the Armed Forces during WWII. They succeeded in collecting more than 13,000,000 units of blood (a unit is approximately one pint). The availability of blood, together with other medical advances, reduced the mortality rate of American casualties by up to 50%.

Unfortunately, when the war ended, Red Cross blood collection ceased. This left many hospitals without adequate blood supplies. Mr. Stearn explains the irony of the post-war blood situation. "After the war, only one hospital in five had a well-developed blood bank. We found we had saved men in the heat of battle on the beaches of Iwo Jima, yet after the war we were losing them at home on the operating tables, because we just didn't have the blood."

In June, 1947, at the urgent request of health care officials, the Red Cross decided to develop a national blood program during peacetime, and a year later the first American Red Cross regional center was in operation.

The medical uses of blood and blood products have grown many-fold over the past 30 years. By federal definition, blood is a drug. It is regulated by the FDA's Bureau of Biologics. Technological advances are made everyday in the processing and testing of blood. As with most medicine, the best and latest technology must be applied. The best is, of course, expensive. For example, the screening of blood for contaminants is made a finer science every year, providing a safer product. But as Mr. Stearn points out, this is not without a corresponding increase in the costs for processing the blood. "One type of Hepatitis could be spotted with a new test. The Red Cross adopted it, which added a one dollar cost per unit of blood processed... but you know Hepatitis can kill you."

Five tests are currently run on every unit of blood: A-B-O typing, Rh typing, Hepatitis-B, Syphilis, and an antibody screen. An auto-analyzer which can test up to 120 units/hour has reduced errors and made testing much faster.

Whole blood given to the Red Cross is normally broken down into "components" shortly after being donated. Slightly more than 25% of all the blood collected is kept as whole blood. Until just over a year ago, whole blood had a shelf-life of 21 days, but improvements in the anti-coagulant/nutrient solution have extended that period by two weeks, to a 35-day shelf-life.

The majority of the blood is reduced to two or more components. Red cells can be separated from the plasma by certrifuge. The plasma (55% of the blood volume) is normally separated into "fractions" like serum albumin, gamma globulin, and antihemophelic factor (AHF). Through fractionation, the needs of a number of patients can be served with the fractions from one unit of plasma.

This processing has changed the lives of hemophiliacs. The AHF, which is the agent they need to prevent chronic bleeding, can be reduced to a powdered form that is more stable and compact than ever before. This allows a hemopheliac kid the unheard of liberty of going to a summer camp up in the woods. Because fractions are concentrated, hemophiliacs no longer suffer the threat of having their circulatory system overloaded by sheer volume, as was the case when whole blood had to be transfused just to provide the necessary fraction that was present in small amounts.

In addition to plasma, a unit of whole blood contains red cells, leukocytes or white cells, and platelets. Each of these can be separated. For example, platelets (which are essential for blood to clot) are regularly separated out. They have a major therapeutic role in aiding cancer patients receiving conventional anti-cancer therapy. The radiation and chemotherapy tend to stop the body's production of platelets in the marrow of the bones, so these patients must receive the needed platelets via injections.

About a tablespoon of platelets are in each unit of blood. Typically, six units worth of platelets are needed each day to aid someone under cancer therapy. The Burlington Red Cross blood center must supply an average of 30 units of platelets every day to the hospitals in the region. In separating platelets, the fresher the blood the better. Platelets must be taken from the blood within four hours of its being drawn. Platelets cannot be stored for 35 days like whole blood, but last only a brief 72 hours.

An October, 1980 comprehensive study of over one million patients in 700 hospitals across the country indicates that the demand for blood will continue to rise in the foreseeable future, in part due to increased longevity. When hospitalized, older people require more blood than younger people. For example, 21.9% of all people hospitalized are over 65, but they use 43.7% of all units of blood. In a categorical breakdown of blood use by disease, malignant neoplasm (cancer) ranked highest (18.7% of all blood went to these patients), heart disease was second, gastro-intestinal ulcers were third, and fractures and traumatic injuries (accidents) were fourth.

Enlisting people to donate blood when the nation isn't mobilized for war has been a major task of the Red Cross since the first peacetime center opened in 1948. As Mr. Stearn says, "There is no good time: it's either too hot, too cold, or too rainy. It's like the saying from the Bible 'as they all with one accord began to make excuse'."

Nevertheless, the UVM community's participation in blood donation has been growing steadily over the last few years. College and high school students provide 25% of the blood donated annually in the Vt.—NH region. That is quite a contribution from a group aged 17 to 22. This is the fifth semester that the fraternities and sororities have sponsored a blood drive. This semester is the first time the dorms have gotten involved in an organized way. To date seven dorms have participated, often challenging another dorm to see who can get the best turnout.

The annual faculty/staff blood drive was completed in March, with 39 people donating. Students, faculty, and staff also give on their own initiative, or go with friends. The Red Cross' records of the number of UVM students who have donated over the years show increasing participation. This fall, 1077 UVM students donated, setting the record for one semester.

It has been reported that some individuals give blood on a regular basis (once every eight weeks), bur for rather mixed motives. One student donor said, "I always give on Fridays so I can replace my lost fluids with alcohol during "Happy Hour" Friday night. It's a real economical drunk; a couple beers after giving blood that morning and I'm in orbit." Another readily admits that the doughnuts, cheddar cheese, and cider that the Red Cross serve donors makes a fine breakfast. Whatever one's motives are, the central theme of Red Cross is voluntary giving in the New England tradition of "Neighbor Helping Neighbor."

The experience of the Vt.-NH regional Red Cross Blood Services embodies this theme, as shown by the fact that this region has a per capita donor rate about 50% higher than the national average. The center draws blood from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. Monday thru Friday.

Mr. Stearn related that distinct satisfaction one can feel after giving blood. "There is no more altruistic gesture than giving a pint of blood. It is a very personal thing. It is a piece of yourself. No, you won't get your picture in the paper, or receive a thank-you note. But when you walk out of here, you can almost feel the halo over your head."

The UVM community's participation in blood donation has been growing steadily over the last few years. College and high school students provide 25% of the blood donated anually in the VT.- NH. region.

Qenching Burlington's Thirst for Power

By George Gurney

The Moran generating plant on the Burlington lakefront is a study in alternate forms of energy. At present, wood accounts for two-thirds of the energy produced at the plant. Coal supplies the remaining third. Burning wood is cheaper than oil and gas, and cleaner than coal. Wood, Burlington Electric's (B.E.) public relations officer Tim Cronin points out, "is more appropriate for generating electricity... using gas and oil is wasteful, in that the conversion from oil and gas to electricity is not efficient – much less so than the internal combustion engine."

Wood, because it is renewable and in abundant supply, offers a solution to the growing oil and gas shortage. Because of this fact, another wood generating plant is being considered for Burlington. It would be built below Intervale Avenue in the North End.

Originally built in 1954 to burn soft coal delivered by railroad from West Virginia and Kentucky, the Moran Plant began burning wood about three and one-half years ago. The smokestacks were built on almost exactly the same level as the lake front terrace. Because of the dirty burning qualities of coal and the level of the smokestacks, B.E. originally tried to mix the coal with equal amounts of oil to alleviate the pollution problem on the north end of town. But the oil and coal mixture became too expensive, and B.E. converted to the present two-thirds wood and one-third coal mixture.

The forests within a sixty mile radius of Burlington supply the wood for the plant. B.E. buys the wood (already in chip form) from individuals, who usually lease the rights to obtain the wood from private property owners. The wood is "shipped" right on location in chipping machines. The average price for a ton of chipped wood runs around $17.

The wood is a mixture of about fifty percent hardwood and fifty percent softwood. Once purchased, the wood chips are loaded into trucks and shipped down to the Moran Plant by B.E.

At the plant, the trucks are driven on to a large dumpster and mechanically emptied into a giant chip pile. From the wood piles, the chips are placed on a continuous elevator by a front end loader. They travel about

Appartment Living: Approach, Rights, and Responsibilities

By Gary Lerner

Before you place one single dollar towards an apartment, you should know and understand what services you are to be provided, and what your rental agreement asks of you. You can save yourself many hassles and headaches if you clear up potential misunderstandings and uncertainties before you make a rental commitment.

If a written agreement is required by the landlord, you will be wise to read it over carefully before signing it. This lease legally binds you and your landlord to specific conditions. The lease generally stipulates amount of rent, date due, security deposit, and what utilities will be provided. It may specifically state restrictions governing animals, children or loud music. Whatever is not stated in the lease may be difficult to enforce. Therefore, if a landlord makes a statement to you about a service he will provide and it is not printed in your lease, ask him to put it in writing. If he really intends to provide this service, he will not object to signing his name to it.

The lease is a two-way street; it provides protection for both the landlord and the tenant. You may, however, not desire this sort of protection, or you may object to the length of commitment stipulated in a lease. In this case, an oral agreement may be more satisfactory to you.

The oral agreement has no signatures and no papers, just a verbal understanding between you and your landlord. Usually the amount of rent, when it is due, and perhaps what utilities are provided are agreed upon. It is important to reach agreement about some minor issues too, unless you wish to take responsibility for them later on. Some questions to pose might concern responsibilities for garbage collection, snow removal, and maintenance of public ways.

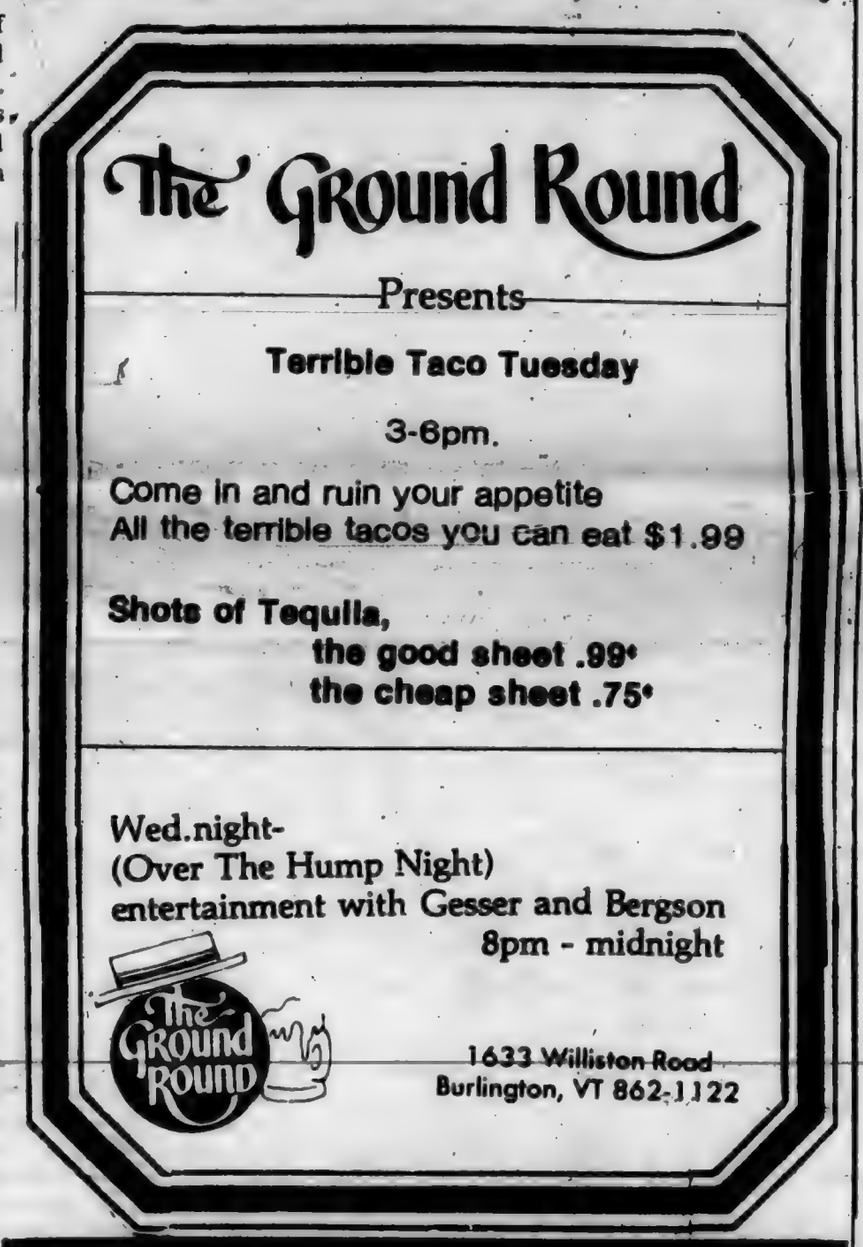
The oral agreement relies mainly on trust and, as such, its success largely depends on the individuals involved. The oral agreement is a legally binding agreement, but more difficult to enforce than the written agreement because of its lack of documentation.

You have decided to rent the apartment, you acted wisely and carefully, you felt you understood your rights and responsibilities.

You still might get stuck.

Conflict

In solving a problem with your landlord, your approach is most important. First, you should try to settle your problems through communication. Begin with a polite phone call. Express your problem clearly and attempt to find out what the landlord is going to do to correct the situation and when.



If after a reasonable length of time, you still have not received a satisfactory response, write the landlord a letter. It would be wise from this point on to keep accurate records. Date your letters and keep copies. Mention your previous phone conversation and what your expectations are in regards to when and how the problem should be solved. If you still receive no response or satisfaction, and if the problem is one you refuse to live with, then you may choose to send another letter threatening legal action, or you may decide to seek out legal services.

If you do end up at a legal services office, you can take some steps beforehand to make your visit worthwhile. First, the landlord should be properly notified of the problem. Second, you should have all supporting documents with you. For instance, your copy of the written agreement, dates when problems occurred, when you spoke to your landlord, and copies of any correspondence.

Off-campus living provides you with freedom from many restrictions of dormitory living, but it does tie you to some obligations. You will be responsible for adhering to the rules you and your landlord have agreed upon. These may be as specific as rent payment due dates and as vague as "furnishings shall be reasonably cared for."

If you are searching for further information, the Student Legal Service has available the "Tenant's Handbook" and Apartment Rating Forms which contain off campus students' responses to questions concerning their living conditions. In addition, the Student Legal Service is glad to clear up further questions concerning tenants' rights and responsibilities in general, and specifically as might apply to a lease or a particular situation.

I Accepted The Toot To Raise My Grade

By Mike Gochman

Knock, knock.

"Come in," came from the other side of the door. Directly in front of him was Professor Keogh, sitting behind a big oak desk stained dark brown and finished with polyurethane. The professor's back was to the window and snow was falling behind him.

He wished, now, that he had not come to argue about his paper. The office was small but the books around the walls deliberately made the room seem smaller to discourage visitors from staying too long.

In class, the professor was ostensibly distant in the eyes of his students. He was a published writer (five novels to be exact) at the early age of thirty-five. To his visitor standing in the doorway, the professor occupied a high pedestal, as if he had already learned the secrets known only by old, wise Buddhas. The professor thought of himself less respectfully and made extra efforts to remain on the same level as his students, whom he felt were equal, if not superior, in their potential.

He did not realize how long he had been standing in the doorway until the professor interrupted his space.

"Well?" the professor asked. "What can I help you with?" The professor was more sympathetic now that he had his student's attention. "And close the door, if you will, please. Sit down."

He sat down and began to speak for the first time of the day. "It's about the paper you handed back last class. I did mine on Hunter S. Thompson's Fear and Loathing."

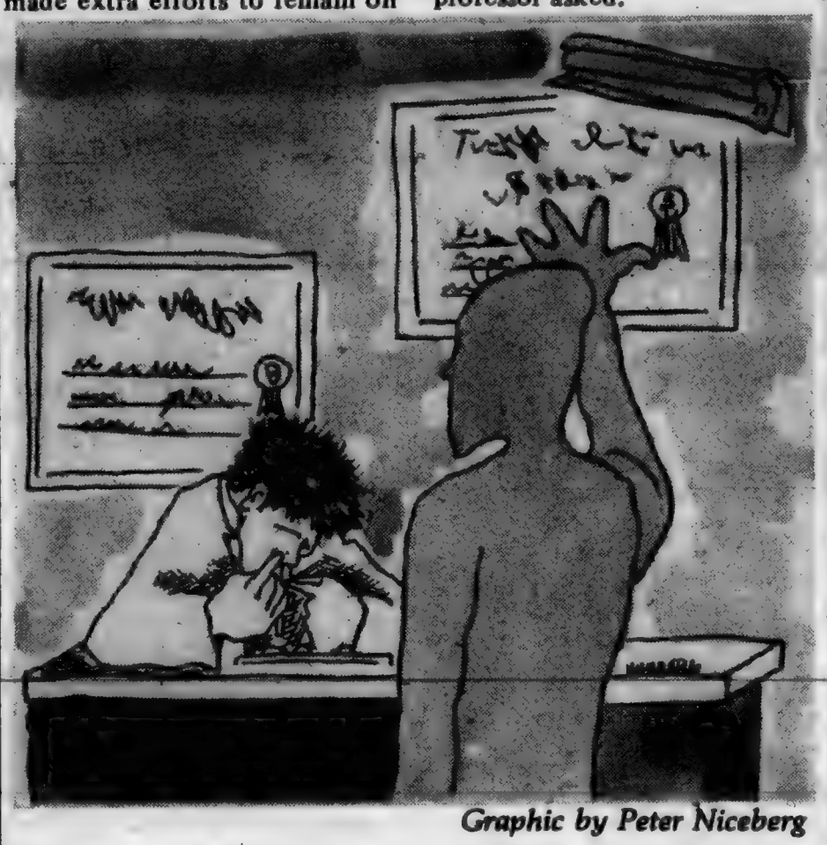
"Oh yes, did you bring it with you?"

"Yes, I did. It's right here." He handed it to the professor. He began to perspire on his forehead as he imagined the verbal beating he was about to receive in his attempt to get the 'C' on his paper changed to a 'B.' He looked at his palms; they glistened with sweat.

The professor looked at the upper left hand corner of the paper and read David Worthy's name to himself. It was still early in the semester and he had not put all the names to all the faces of his students.

"Hunter S. Thompson," the professor said to himself.

"Hunter S. Thompson," David repeated.



"Yes."

"Yup."

The professor looked up. His expression questioned David's repeating him. David felt the books move in closer, making him feel claustrophobic.

The professor put the paper down, placed his glasses on his nose and sat back. The chair squeaked. He stared at one corner of the ceiling for about five seconds. It felt like five minutes to David. He pulled open a drawer, took out a mirror, and placed it on his blotter.

"Care for some blow?" the professor asked.

Graphic by Peter Niceberg

"What?" David heard him correctly, but did not believe it.

"Would you like to do a few lines of coke with me?"

David thought the professor might be trying to trap him into something but decided to call his bluff.

"Sure."

The professor dumped a half gram of cocaine on the mirror from a folded square of magazine paper. David's heart jumped at the sight. On the paper envelope David saw part of a leg, from the knee down with a hockey skate attached to it, and figured out it was from a Sports Illustrated article he had read. In his mind, he patted himself on the back for being so perceptive.

The books on the walls seemed farther away now. David watched the razor blade rapidly tapping the mirror as the professor prepared the substance for easy snorting. Then the professor gathered the coke together and made a perfect square which he cut into six equal segments. He turned each segment into a thin line, so there were twelve equal lines including the reflection. From his wallet he pulled out a twenty dollar bill and rolled it into a snorting utensil.

The professor handed the mirror to his student and urged him to do the honors of the first line. With the mirror in his lap David leaned over and put the twenty dollar sole in his right nostril. It was always a little embarrassing for David to watch himself snort in the mirror. Afterwards, he handed the mirror back to the professor for the second line.

After the six lines disappeared with three reflections, the professor licked his index finger and ran it over the mirror to pick up the loose particles and rubbed his gums to numb them.

The professor sat back. The chair squeaked. David felt lightheaded.

"Sir, I had been working on this paper for —"

"David, I can see that you have a thorough understanding of the novel, and I was impressed with a lot of your insight, but your introduction was a little too ambiguous. You began to get off —" ("to get off" rang in David's ear) "on tangents. As a result, your conclusion was also weak. In other words, you knew the novel so well that you tried to cover the entire story in five pages. You must be more specific. I thought my comments were self-explanatory."

It's the same old shit, David thought to himself. He was not ready for this eruditious explanation post six lines.

"I understand sir. It's just that I need a 'B' in this course or I'll fail out of school. I've been on probation for two semesters now. All my other courses are going pretty well."

"Look, it's not everyday I give out 'B's' for the hell of it."

"It's not everyday I sit down and do lines with my professor, in his office no less."

"You have two more papers and a final to bring up your grade."

At 8:30 a.m. David's alarm clock wakes him up. "Shit," he grumbles to himself. He has an appointment at 9:00 a.m. with his English professor, Mr. Keogh, concerning the paper he got back last class.

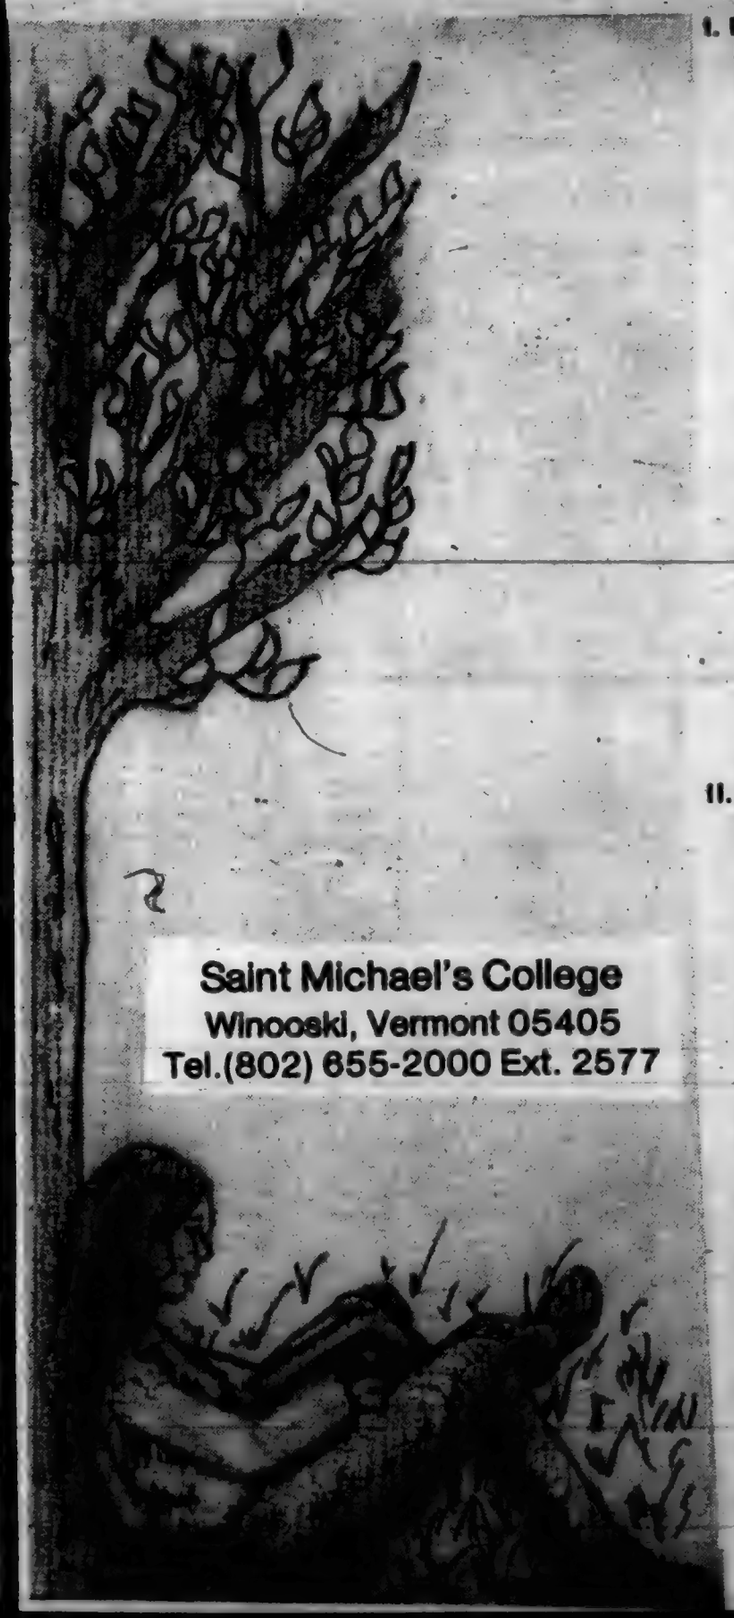
fifty feet up to a conveyor belt, which transfers the chips into two separate chutes, or "coal bunkers." Gravity forces the chips through the "coal bunkers" into the boilers, where they are burned. The heat released by the burning wood chips, boils water. The steam causes turbines to spin, creating an electrostatic force (electricity).

All in all, there are three boilers, each measuring 16' by 14' by 35'. The middle boiler burns coal; the other two boilers burn wood chips. Each boiler has its respective turbine and smokestack. One turbine produces between two and ten megawatts, and each boiler consumes between eight and ten tons of wood per hour. All together, the three turbines can produce as much as 30 megawatts of electricity.

At the moment, the Moran Plant supplies about one-third of Burlington's electricity. The remaining electricity comes from two sources — New York State and the Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Plant.

The contract with New York to purchase power expires in 1985, and according to Cronin, "it is doubtful that it will get renewed." Considering that the peak electrical demand could be around 85 megawatts by around 1985, Burlington must find additional power sources.



Along with the proposed hydro-electrical plant on the Winooski River, which could produce up to 12 megawatts, the additional wood chip burning plant, producing as much power as the Moran Plant, seems like a solution to the possible upcoming power shortage.

Nevertheless, some problems have to be ironed out. Though it pollutes less than coal, wood still presents a pollution problem. B.E. affirms that they have solved that problem, by installing electrostatic precipitators in the smokestacks. Electrostatic precipitators charge the particles emitted from the burning wood, and trap them with negatively charged conductors.

There is also the problem of whether or not the proposed new wood chip plant site is a wet land, which is illegal to build on. A three member panel appointed by Governor Snelling will rule on this during the summer. Even with its slight problems, the Moran Plant has proved that wood is a viable energy source, and that the new wood chip plant could help quench Burlington's growing thirst for power.

"Last summer I had the best tan on the beach!"

"Last summer I hit the books so I could graduate in the fall."

Some students think of education as a nine months on-three months off process. In this day of higher costs, it makes sense to use the full year to complete an education program and get into the job market as soon as you can.

The University of Vermont offers over 200 courses in sessions beginning throughout the summer. It is possible to complete 12-15 hours of credit between the close of spring and the beginning of the fall semester.

The summer catalog will be available in April at the Registrar's Office, Waterman Building and Continuing Education, Grasse Mount. Students are encouraged to use the registration material in the catalog to insure a place in class. For further information contact the Summer Session Office, Continuing Education, 656-2085.

Now is the time to begin planning your summer.

THIS SUMMER GET CLOSER TO NATURE IN Vermont

If your summer studies will involve fields, forest and watershed, Johnson State College's 1,000 acre Babcock Nature Preserve offers the ideal environment to gain field experience. The Preserve combines the advantages of a large field station with the convenience of well-equipped laboratories and the support facilities of the campus.

Our program (May 18-July 11) offers 2 week intensive courses in Field Ornithology, Green Mountains Natural History, Aquatic Plants, Field Mammalogy, Watershed Dynamics, and Environmental Conservation Education. Give yourself some credit this summer.

Ups and Downs For Softball

By Kathy Sainz

UVM's softball team experienced the "ups and downs" at Bridgeport, as the team split a double header on Sunday. The Cats scored all the runs they needed in the first inning on singles by Lynda Ballard and Eileen Powers, and a walk to Robin Doyle. A Bridgeport error also helped the Vermont cause. The Vermont offense couldn't muster any more runs, but the defense was equal to the task. Bridgeport scored its lone run in the fifth, thanks to a triple by Jon Ryan. Claudette Thibault was the winning pitcher as she held Bridgeport to 3 hits.

Earlier in the week, the UVM Catamounts opened the 1981 softball season on a positive note by sweeping a double header from Keene State College.

In the first game the Cats exploded for five runs in the first inning led by Ballard's three-run homer. Also contributing to the scoring with singles were Pat Spicer, Julie Winter, and Jenny Colford as UVM took a 5-0 lead. Keene's offense got untracked, though, and started nibbling away at the lead. They picked up three runs in the second and two in the third. The Cats also scored two in the second. Keene opened the fourth inning with three runs to take the lead 8-7. Keene would have increased the lead had shortstop Robin Doyle not made a good throw to catcher Spicer who put out a Keene runner at the plate. Keene's lead wasn't to last long as Vermont collected three more runs in the fourth and moved ahead 10-8. The UVM defense shut down Keene the rest of the way while adding a fifth inning run and went on to win 11-8.

The second game began as a defensive duel with both teams going scoreless for the first three innings. Keene opened the scoring by sending four runs across the plate in the top of the fourth. The Cats were equal to the task, and answered with four runs in their half of the inning, on a grand slam by Eileen Powers. Keene pulled ahead again in the fifth, getting two runs on two singles and a Vermont error. The Cats didn't give up though as they knotted the score 6-6 in the bottom of the fifth. Neither team could break the tie in the sixth, but Keene put the pressure on Vermont by scoring one in the seventh. Vermont's Pam Dodge drew a walk and was replaced by pinch runner Cindy Hooley. It was Keene who yielded to the pressure as the team committed three errors that allowed the Cats to load the bases and score Hooley to tie the game at 7-7. Spicer came through for Vermont with a sacrifice fly to center that scored Powers and gave UVM an 8-7 victory.

Baseball Players Rebound From Early Losses; Sweep UVA

By Harry Eastman

"Before our trip south, there was some doubt whether we could play against the larger eastern schools," said junior first baseman-rightfielder Bill Currier. "But now we've proved that we can stand against any of those teams." During their 15 game southern trip, Currier and his Catamount teammates ripped southern pitching with a .315 team batting average, and returned home with a surprising 7-8 record.

Coach Jack Leggett, who has been the UVM baseball mentor since the sport was reinstated at a varsity level in 1978, was pleased with his team's performance. "We were hitting the ball really well and we got good production from our second through seventh batters in the line-up."

The Cats got off to a rough start on the first leg of their trip. They dropped a pair of games to Eastern Connecticut 5-2 and 9-7, and then were swept 9-1 and 10-5 by West Chester State.

"It took us some time to adjust to playing outdoors," commented Leggett. "The only place we could practice outdoors before the trip was in the parking lot in front of Gutterson."

UVM rebounded from these early losses in fine fashion, beating Virginia Commonwealth 7-6 and 9-5. The team then travelled to Charlottesville to play the University of Virginia. The Cats crushed UVA pitching, demolishing the Cavaliers 19-14 and 12-2.

"Sweeping Virginia was the biggest highlight for us since I've been here," said Leggett.

UVM is much improved offensively this season over last year's team, which batted a dismal .226. Co-captains, left-fielder Jim Farrell (Sr., Windsor) and second baseman Mike Pash (Sr., Colorado Springs, Co) are the team leaders in hits and average with 20, .417 and 21, .389 respectively. The team has also gotten good production from juniors Dan Gasparino and Bill Currier. Gasparino, a catcher from Riverside, Connecticut, has a .340 batting average with three homeruns and 17 runs batted in. Currier (Essex Jct.) has a .362 average with three homers and 12 RBI's. Also contributing factors to the Cats' potent offense are Bob Boucher (.378) and Kirk McCaskill (.310).

Sports Editor's Notebook

By Andy Cook

If you've been spending a lot of time watching and listening to recent sporting events, such as hockey and basketball playoffs, on the radio or TV, perhaps you have discovered some annoying cliches utilized by our friends in the broadcasting booth. Here are some trite sayings that I found particularly disturbing, in order of their degree of annoyance:

1. In a short series, anything can happen.

2. Check your local listing for the game and time in your area.

3. "In order to win this game, they've got to outplay the opponent."

4. If they don't win today, there is no tomorrow.

5. We've got a real nailbiter here.

It's really nice that baseball is back and each of the 26 teams in the major leagues is optimistic about their futures. There is reason for some of this optimism, as several ballclubs who haven't been contenders for a long time could wind up surprising some folks. One team, the Chicago White Sox, now having ridden themselves of the ultra-conservative Veeck ownership, is a bona fide threat in the AL West. With Carlton Fisk (whose homer beat Boston, his former team, on opening day), Phil Luszinki, and Ron Lafore added to Chet Lemmon and pitching sensation Ed Farmer, the windy city could have its first championship baseball team since 1959.

It's hockey playoff time, but who cares? I certainly don't. When 16 of the 21 teams qualify for post-season play, it's hard to get excited about what goes on during the regular season (look at the Bruins and their attendance figures) and come playoff time, fans don't become interested in the post season play until the championship series reaches the semi-final series. Therefore, I really can't see how Bruin fans were upset when Boston was swept out of the playoffs in three straight by Steve Payne and the Minnesota Northstars. In all fairness, the Bruins didn't

Yanks and Brewers Should Battle For Title

By Richard Bateman

During the last two seasons, the AL East divisional race has revolved around four teams — New York, Baltimore, Boston and Milwaukee. This year, all but Boston will battle again for the divisional title. Through the free agent draft and the winter meetings in Dallas, each team has improved, but Milwaukee and New York emerge as the two possible favorites to win the title. With the teams' equally balanced lineups, it is hard to project a winner.

The New York Yankees won the AL East in 1980 with solid hitting and a consistent pitching staff. During the off-season, Yankees' owner George Steinbrenner added superstar Dave Winfield to his all-star lineup. Winfield, Craig Nettles, Reggie Jackson, Bob Watson, Willie Randolph and Jim Spencer head a productive offense. The pitching staff features Tommy John, Ron Guidry and Rudy May (all left-handers) with Ron Davis and Rich Gossage in relief.

The Yanks are strong in every starting position except catcher. While Rick Cerone enjoyed a productive season in 1980, he is only an average receiver. The Yanks lack reserves in the infield and at catcher. If for any reason Cerone, Nettles, Bucky Dent or Randolph should have to sit out, the Yanks would be in trouble.

The outfield is a totally different situation as the Yanks have the best players in all of baseball in this position. With Reggie Jackson and Dave Winfield assured of starting jobs, Oscar Gamble, Bobby Murcer, Joe Lefebvre, Bobby Brown, Rupert Jones and Lou Pinella are available for the third outfield spot, outfield replacements, designated hitter duty or pinch hitting. Such depth leaves manager Gene Michael with many alternatives.

The depth in the Yankees' pitching staff matches that in the outfield. With John, Guidry, May, Tom Underwood and Mike Morgan (acquired from Oakland) as the starting rotation and Gossage, Davis and Doug Bird in the bullpen, with May and Underwood also available for relief, the Yanks have a formidable staff that matches any in the league.

New York's biggest fear in 1981 will be the Milwaukee Brewers. With the key acquisitions of Ted Simmons, Rollie Fingers and Pete Vukovich, the Brewers have projected themselves as bona fide pennant contenders. The Brewers relied on power hitting (203 home runs in 1980) and defense to win last season. The pitching staff was not a big factor, but

A Day At Ft. Lauderdale Stadium

By Harry Eastman

Fort Lauderdale Stadium, spring training home of the New York Yankees, has the look of paradise. Tall palm trees surround the stadium, their leaves waving softly in the calm warm breezes. Men in shirt sleeves and women in halter tops and shorts crowd around the concession stand buying cold beers and sodas. The professional baseball here seems far removed from the tension of pennant races, playoffs, and the World Series.

On the field the players are caught up in this air of relaxation, some chatting among themselves, others signing autographs or letting women take pictures of them. A group of rookies run beside the outfield fence, which is painted with advertisements featuring popular Yankees: "Yogi's choice is Yoohoo Chocolate Action Drink," "Watch the Yankees win the division on a Panasonic Reggievision..." Each New York Yankees rookie knows that if he gets to wear the pinstripes he too can take advantage of the media opportunities that are made available to baseball stars in the Big Apple.

A majority of the Yankees, especially the veterans, were in the clubhouse. Tommy John, who was being interviewed by a local television reporter, and Ron Guidry, who was signing autographs by the Yankee dugout, were the only recognizable Yankees on the field. The team opposing the Yanks that night was the Texas Rangers. Al Oliver, Pat Putnam, Jim Sundberg, and Leon Roberts were leaning against the batting cage awaiting their turns to hit. New manager Don Zimmer was talking to a small group of reporters. His cheek bulged with his ever-present wad of chewing tobacco. He was very optimistic for the coming season.

"How would you describe the change coming from Boston to Texas?"

Zimmer: "There is less pressure on me now. In Boston I had 40 to 50 reporters to answer to, now in Texas there are only three to four. Don't get me wrong. I had seven great years in Boston, and I didn't want to be fired, however I'm happy in Texas."

"What is your outlook for the Rangers this season?"

Zimmer: "If we pitch the way I think we can, we'll be a tough ballclub."

"Pitching has been a sore spot for the Rangers in past years, which pitcher's performance do you see as being the most important on your staff this year?"

Zimmer: "I think the two pitchers who we need strong seasons from are Jimkern and John Henry Johnson."

Meanwhile, back at the batting cage, Ranger Golden Glove catcher Jim Sundberg was having difficulty. After he hit a pop-up to shallow leftfield, outfielder Leon Roberts, acquired in the off-season from the Seattle Mariners, said, "You'll know it when you hit one." Sundberg stepped back in the batter's box and ripped a screaming line drive to left field.

It was now game time. The public address announcer gave the starting lineups. The Rangers were playing that night without the services of speedster Mickey Rivers, who didn't make the trip to Fort Lauderdale. But Rivers was the only Ranger regular player not present in the starting lineup. The Yankees were missing Reggie Jackson, Graig Nettles, Bucky Dent, and Oscar Gamble from their lineup. They were taking one last look at some of their younger players before making their final cut. On the mound for the Yankees was righthanded prospect, 20-year-old Gene Nelson. His performance that night would probably decide whether or not he would stick with the team or spend another long summer toiling in the minors.

Before the playing of the National Anthem (a recording by Robert Merrill, who else?), the crowd was asked to bow their heads in a moment of silence for the recovery of Ronald Reagan, who had been the victim of an assassination attempt that week. The Yankees started well. Nelson struck out three Rangers in the top of the first, and Willie Randolph scored on a Lou Pinella fly ball to give his team a 1-0 lead.

The crowd had taken an obvious change. The large amount of beer consumed had caused several people to become rather boisterous. When Dave Winfield stepped to the plate, several fans began to chant, "Hit him in the money belt." Another man vaulted the fence yelling, "I'm going out there and nobody is going to stop me." Unfortunately for him, he was wrong. The Fort Lauderdale police reacted quickly and the man was escorted from the stadium.

Each team traded runs and the score was 2-1 going into the ninth inning. The crowd was excited, because Rich "Goose" Gossage was coming on to pitch. "Goose, Goose, Goose" was the chant of the crowd as the fireballing righthander warmed up. The fans had seemed to forget last year, when George Brett hit one of those Gossage fastballs for a home-run sending the Kansas City Royals to the World Series and the Yankees home for the winter. For Gossage this game was business as usual, retiring the Rangers in order.

As the fans filed out of the stadium, the Rangers hurried onto a waiting bus, and within ten minutes were headed back to their spring training camp at Pompano Beach. The Yankees gathered in the outfield, rookies and veterans alike, to run wind sprints. For many of them it was just another day. Their wives, children, and girlfriends were waiting for them in the team parking lot, and they hurried to get through the drills to be with them. For one player, however, it was not just another day. Gene Nelson had pitched 6 innings while striking out 7 Ranger batters and only giving up one Texas run. He had assured himself a spot on the team, at least for the time being.

Outside of the stadium the concession stands and souvenir stands were being closed down as the last people were leaving the stadium. Another day was over at Fort Lauderdale Stadium.

Softball Deep With Talent

By Kathy Sainz

Two words describe the 1981 University of Vermont Varsity Softball Team – depth and enthusiasm. Coach Sally Guerette has perhaps the finest collection of talent seen on a Vermont softball team in years. The team's strength comes from the experience of eleven returning players and a fine collection of freshmen.

The pitching staff could be the most improved part of the Cats. Claudette Thibault (Hinesburg, Vt) and Deb Bothfeld (Cabot, Vt) with Earned Run Averages of 1.98 and 0.98, respectively, are back and will be joined by Lori Basilone (West Springfield, MA) and Andrea Borden (Fair Haven, NJ). Thibault, 7-3 last year, has a blistering fast ball and an assortment of "junk" pitches that keep the batters off balance. In addition, she is an excellent fielder and can be used at other positions. Co-captain Bothfeld is not as overpowering but has a good fastball and puts a lot of spin on the ball causing many batters to pop the ball up. Basilone and Borden are both strong and look to gain a lot of collegiate experience.

Sports Analysis

The outfielders are a strong group, and all possess good arms, gloves, and speed. Junior Steph Blaha (Guilford, Ct.) is the veteran and appears ready for a good year. Blaha is a consistent fielder with a strong, accurate arm which is not being hampered as much by the elbow problems of the past. Sophomores Lynda Ballard (Hinesburg, Vt.), Jenny Colford (Bridgewater, MA), Jones, and Powers also have proven themselves in the outfield. Pam Dodge (Newburyport, MA) and Karen Iorio (Peabody, MA), both freshmen, also have been promising in pre-season play and will be ready when the season starts.

To compliment a strong defense, the Cats will have a very potent offense. Bothfeld, Powers, and Spicer all hit over .400 and Blaha, Doyle, and Thibault were over .300. In addition, Ballard, Jones, and Winter contributed to the team's offense with Jones leading the team in runs batted in last year.

The Cats look strong but will be facing some stiff competition in their drive to reach the regionals. Important games in their division include the University of Bridgeport, the University of Lowell, the University of New Hampshire, and Sacred Heart University. UVM would also like to avenge last year's loss to UMass of Division I.

belong in the playoffs in the first place... I was somewhat startled to see Montreal knocked out of the competition in the first round, but their opponents, the Edmonton Oilers, have Wayne Gretsky to tear teams apart, and with him this hockey team from Canada may go a long way. Meanwhile, the Canadiens may make a coaching change after this season, because several players, including veterans Bob Gainey and Guy Lafleur, have been confused as to why that team's first round draft choice spent most of the season on the bench... And what about the New York Rangers? It seems that goalie Steve Baker got hot at the right time and added some momentum to the Broadway Blues, who won several key games in the final week of the season and just managed to get into the playoffs, and then managed to knock Marcone Dilone, Charlie Simmer (a scoring machine right behind Mike Bossy), and the entire heavily favored Los Angeles Kings out of the playoffs. New York got hot like this two years ago and nearly shocked the hockey world by upsetting the New York Islanders in the semi-finals only to lose the Stanley Cup to Montreal.

The greatest sports franchise in history continues to roll, right behind the guns of front office genius Red Auerbach. The Boston Celtics with Red's first round draft choice Keven McHale leading them to an opening playoff victory over the Chicago Bulls, added his talents to Larry Bird and company, to lead the New Englanders to a 4-0 sweep over a very big and physical team, which includes such stars as Artis Gilmore and Rickey Sobers... The Celtics have a tradition to keep in Boston, and would love to add a fourteenth championship pennant above the historic court at the Boston Garden. With momentum running on their side, especially since they won the regular season divisional championship on the final day of the season against Philadelphia, the Celtics could very well win the Eastern Conference against the 76ers. But the City of Brotherly Love offers some tough players like Erving and Dawkins for Boston to tangle with in post-season play. But whoever wins the East should go all the way. Houston has talent, and Moses Malone, when hot, may be the best shooter in the league. But with the world champion Los Angeles Lakers having taken an unexpected early bow, The West probably won't be able to provide an NBA title winner this year.

I am very pleased that UVM assistant basketball coach Bill Whitmore has been chosen as head man, Peter Salzberg's replacement. In a game where personalities and talent blending are so important, giving the mentor job to an insider is a very wise move by Dennis Lambert with Fingers (an established reliever) and Vukovich added to the pitching staff, Milwaukee should have the depth to win more games in '81.

Cecil Cooper, Paul Molitar, Robin Yount, Simmons, Ben Oglivie, Gorman Thomas and Don Money form a steady offensive lineup that can hit as well as any in either league. With the comeback of Larry Hisle, this team will be even stronger. There are no weak spots in the Brewers' lineup, but like the Yanks, it lacks infield reserves. The Brewers put big numbers on the scoreboards last season, but found that hitting was not enough. For the Brewers to win in 1981, their pitching staff will have to improve.

Finger and Vukovich will be counted on as a dependable reliever and solid starter, respectively, and Mike Caldwell will be counted on to improve. Moose Haas, last season's most consistent starter, Jim Slaton and Bob McClure will join Vukovich and Caldwell in the starting rotation. Handyman Reggie Cleveland and Paul Mitchell perform as both spot starters and relievers. Jerry Augustine and rookies Buster Keeton and Rich Olsen fill out the bullpen.

If it's true that pitching is the key to winning, then the Baltimore Orioles will be in the thick of the race. The Orioles won the pennant in 1979 and after a poor start last season, nearly caught the Yanks in September. It was solid pitching in 1979 and the same after the all-star break last season that made the O's winners.

Steve Stone (last year's Cy Young award winner at 25-7), Mike Flanagan (1979 Cy Young winner), Scott McGregor (20-8 in 1980), Jim Palmer and Dennis Martinez form the strongest pitching staff in the American League. Each pitcher in the rotation is capable of winning 20 games in 1981 as the Orioles aim for their third straight 100-win season. The bullpen is also very strong and complements the starting rotation well. With Tim Stoddard (26 saves in 1980), Tippy Martinez and Sammy Stewart in the bullpen, there is no break for opposing hitters.

Although the Brewers may hit over 200 home runs as a team, their fortune rests with the pitching staff. The Brewers and Yanks are evenly matched in offense so the pennant race will be decided from the mound.

Homola Talks To NHL

By Andy Cook

UVM hockey standout Craig Homola is in Sweden playing for the United States national team in the World Cup Tournament. He will be returning to the United States in a couple of weeks, and, because he is expected to receive incompletes in this semester's courses, he will be here in the summer to make up this spring's work and to take a couple of additional credits that he needs for graduation.

By next fall, according to Catamount hockey coach Jim Cross, the skater may have signed a pro contract. Although Cross would not give details of Homola's involvement with the National Hockey League, the coach did mention that the star had "spoken" with the Minnesota North Stars and had an agent representing him during those talks. Recently, Homola was in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, which is the location of Minnesota's farm team.

"I think Minnesota is a good organization for him," said Cross. "They are a team heading in a good direction." He pointed to the North Star's three game sweep of the Boston Bruins as evidence of the team's strength. The North Stars are a skating team, while Boston is an aggressive team, which was hurt badly in the playoffs because of numerous powerplay opportunities given to Minnesota because of their rough play. Cross noted that skating teams are becoming "the main swing or direction" of the NHL, and that the North Stars' owner has gone as far as to propose that fighting in hockey games be absolutely prohibited. "So," said Cross, "this is a good team as far as Craig's future is concerned."

THEATRE

A Painful Message at RTT

By Lisa Morgan

"The more he beats me, the sicker he is;
The sicker he is, the more he needs me;
The more he needs me, the more I love him."
The more he needs me, the more I love him."

These lines were chanted by three actresses of the Rhode Island Feminist Theatre in Internal Injury, a vivid dramatization of the confused, tormented lives of battered women which immediately absorbed the audience. The chorus of chanting dialogue, which appeared intermittently between scenes, was very effective in presenting the individual environments of the characters as well as their common agonies, including bruises and excuses. We saw their rationalization revealed through such lines as "Still we endure, propped up by daily lies." The cyclical chanting intensified our sense of their helpless and trapped existence: "A vine grows outside the house, squeezing, and you know you're going nowhere."

Regardless of their backgrounds, these three women endured abuse out of love, fear, and the lack of other alternatives or outside help. Josephine, a spirited artist, was convincingly enacted by Sherilyn Brown. In a sensitive scene, she attempted to cover up her bruises with make-up for an art show that she hoped would promote her career. Yet, she couldn't muster the courage to go out in public. This demonstrated how difficult it is for battered women to interact in society, and the constantly tormenting fear "I don't want people to know."

Julie Wittman's Peg was the most tragic character in the play, a helpless, five-month pregnant woman with three children who was totally dependent upon her husband to support their family. She told her mother about her husband's brutality, and was coldly informed that "there are ups and downs in a marriage" and "it's your own fault." She finally sought outside assistance, going with her children to a shelter for battered women. However, she quickly realized she was unable to uphold her family alone and returned home, saying, "I've got to go back to the one person who cares for me."

One of the other characters, the upper class Helen, was played by Barbara Conley with rigid intensity. Although appearing to be the most insecure, she was the only woman who moved out of her home and divorced her cruel husband. It was Helen who read aloud Peg's death notice in the newspaper. She had apparently "fallen" down a flight of stairs. The play ended with Helen telling Josephine over the phone, "Call me sometime soon..." and suddenly becoming stiff, with her penetrating eyes staring into the darkness of the audience.

The acting throughout the production was emotional and realistic, especially the graphic scenes with husbands whose presences were felt but never seen. Solemn background music reinforced the repressive tone of the play. Three blue/gray partitions boxed off each of the women's worlds, which were characterized by items such as an easel, children's toys, and a bookshelf. The freezing of action and rapid black-outs heightened our sense of the women's pain and anguish. For their draining performances, the actresses received a well-deserved standing ovation. When the lights were turned back on, some people were crying and hugging each other for comfort.

Internal Injury is an original play by R.I.F.T., directed by Janet Buchwald and based on the real experiences and words of battered women. After the show, there was a discussion with the actresses and other members of R.I.F.T. that involved some women from the audience discussing their own experiences. The drama didn't attempt to answer the problem of battered women (one of whom is beaten every 18 seconds in the U.S.), but was certainly successful in showing that they aren't alone. Rather than shocking the audience, the message gradually worked its way into our hearts and minds.

Godspellbound

By Grove Potter

Impossible, you thought, but the Living/Learning Center Players have produced a musical that rivals their smash of three years ago, Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat. Last weekend's four shows of Godspell, directed by Daniel A. Kelin II, played to packed houses in L/L Commons 115 and left most viewers exhilarated and near tears.

Inventive choreography by Debbie Drown and a tight musical score conducted and cleverly adapted by Valerie Sue Jones created a structure within which the spirited cast let loose.

The cast, with the names of great philosophers on their sweat shirts, each sang their own version of reality, signifying the turmoil of man's faithless condition. The rising discord culminated in a brawl that was quelled when the showman Judas (Michael Forrest) entered, singing a lucid "Prepare Ye The Way of the Lord."

Jesus (Joe Richards) met the audience informally in his boxer shorts. While donning a superman football jersey and pants, he sang "Save The People." Richards' performance gained much strength from his vulnerability. Without upstaging or being overbearing, he played the King of Kings as a friendly teacher who enjoyed being with his disciples. Richards' vocals were precise, but occasionally difficult to hear because of the acoustically-tiled ceiling, carpeted floor, and crowded room.

The cast became a close knit family on stage with their tumbling and dancing, and this warmth spread to the audience. During "Day by Day," clearly sung by Anne Speroni, the company communicated the message with sign language as well as singing. In the next song, "Learn Your Lessons Well," sung from a perch on the grand piano by Michele Litwack, the cast jitterbugged wildly.

Karen Calabrese, one of the strongest singers in the cast, sang "Bless The Lord" while the others danced around a billowing parachute. The timing was sharp during this number with the women in the cast singing in a "Supremes" fashion of synchronized dance steps and arm movements.

Ingenious lighting-designed by Kirk Bartholomew transformed the L/L Commons room into a versatile theatre. The flashing of strobe lights during "All Good Gifts," sung by the humorous Mike Kunes and accompanied by wood block percussion by Tony Dias, created a 1920's film effect. The use of new wave sun glasses and stilted punk dancing made "Light of the World" memorable.

Between musical numbers, cast members took turns telling parables, with Jesus highlighting the lessons contained in each. The sound-absorbing room again made some of the dialogue difficult to hear.

Act II opened with Mike Richards singing "Beautiful City" in a gritty, soulful voice. Diane Lachtfupp's spirited rendition of "Turn Back, O Man," accented with flirtation with audience members, got a rise out of the crowd.

"By My Side," sung by Gloria Romano, Michael Litwack, and the entire company, contained the strongest harmony of the show. This sweet, simple song succeeded in tugging the viewers' heartstrings. At this point, the crowd was enthralled, sharing the sadness of the characters as they learned of the inevitable betrayal of Jesus by Judas.

Outstanding choreography by Dianne Lathrupp and crisp vocals by Mike Ravey during "We Beseech Thee" made this tune a highlight. Ravey, a natural comic, accentuated his part with funny nuances throughout the show. From a hambone rich man waving from a pedestal, to a prancing sheep, he helped add the elusive spark of hilarity to the production.

Sad good-byes between the cast and Jesus during the woeful "On the Willows," sung by Drown, Jones, Kelin, and Greg Lesch from the orchestra corner, captured the crowd's emotions. Sniffles and moist eyes were apparent among viewers.

Judas then strapped Jesus to a chain link fence, "fulfilling the words of the prophets," as Jesus said. A shocking red spotlight on Jesus' face as he writhed to the gut-wrenching guitar music of David Miles during the crucifixion elucidated the horror of the act. Jameson Allen capably handled the guitar music elsewhere in the show, when Miles worked the bass. Richards' vivid, aching vocals during the finale added to this effect.

The cast carried Jesus out of the theatre above their heads and returned to a warm standing ovation.

The hot, crowded room was slightly uncomfortable, yet it had the effect of bonding the audience together and bringing them closer to the stirring presentation.

The L/L Centre Players pulled off a tremendous show that proved what talent and enthusiasm can accomplish. This small group of dramatists continues to raise the level of expertise expected from them. Next year's efforts will be something to watch for.

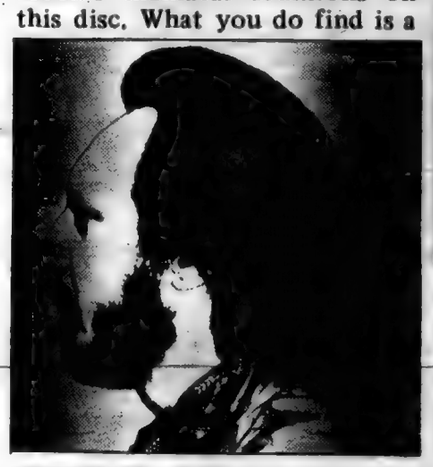
SANTANA To Rock UVM

By Mark J. Cadigan

The last day of classes this year will have an added reason for celebration – Santana will be performing at 8:00 p.m. in Patrick Gym. With a fine new album, Zebop, to support them, the band will be able to play an appealing variety of newer and older material. Powerful percussion, intricate rhythms, and the intense, soaring guitar work of Devadip Carlos Santana should make this a memorable concert.

An interesting twist to the show will be the addition of rhythm guitarist Jorge Santana, Devadip's brother. Other band members include: Armando Peraza – congos, percussion; Graham Lear – drums, percussion; David Margen – bass; Richard Baker – keyboards; Alex Ligertwood – vocals; Orestes Vilató – timbales, percussion; and Raúl Rekow – congos, percussion.

Tickets for UVM students go on sale at the Campus Ticket Store (x3085) on Saturday, April 18th. The price is $9.50 and two tickets may be bought per ID, with a maximum of three IDs. The general public can purchase tickets at $10.50 on Monday, April 20th. All seats are reserved.



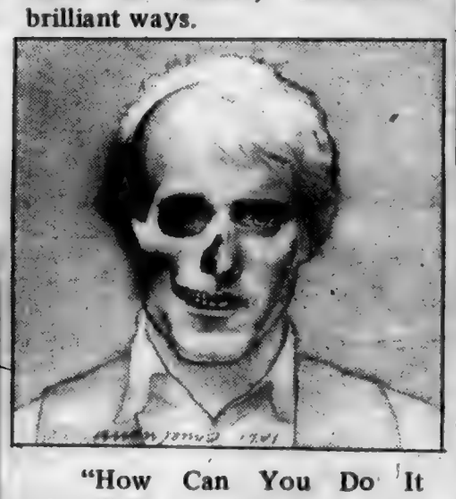
Make sure you get yourself a ticket – this is one concert you don't want to miss!!

THE WHO Change Faces

By Mark J. Cadigan

What do you do after you've written "My Generation," released a bundle of successful records, destroyed thousands of dollars' worth of equipment onstage, spawned the punk movement, created such movies as The Kids Are Alright, and attracted millions of fans all over the world? If you're The Who, you record another album.

Face Dances, the band's latest release, represents a departure. As Roger Daltrey sang on Who Are You, "the music must change," and so it does. You don't find Pete Townshend's windmilling power chords, Daltrey's hoarse screaming, or Keith Moon's maniacal drumrolls on this disc. What you do find is a stronger emphasis on vocals, more intricate rhythms, and Rabbit's flowing pianos and synthesizers.



New drummer Kenney Jones' style, though more restrained than Moon's, sounds almost as powerful with his quick rolls and hissing hi-hat percussion. John Entwistle's bass playing, which keeps the slower tunes rolling and the faster ones rocking, adds a funky texture to the group's sound. In fact, his "The Quiet One" and "You" are the rowdiest songs on the album.

Although Townshend really rips into his guitar only a few times, he picks and strums with a feverish intensity. The ringing, banjo-like solo on "Daily Records" expresses his controlled musical energy. Singer Roger Daltrey, who used to purge himself with sustained shouts, still emotes raw passion, but he also uses his vocal inflections in subtle, sometimes brilliant ways.

"How Can You Do It Alone" is one of the songs that best showcases Daltrey's skills. His groans and growls dramatize sexual frustration perfectly. The slight modulations of his voice correspond with the mood of the lyrics: "Back in the flat my girl sat in the shower/ And wasn't too keen on me sharing/ She came out well after an hour/ And by that time I was past caring."

Emotional anxiety reverberates in "Another Tricky Day" and "You Better You Bet." In the former, which features Townshend's lightning guitar riffs and Rabbit's tingling keyboards, facts have to be faced: "You can't always get it/ When you really want it/ You can't always get it at all." In the latter, the narrator opts for whatever he can get: "I don't really mind how much you love me/ A little is alright/ When you say come over and spend the night/ Tonight."

The need for reassurance arises again in "Don't Let Go The Coat," in which a coat symbolizes the all-encompassing protection of a strong love. Townshend's soothing guitar picking and smooth harmonizing further emphasize his feelings.

The furious anger of Entwistle's "You" provides a contrast to this peaceful frame of mind: "You – there's a name for girls like you/ You lead me on like a lamb to the slaughter/ Then you act like a fish out of water." His outrage is also expressed musically – his bass lines pump along at a maddening pace, accompanied by Jones' high-energy pounding and Townshend's wailing journey into space.

The only songs I find fault with are "Cache Cache" and "Did You Steal My Money," although both are fine on an instrumental level. The problem is with the lyrics. "Cache Cache" contains obscure references to bears and elephant guns, while "Did You Steal My Money" never clearly makes a point about theft.

Face Dances pushes The Who into new territory, and the band should be applauded for its creative burst. Bandleader Townshend's devotion to his art is evident in such lines as "just wanna keep making daily records." You keep makin' 'em, Pete, and we'll keep listenin' to 'em.

CONCERT

Jorma, Can Ya Hear Me?

By Mark J. Cadigan

VOLUME... is something all rock performers have to get a handle on, and something Jorma Kaukonen abused in his two concerts at Ira Allen Chapel on March 21st. The large crowd that had gathered for his 10:30 p.m. show had shrunk considerably by about midnight. Those who did leave early certainly didn't miss anything worthwhile.

Although Jorma's acoustic set was far superior to his electric one, it was still marred by excessive volume and the guitarist's perpetual mumbling of the lyrics. Just listen to the acoustic side of Hot Tuna's live Double Dose album and you'll realize the man is capable of much more than we heard that night. At Ira Allen, his instrumental "Embryonic Journey" reminded us – if ever so briefly – of his brilliance.

The electric set was a mixture of older and newer tunes, all of them obnoxiously loud and distorted. While Jorma tuned his guitar between songs, someone in the audience yelled out: "Could you please turn it down a little?" and the orange-haired musician noticeably flared. He made no attempt at lowering the volume, continuing to blow away the crowd.

Jorma, next time you're in town, why don't you keep the music at a listenable level? You'll probably make fewer enemies and you'll assuredly be able to reveal the talent you were covering up that night.

Mystery, Intrigue on ETV

By Ed Stearns

Mystery is alive and well on Vermont ETV as Scotland Yard detective Sergeant Cribb does his best to bring Victorian Scoundrels to justice. Five new episodes of Sergeant Cribb are scheduled for broadcast on consecutive Tuesdays beginning April 21, concluding this season's MYSTERY! series on PBS.

This Tuesday's episode, "Waxwork," is based on the novel which won the British Crime Writers Silver Dagger award for author Peter Lovesy. Filmed on location in the Chamber of Horrors at Madame Tussaud's Wax Museum in London, this episode is sure to send chills up the spine of even the most hardened mystery fan.

Sergeant Cribb, portrayed by Alan Dobie, is called to investigate after a photograph appears to cast some doubt on the confession of Miriam Cromer in the murder of her photographer husband's assistant.

The Sergeant Cribb series was produced for Grenada Television by June Wyndham Davies, a veteran television director for the BBC and Britain's ITV. Since 1975, she has worked on the popular Coronation Street and Crown Court series, while keeping a constant eye out for new material. After reading Waxwork, she immediately began making arrangements for a 90-minute television drama based on Lovesy's novel.

This series is a presentation of WGBH Boston and will air Tuesdays at 9:00 p.m. on Vermont ETV/UHF channel 33 or cable channel 10.

Those people lucky enough to have seen Oscar Peterson's March 20 Lane Series performance at Burlington's Memorial Auditorium were treated to a memorable evening of solo piano music. The works that Peterson presented reflected the artist's many influences, including classic tunes from the Bop and Swing period and his own highly personalized style.

Among the pieces that were played were impressive renditions of several classic songs. During the first set, Oscar played a short tribute to Bill Evans. He went on in the second set to perform one Charlie Parker song, "Old Folks," which was followed later by a classic Duke Ellington song, "Take the A Train."

I was particularly taken by one of Oscar's original songs, "Nigerian Marketplace." The flowing, melodic structure of this song slowly evoked subtle pastoral images. This song will appear on Oscar's next album, as a part of "The African Suite."

Peterson also performed a song called "Back Home in Indiana" that uplifted me with its buoyant melody. As was the case throughout the concert, Oscar was incredibly fast on the keyboards. He did some interesting scaling leads during "Back Home" which were intricate, yet executed at an amazing speed.

Burlington should be thankful that it's fortunate enough to have a program such as The Lane Series to present talented performers like Oscar Peterson.

The Afterglow of Nukes

Howard Zinn, noted historian and author of "A People's History of the United States," will deliver the keynote address for Earth Week '81. "The Effects of Nuclear Power and Weapons on the Earth." Monday, April 20, at 7:00 p.m. at the Ira Allen Chapel. The speech is free and open to the public.

Pick Up That Park

Students and townspeople will be getting together to clean up Burlington's Parks Saturday, April 25 from 9:00 a.m. – 1:00 p.m. Volunteers can sign up at the Earth Week '81 information table in Billings Student Center any time during the week of April 20th. For more information, call Dave at 656-3388.

Get Your Identity

Students planning to go abroad this coming summer or fall will be glad to know that 1981 International Student Identity Cards are available from the Office of Overseas Programs in Living/Learning B-178. Beginning this year, the card automatically provides students with accident and sickness insurance anywhere they travel outside the U.S., in addition to its other benefits. In order to obtain the I.D. card you need a statement from the Registrar's Office certifying that you are currently enrolled as a full-time student, a picture of yourself approximately 1½" x 2", and the $6.00 application fee. Cards issued now will be valid until December 31, 1981. For further information, call Marian Newman at 656-4296.

Rock Climbing With Russ

Jobs At MASSPIRG

Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG) will be at the Center for Career Development on Tuesday, April 28 to meet with UVM students interested in summer employment. Group meetings will be held at 1:00, 2:00 and 3:00 p.m. Interested students should sign up at the Center for Career Development, 322 South Prospect Street.

SCIA Needs Direction

The Student Community in Action, the umbrella group for all the student-run volunteer groups, is looking for a director. The position is a UYA internship. It is a year-long commitment and an excellent opportunity to work closely with students administration and the Burlington Community. Call Anne D. at x2062.

Lectures At Marsh Life

On Monday, April 20th at 8:00 p.m. in Marsh Life Science Hall, the University community will be introduced to two of the world's outstanding educators:

Dr. Paulo Freire, distinguished Brazilian literacy expert and educator and the author of the internationally known "Pedagogy of the Oppressed", and Jonathan Kozol, whose prize-winning first book "Death at an Early Age" about the terrors of inner city school life for a black youngster started a notable writing career on schooling, literacy, and produced such books as "Children of the Revolution," and "Prisoners of Silence" about the unresolved problem of literacy in the USA.

There will be a series of four evening sessions, each evening Monday thru Thursday at 8:00 p.m. as follows: "Literacy, Empowerment, and Social Change: Latin America," "Emerging Themes in the Struggle for Empowerment," "Conscientization at Work: Experiences in Africa and Latin America," and "Building Coalitions for the Future" respectively. All UVM people are welcome with a valid ID and community members will be seated first come first serve, with a $2.00 fee. Other events during the week will be posted. Contact the Center for World Education for further details at x2030.

The Last Cellar Door

Folksinger Bill Staines will be performing at a special Earth Week '81/grand finale Cellar Door Coffeehouse at Slade Hall, Thursday, April 23. Bill Staines has national fame for his songwriting ability, his four very good albums, and for being the National Yodeling Champion. So come and join us in celebrating Earth Week '81 at this spring's last Cellar Door Coffeehouse with Bill Staines, Thursday, April 23, at 9:00 p.m., $3.50 admission.

Star At Trek

The Trek Program is now soliciting members of the UVM community (faculty, staff, and students) who have had backpacking, bike-touring, and group leadership experience to help out with this year's activities. Particularly participants from former Treks are encouraged to apply. Trek will involve about a week's worth of time (Aug. 31 – Sept. 6) including three days of preparation, and a four-day trip ending on the Sunday before school begins. Expenses and group gear will be covered during the trip. Trek leaders aren't paid for their work, but they will be rewarded with a new group of friends and a memorable experience. You will also feel good helping new students become acquainted with UVM and the countryside of Vermont.

To apply for either a hiking or bicycling leader's position, stop by the Student Activities Office in Billings before April 21 to pick up an application and set up an interview with one of last year's leaders.

Outing Club Positions

Outing Club positions open – Volunteers needed to help organize the club for next year – publicity, special events, Lane Series, treasurer, etc. Interested? Come to weekly meetings at the Outing Club Tuesday, April 21, at 5:30 and get acquainted.

March On Washington

The Burlington chapter of CISPES, which is opposed to U.S. Military Intervention in El Salvador, is organizing a bus that will leave for Washington on May 2 and return May 4. We urge all concerned to participate in this united action. If interested, plan ahead to get a seat! Will have a contact number next week.

Research

Research volunteers – wanted overweight individuals 18-35 years of age for 8 week metabolic studies to help determine the causes of obesity – free room and board – contact Dr. Harvey L. Fatzett, x3920.

Help Out Winterfest

Get involved; be on the 1982 Winterfest Committee. Take an active part in UVM's leadership. Applications are available at the Student Activities Office, and are to be passed in by Friday, April 24, at 4:00 p.m.

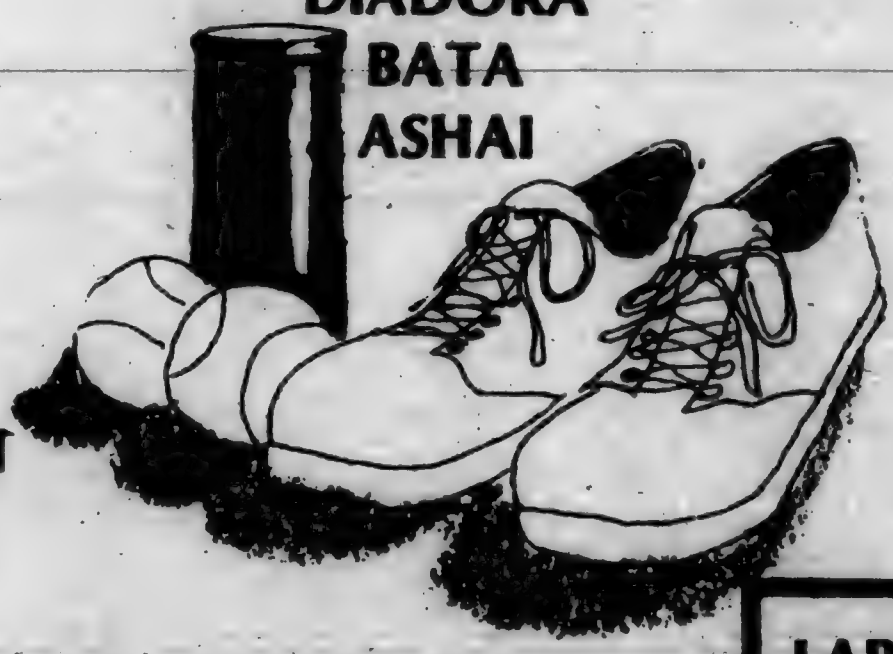
TENNIS TUNE-UP

PROBLEM

Your tennis string gradually lose their tension and resiliency over a short period of time. This results in a loss of control and power in your racket. Your tennis grip loses its tackiness and this results in slipping and blisters.



SOLUTION:

Let us restring your racket with your choice of tournament nylon or textured bobylon strings. We will also replace your tennis grip with a smooth or raised full leather one to give your better control. Your racket will look, play, and feel like new. All of this for only $14.95

Shades Of Ray Charles

INSIDE: Cynic Guide to Queen City Cuisine

"Last summer I played Frisbee every day!"

"Last summer I moved 15 credits closer to graduating!"

Some students think of education as a nine months on-three months off process. In this day of higher costs, it makes sense to use the full year to complete an education program and get into the job market as soon as you can.

The University of Vermont offers over 200 courses in sessions beginning throughout the summer. It is possible to complete 12-15 hours of credit between the close of spring and the beginning of the fall semester.

The summer catalog will be available in April at the Registrar's Office, Waterman Building and Continuing Education, Grasse Mount. Students are encouraged to use the registration material in the catalog immediately to insure a place in class. For further information contact the Summer Session Office, Continuing Education, 656-2085.

Now is the time to begin planning your summer.

ARTHUR FLETCHER

APRIL 25, 1981 (Saturday)
MEMORIAL LOUNGE (Waterman Building, UVM)
2:00 pm

"PREPARING TODAY'S GENERATION FOR TOMORROW'S REALITY"
A look at the facts and fantasies of equal job opportunity laws.

ARTHUR FLETCHER: former Assistant Secretary of Labor whose affirmative action program was the first to survive legal challenge up to the Supreme Court. Expert in affirmative action and is rapidly rising in both controversy and importance to businesses.

In lecture point out that equal opportunity does not necessarily mean a free ride; that the realities of the job market are often in sharp contrast to the ideals of EEO legislation.

Cooperation Rather Than Controversy

Over and over again WCAX–TV airs the film clip of students perched wildly on a Church Street light pole during last year's "spring fling".The righteous Burlington Free Press writes that the City demands an end to the bash, or else.

Mayor Sanders and City Hall are not challenging the students to a showdown the Friday night after exams, as the Free Press would have it. The mayor has called for an end to the rowdiness and bottle smashing that has occured, and that has caused in the Burlington community quite a bit of concern and some contempt for the entire UVM student body,which is now essentially on trial as the lone defendant before the Burlington media.Sanders has called on the Burlington Police to arrests vandals, and justifiably so.His message is a good one:Burlington taxpayers deserve respect.But unlike both WCAX and the Free Press,Sanders acknowleges that spring fling is not exclusively a UVM student affair.St. Michael's students and area high schoolers– and the Burlington media organizations– flock to Church Street for the over-publicized event.

The mayor has in fact welcomed Burlington students and non-students alike to City Hall and downtown, and has called for a new cooperation between the University and the City of Burlington. He has been looking into alternatives for future "flings", such as free concerts and exhibits that the whole city might enjoy together, peacefully.

Unfortunately, the Burlington community has been convinced that only UVM students are to blame for the nonsense on King Street outside the Chickenbone every weekend and the fling maliciousness.Right or wrong, with all the media hype of the last few weeks, that will be hard to change.

So we should start to change it now.We should give Mayor Sanders the cooperation he is calling for, rather than provide the controversy that proves so juicy for the *Free Press*front pages and the WCAX evening news.

Letters To The Editor

An End To The "Fling"

To the Editor:

As the end of the semester draws near, attention on the campus and in the community inevitably turns to the "Spring Fling" occurrence that has taken place in Burlington each of the past several years. The event began several years ago as a spontaneous, good-humored, and festive salute to the end of the academic year. It has taken on increasingly ugly overtones in the past two years. Broken glass, vandalism of property, and other illegal acts have taken place increasingly over these two years. Successful efforts were made last year by many on the campus to discourage UVM students from attending the "Spring Fling." The event occurred anyway with large numbers of non-students in attendance and with a continuation of the ugly and unpleasant features that have come to characterize the evening.

In preparation for the event this year, Mayor Sanders recently issued a statement to the Burlington Police Department, making it clear that, "People, students and non-students, who violate the laws concerning property destruction and violence should be arrested on 'spring fling' – as well as any other night." I strongly endorse the view that illegal acts should be dealt with accordingly.

In addition, however, I believe the event has taken on sufficiently unpleasant qualities that we would all be better off if it ultimately faded away. Perpetuating the event under the current circumstances does not serve the community well. I urge students once again this year not to attend this year's "Spring Fling" event. Presence there, however innocently motivated, could easily lead to a perpetuation of the unpleasant events of the past.

There are many occasions on which students and others from the area can enjoy the pleasures of community-based gatherings in Burlington. The joint UVM/City of Burlington effort for the Winterfest this year is a good example of the many opportunities that do exist for community-wide celebration. We encourage such healthy and positive events, and hope that more will be developed in the future. "Spring Fling," however, has become an event that does not fit into the category of wholesome and healthy activity for the City or for its participants. Thus, we would like to encourage its demise.

UVM President Coor

Dismayed At SLS' Approach

To the Editor:

Concerning Chris Dempf's article "Contesting Tickets," I am pleased to see the paper is informing citizens of their legal rights in conjunction with speeding tickets. I am, however, dismayed at the approach a co-director of the SLS took to explain those rights.

The second paragraph of the article overlooks some very important considerations. When you are pulled over for speeding, you do not have to tacitly accept the citation, smile and drive away and then think about the best plea bargain you can get. [Now more than ever the State's Attorney's office wants nothing to do with plea bargains.]

You have the right to ask for the officer's name and badge number. Do this even before he asks for your license. If he refuses, this ground alone could dismiss your case. Write down his name and those of the witnesses. If there are none, you may wish to ask a passerby to act as a witness. Inspect the radar equipment. Write down the brand name, serial number and speed indicated. Make sure your witness sees all this. The radar device may be defective or illegal in the state. A state can have only a certain number of radar devices and they must be of a specific type. Write down all geographic factors of the area where you were clocked. [Walk back to it if you have to.] Notice trees, overcast sky, turns in the road, big trucks or other vehicles that may have been present, hills, boulders, etc.. Any of these can affect a radar scanner. Do all these in front of the officer. Do not wait until you drive away. This is called making a case ex post facto (after the fact).

Cops are not lawyers. In many cases you know more about the law than they. Simply by showing them that you do in fact know your legal rights, could stop them from handing you a citation. (Cops don't like to be one-upped.)

But most important! Be firm and BE POLITE AND COURTEOUS!

For more information there is a paperback entitled "How to Beat Radar and Do It Legally."

Sincerely,
Gregg Friedman

Round And Round With The Communications Department

By Howard S. Lincoln

The sequence of events that has occupied a prominent position in the minds of the faculty and students of the Communication Department, the staff of the College of Arts and Sciences Dean's Office, and various segments of the University and Burlington communities since early February has been likened to a boxing match.

The latest round took place Tuesday, April 21 as the faculty of the College of Arts and Sciences voted 71 to 44 with one abstention in favor of the College Curriculum Committee's proposal to discontinue the Department of Communication. Although the intensity of the match has lessened since the previous week's student rally, a disturbing bipartisan air still remains.

An "Us against Them" dichotomy has emerged, taking the matter well beyond simple curricular jurisdiction. Personal, as well as professional, charges have been leveled from both sides furthering the bipolar nature of the proceedings. Somewhere along the way, something was lost or shrouded by narrowed perceptions.

That something is a compromise solution, elements of which are contained in the Curriculum Committee's proposal. Although the Committee, and a majority of the College faculty, agree to the disbanding of the Communication Department "as at present constituted," both have left the door wide open to future options, unlike Dean Jewett's proposal.

The Committee and the College faculty have agreed to the formation of a University-wide review committee to be appointed by the Academic Affairs Committee of the Faculty Senate. This committee's work will have to be expeditious and thorough as a full report on the future location of Department faculty and the development of a coherent program in Communication is expected by February 1982.

It is unclear where faculty sentiment lies on this issue as their vote reflects both a desire to rid the college of the complex problems associated with the Communication Department, and a willingness to afford students and faculty the opportunity to help create a comprehensive and meaningful Communication degree program at the University of Vermont.

Post mortems are not in order, nor will they be. We have confidence in the proposed review committee to extend an impartial arm of support to the discipline of Communication for present and future generations of students. We also expect the faculty of the Department under the leadership of Dr. Frank Manchel to work together to provide quality instruction in a positive and construtive learning atmosphere.

A final note to fellow students. If you perceive the quality of programs in your department to be unacceptably low, and sense a lack of cohesion amongst its faculty members, then for the sake of rational discourse, bring it up with the Chairperson or whoever you deem appropriate. Confront the problems early before finding yourselves embroiled in the middle of a match for your future. Take it from us, it's tough to be effective from a ringside seat.

UVM Dictionary Of Collegiate Terms

By Mike Hambly

The Admissions Office has recently prepared a new aid for use in Orientation: a UVM Dictionary with definitions and usage notes for 200 general and local collegiate terms. Here's a sampling:

Ace (v.) To get an A in (a course).

All-nighter (n.) 1. What one "pulls" when an unstarted term paper is due the next morning. 2. A wild sexual escapade.

Blow Chow (v.) Colorful term for what you do after drinking a fifth of Southern Comfort or committing SAGAcide – (which see).

Blow Off (v.) To purposely skip something. This verb often takes an 8 o'clock class as a direct object.

Bonus (n.) Something very pleasing.

Brewskies (n.) Beer (Prep school origins)

Bummer (n.) Something which "bums one out," i.e. disappoints or depresses. (California mellowspeak origins)

Burnt Out (adj.) Describes one whose brain has been "fried" by continual drug use.

Caffeine Job (n.) Term paper done during an All-nighter – (which see).

Catch Rays (v.) To tan.

Computer Jockey (n.) Can be found at terminals playing elaborate games and living off vending machines at 2 AM.

Do a Bone (v.) Smoke a joint. (Not to be confused with going to the Bone – a UVM hangout.)

Elephant Scabs (n.) Cafeteria veal patties.

Faced (adj.) Very intoxicated. (Short for shitfaced, origin unknown.)

For Sure (prep.) Pronounced (fur shur). Indicates agreement with whatever previous speaker said, even if one wasn't listening.

Granola Smoking (n.) Activity facetiously attributed by detractors to those who oppose nuclear power or are into organic foods.

History Describes someone who will soon be leaving, as in "We're history."

"How Was Your Weekend?" All-purpose conversation starter on Mondays or Tuesdays.

"It's Been Real." Meaningless farewell phrase.

Izod Lacoste Alligator (n.) Widespread reptilian species found mainly on shirts.

K.A.O.S. (n.) Stands for "Killing as an Organized Sport." A campus-wide paranoia-inducing game for aspiring hit men or CIA operatives.

Mudbone (n.) One of the Shoeboxes' Hall Advisors. According to ubiquitous graffiti, he "lives."

Munch Out (v.) To stuff oneself, especially with "munchies" – junk food such as pretzels and potato chips.

Nerd or Nurd (Either spelling is acceptable) (n.) One dedicated to academics to the exclusion of everything else including a social life and common sense. Horn-rimmed glasses and high-water pants are often characteristic. A nerd is not cognizant of his condition.

Perennial Student (n.) One reluctant to face the outside world who thus changes his/her major just before scheduled graduation – several times.

Pre-law Student (n.) Political Science Major.

Pre-med Psychosis (n.) Results from cut throat competition for med school admission. Fear of receiving a B in Organic Chem often results in onset.

Preppie or Preppy (n.) One who deliberately projects a high-status image. Lacoste shirts and middle names that sound like surnames are often, though not always, characteristic. Unlike nerdishness, preppiness is a conscious state. [Note: Many who attended prep school are not "preppies".] The female of the species is called a prepette.

Psyched (adj.) Emotionally ready or eager for something.

Quarters (n.) A drinking game designed to get one faced – (which see).

Rule (v.) To be superior, as in "Hamilton rules" or to be great, as in "That rules."

SAGAcide (n.) An overdose of cafeteria food.

Shoeboxes (n.) Res Life's freshmen dorms with "early San Quentin" decor.

Shroom (v.) To enter an altered state by eating psilocybins.

Space Cadet (n.) One whose mind is figuratively no longer in touch with Ground Control.

Spring Fling (n.) Lemming-like migration downtown of exam-crazed students on last day of Finals.

Veg Out (v.) 1. To eat vegetables. 2. To put one's mind on hold and watch television in a comatose state.

Wail (v.) To verbally abuse or physically beat on someone or something.

The Week in Review (n.) Saturday night leftovers

"What's Your Major?" Most frequently used line at college parties.

Graduation: Maximize The Cash Flow

By Russell Flannery

For decades, advisors on American college campuses have urged seniors to invest time in preparing resumes, filing job or graduate school applications, or broadly estimating long-term post-graduation plans. These collectively represent a gross misallocation of time and campus resources. If graduation is properly addressed and managed, students should be able to successfully plan their careers on a few grey days at the beach in the summer or fall, while drinking locally stilled Myers and OJ and generally reaping the benefits of the free market system.

The most important activity for the entrepreneurial, prudent, and fiscally opportunistic American student is to maximize the potential cash flow customarily associated with graduation. Second only to marital rites and far ahead of birthdays, graduation offers one-shot benefit of goodwill, and a consequent opportunity for otherwise unattainable financial gain. This financial gain is the lubricant of the mighty American economic machine.

The primary hurdle to this patriotic culmination of the college years is, of course, the acceptance of profit maximization as a guide for good living. St. Thomas is not stalked on virtue, and those who have difficulty accepting what some liberals consider the "unsavory" prospect of bending others for a few also be borne in mind that in our free society individuals spend their wealth however they like; but this also creates the possibility of shifts in preferences without formal notice. Graduation is basically a short-term market imperfection where people actually prefer to give the student money. An important recognition is therefore, if you don't take advantage, someone else will.
will!

A cynic might complain that a free market emphasis changes graduation from a celebration of personal accomplishment into a fund-raising event. This is irrelevant. In fact, graduation might be interpreted as an exercise in capital budgeting of sorts, where the student locates a short term source of "cheap" money in order to ensure a reliable income at a future date. After a reasonable level of consumption, he invests the remaining cash in oil refineries, or, as one popular commentator has noted, steel mills, improving productivity, reducing inflation, and serving as a fine illustration of how both the individual and the nation benefit from unregulated economic flows.

Studies prove the most popular instrument for mobilizing capital is direct mailing. Instead of laboring through more precise estimation techniques, a few examples are listed below, with some brief comments on how the piece introduces the critical elements:

Dear Aunt Jane,

My graduation is May 16. I hope you recall the $75 I sent Jay for his three years ago, before inflation zoomed nearly thirty percent. Hurry.

Love,
John

–At the bare minimum, it is necessary to mention what differentiates the student's worthwhile capital drive from those of left-wing, terrorist fund-raisers from the Audubon Society. This should only involve a casual mention of the graduation date. This letter is not acceptable, however, because the inflation rate has "zoomed" nearly forty percent.

Dear Uncle Henry,

It was certainly great to see Gerry Ford lose, wasn't it? It seems impossible that four years of those Georgian ex-cons passed without our having the opportunity to discuss the national torment. Thank God Reagan is finally in office.

I ran into Phil over a recent vacation, who told me about your coup of selling Apple short. Touche. One of my good friend's favorite Uncles had essentially the same foresight with Exxon between December and February. The fellow even distributed "Share the Wealth" checks throughout the entire family afterwards.

I hope you can visit Vermont for my graduation on May 16. I'd really appreciate your thoughts on career choice.

With respect,
John

This is a deft weaving of excuses, ideological identification, peer pressure to contribute, with a cookie added as tribute to the ego. A commendable effort.

Hi Uncle Will,

Can you believe Reagan's pardon of Felt and Miller last week? The man is neither gentle or odious, but simply ignorant. Yet I'm undecided if the Dean of my College is even worse. After recently announcing a plan to abolish the Communications Department here (which in itself is incredulous in 1981) the guy had the audacity not only to attend, but speak to a recent seminar on "Mass Media and Foreign Policy." Remarkable.

I am graduating next month. I might try to get an internship with the ACLU or Tsongas, but the financial constraint is a real problem and might force me to consider Lockheed. Oh, well...

Warm regards,
John

–Dealing with Communists is usually acceptable, provided they pay in dollars. This piece reflects the work of the intellectual American scholar, displaying cunning, diplomacy, and the use of 'the threat' – in this case, the suggestion of turning to Lockheed.

Generally then, graduation is usually the young American's first bout with the free market system. The student, in fact, is granted an institutional advantage. When the student uses it, we all gain.

In the interests of Americans, then, best wishes for a prosperous graduation to all.

Why Not A Billings Pub?

By Grove Potter

Does anybody else get tired of the expensive, crowded, distorted downtown bar scene and yet desire a place to meet with friends and have a beer once in a while? A place, perhaps, not unlike the many college pubs across the country?

Our S.A. staged a Billings pub on the night of the Jorma concert last month, and judging from the crowd, it was a big success. The problem with the beer running out was a combination of underestimating the crowd size and SAGA not stocking enough beer. Incoming S.A. president Dave Stewart said "we were ironing the bugs out with this one." The S.A. plans to have more one-night pubs next year.

The support exists to have a permanent pub on campus.

This pub could serve beer, wine, non-alcoholic beverages, and pizza. It could be run entirely by students as an S.A. organization. Restaurant management students could learn the hard way about running a small restaurant. Anyone wanting to make a few bucks could draw beer or watch the door. Former football players could make sure patrons don't get out of hand. Student and local musicians could show their stuff either for pay or at an open mike. Some of the piles of money that flow downtown could help fill the S.A. coffers. And best of all, undergrads, grad students, administration, and faculty could have a place to mingle and hopefully discuss more than "what's your major?"

Director of Student Activities Dave Nestor says, "the biggest problem is that we need a good physical place to have it. We could either designate a place and renovate it to fit the needs of a pub or build something new." He says plans for the Billings renovation project, at best three years away, will include a more complete food service area, possibly a pub. Nestor warns, though, that other schools he has visited do not report major profits on their student pubs. Hidden costs like insurance, licenses, and maintenance cut profits. "I wouldn't jump into this expecting to make a profit."

Problems with the campus liquor license also exist. Presently SAGA holds the one license for UVM, and the place designated for its use is the fifth floor of Waterman, including the Faculty Dining Room, the President's Dining Room, and the Phi Beta Kappa Room. SAGA also holds a catering license that permits them to serve liquor elsewhere after filing for an alcohol permit from the City of Burlington.

Senior Food Service Director for SAGA at UVM, Dick Anderson, says he's "happy to operate at a break-even level for students" concerning alcohol, but he will not allow "the food program to subsidize the alcohol program." As to how badly SAGA wants the liquor license, Anderson says, "I'm not so sure it's worth all the hassles."

Both Nestor and Anderson express concern over the increased drinking by young people all over the country, but neither see this as a reason to scrap the project. Nestor says, "we have to promote responsible drinking." Anderson feels that "if it [the pub] is used in conjunction with other programs (like entertainment) and food, and if drinking is not the primary function, then it's good."

A walk across our deserted campus any night past ten o'clock is like a trip through the twilight zone. The only things stirring are the dead leaves in the wind. Yet the downtown bars are doing a bumper business on student dollars. The establishment of an on-campus pub would bring some of the vitality lost downtown back to the campus, where it belongs.

The round room in the basement of Billings served nicely as the pub last month. An open mike and convenient beer dispersal were set up easily. Maybe next year we can enjoy a beer and the company of fellow students without having to pay through the nostrils and wade through the manure to do it.

Jeffords: Maverick Republican

By Joshua Reynolds

"I came here to represent Vermont, not the Republican Party..."

The political mood in the nation's capital has changed drastically since the Republican landslide in November, and the Reagan Administration and leaders of the new Republican majority in the Senate have rallied the Republican Party in support of President Reagan's economic proposals. In a show of political unity and determination, the Republican-dominated Senate recently proposed a budget which reduced spending even more than the Reagan budget.

Even the Democratic leaders in Congress have acknowledged the need for budget cuts, although the Democratic House is preparing a budget which will retain much of the spending for human services and other programs which have traditionally been a part of the Democratic platform.

Yet despite the conservative tide, Republican Congressman Jim Jeffords, in his fourth term as the Representative from Vermont, has introduced his own budget proposal which would restore funding for many of the programs drastically cut under the Reagan budget. In an interview with the Cynic, Mr. Jeffords discusses his budget, his role as a Republican during the Reagan presidency, and he comments on the election of Bernie Sanders.

Congressman Jeffords introduced a budget last week in the House of Representatives which radically differed from that endorsed by President Reagan and Republican Party regulars.

Jeffords' budget would restore funding for elementary, secondary and vocational education and retain the CETA program; it would restore funds for higher education loans, legal services for the poor, veteran's benefits and the Northeast Corridor Improvement Program (a part of Amtrak). The Jeffords budget also calls for the elimination of funding for the M-X missile system and a modified reduction in the parity for dairy farmers.

Most of these changes are extremely similar to those in the budget which the Democrats are proposing, but Congressman Jeffords does not find it extraordinary for a Republican to propose such changes, even in this year of budget cutting and Republican unity.

A Republican Maverick?

Jeffords declares that he is a loyal member of the Republican Party, but he feels that he represents Vermont before the party. Although the rallying point for the Republicans has been support of President Reagan, Jeffords is willing to fight the President.

"I came down here (Washington) feeling that I represent Vermont, not the Republican Party... the President and his Administration in some sense becomes a friend, and in some sense becomes an enemy... I disagreed with a lot of the Carter program... and when he (Reagan) takes positions which I feel are... adverse to [the interests of] the State of Vermont, then I fight him the same as I fought the Carter Administration."

The elections in November swept many liberals out of office, and in doing so forced many politicians to reexamine their political positions. Republican Party leaders often call this landslide a "political mandate" for Reagan and Republican economics. Jeffords, however, does not believe that this mandate ever really existed.

"There was a mandate to get rid of Jimmy Carter more than a philosophical mandate... that the Republicans seem to presume. I think to try something new in the economy and a mandate to reduce government spending and influence, but besides that mandate, the extent that people are willing to go is very much up to debate."

Jeffords has confronted the Republican leaders on a number of issues, yet he appears willing to take a liberal stance on these despite party pressure. He was "leaned on very heavily" on the issue of dairy price supports, when he challenged President Reagan's plan to reduce the parity paid to dairy farmers, and he expects to get "leaned on over the budget."

Placing Priorities

Despite Jeffords' liberal budget proposals, he does not feel that he is being inconsistent with the Republican platform.

"It all depends on where you place your effort (priorities)... the budget I proposed has less of a deficit than the President's does. I don't know if it (my position) is liberal or not, but I read of Republicans who say (that) we should increase productivity and... reduce government spending, and when you cut things which substantially affect productivity, such as training programs and education... it is counterproductive... These are important for increasing productivity and therefore help fight inflation and raise people's standard of living."

Jeffords in his Washington office

An Alternative Budget

The Jeffords budget proposes $8.6 billion more for education, training employment and social services than the Reagan proposal allows. He supports food stamps, but proposes redirecting funds for the very poor so that families with relatively high incomes receive less subsidy. His budget proposal would bring CETA funding to only 11 percent below the Carter proposal, and he is a strong supporter of education programs. Under his proposal, energy and environmental programs would be allotted $1.7 billion more than under the Reagan proposal. Jeffords would provide an additional $1.5 billion for health care programs.

These increases would be offset by a $2.5 billion gain from reforming the tax credit currently given to oil companies, a $5.3 billion program to eliminate waste in the defense budget, including the elimination of the M-X missile program, and improving debt collection to provide the government with an additional $10 billion. Jeffords claims that the deficit would be $7 billion less under his proposals than under Reagan's.

Two of the most notable areas where Jeffords is opposing the Republican budget cuts are education and energy. He would in effect continue funding for both these areas near the levels proposed by Carter.

Funding Education

There has been much discontent with Reagan's proposal to eliminate student loans for higher education, and Jeffords has been an outspoken critic of the cutback.

"I disagree substantially with... even the Democrats' proposals for cuts in higher education... they are cutting back too far on the availability of student loans."

He has strongly supported continuing student funding for education for the disadvantaged, claiming that the schools have a "constitutional mandate" to serve the handicapped and other students with special needs. And he opposes block granting, one of the cornerstones of the Reagan proposals, which would group funding for social programs into large direct grants, leaving the state and local governments to decide which programs get what.

"...these are areas where it is counterproductive to cut back... what you are really going to do is shift the cost burden to either the state or local government. I don't feel that should be done... the programs that they are cutting back on and block granting are going to pit the handicapped against other disadvantaged people."

Jeffords' proposed budget would restore most of the federal funds for education programs and provide $1.5 billion for student assistance loans.

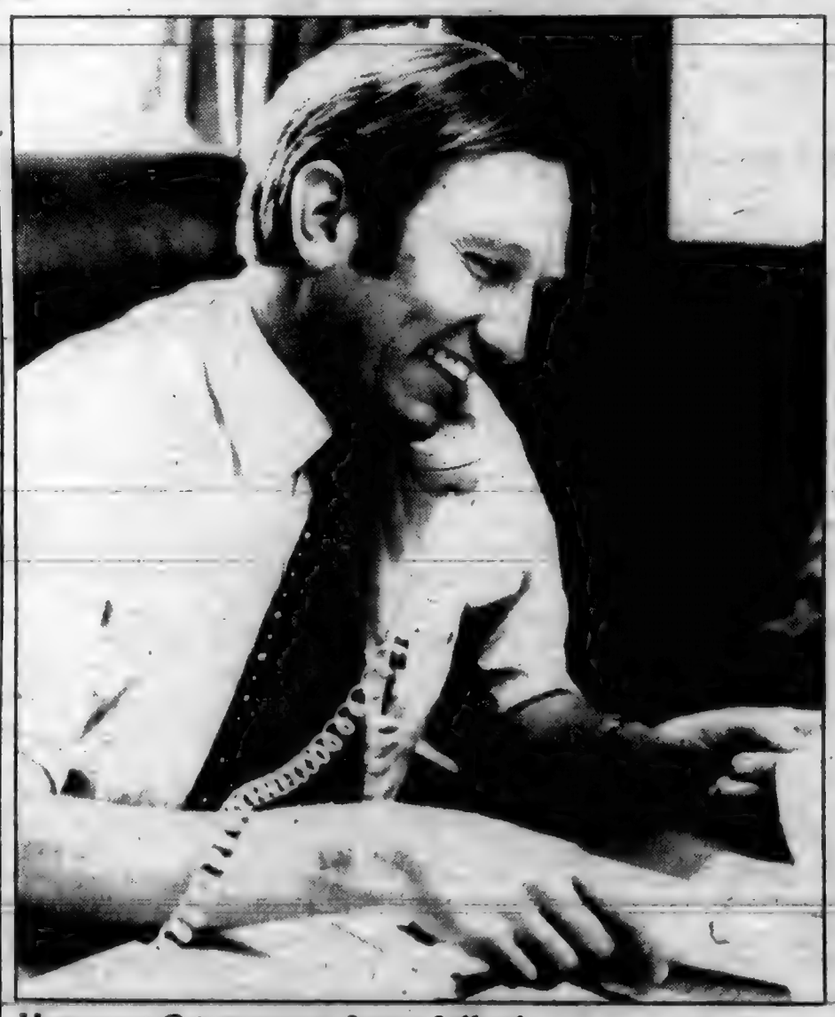
Energy Priorities

The Reagan Administration proposals have eliminated much of the funding for research in alternative energy sources. Instead, attention has been focused on allowing private industry to intensify its search for existing fuels.

Jeffords has long been known as an advocate of solar power, and he has committed himself to fighting for alternative energy. In his budget, he has attacked the Republican support of the oil companies by proposing the elimination of a $2.5 billion "tax subsidy," which the Reagan budget would allow for the oil companies. Jeffords has called the Administration's energy policies "backwards priorities." He has proposed that $853 million be restored for alternative energy research.

Jeffords appears interested in the Burlington Light Plant's construction of a wood-burning power plant.

"I think it is a good idea to try innovative things. I am concerned about the size of the plant... the volume of wood that would be required and the pollution problems... It would be better if it were located in Randolph somewhere where you have wood all year round... But generally speaking, I am pleased that they are trying something innovative with an indigenous resource."



Mayor Sanders

At a time when much of the nation is leaning to the right, Burlington's election of a Socialist mayor is a noteworthy event. Jeffords does not believe that the election of Bernie Sanders is the sign of a developing political trend in the city.

"Bernie Sanders was elected because most of the people... that voted for (him) wanted to send Mayor Paquette a message, not realizing that there would be enough messages sent to douse him from office.

I think Bernie will surprise people and that he will try to do a good job... he has the ability to develop, from an articulate critic of the process to a person who is able to deal with making the process work.

The worst thing that will happen is that Burlington will have a two-year, no show, not- accomplishing- anything mayor. But I think that Mr. Sanders will be better than people expect he will."

Students Helping to Build a Better Tomorrow

By Eliot Bergson

"When I balance the risk of the United States reducing their nuclear arsenal with the risk of increasing it, there is no quesfion as to the greater risk."

These words, spoken by Boston University historian Howard Zinn, underscored his keynote speech Monday evening for the week-long celebration of "Earth Week" here at UVM.

"Earth Week" is a symposium of lectures, discussion panels, movies, and workshops designed to raise people's awareness on a variety of environmental topics, including energy, wilderness, environmental health, and agriculture. The events were coordinated by residents of Slade Hall to commemorate and expand on the achievements of the original Earth Day, held April 22, 1970.

Zinn explained that many citizens feel powerless in the face of huge weapons systems and large financial outlays for armaments. Yet the ultimate success of any government policy depends on the public's support. Opponents of increased defense spending, then, should realize that "we do have the power to do something about it. The beginning of opposition is the withdrawal of consent."

Although many people believe that defense is a necessary and warranted expenditure, Zinn said, government officials plan for "survivability of command," rather than "survivability of people," in the event of a nuclear war. He added that Americans should let the government know that they want to prevent such an event, not plan for it.

"We have spent $1,000 billion, a trillion dollars, and $500 billion more on defense since Warld War II, and we are not safe. And now they say we have to spend more — billions on the MX missile system. We're in the midst of madness," Zinn said.

Because government officials are more concerned with the survival of themselves rather than the people's security, or even freedom, Americans should withdraw their consent from these programs, he said, adding that people in Western Europe are starting to have misgivings about the planned placement of cruise missiles there because they will be annihilated to "save" America.

"We defended Korea by destroying it and killing a million people. We did the same thing in Vietnam, and Western Europeans remember," he argued.

Another reason Americans should withdraw their consent from our national defense policy is that, in reality, "war is not good for the economy," Zinn said. "Japan has spent less on the military than any other developed nation and enjoys the highest rate of economic growth. For the U.S., it's exactly the opposite."

Zinn concluded his address by saying that all major social movements start small, and "pick up steam" very quickly. He cited the social movements of the Sixties as examples, and the Polish labor struggle as a recent example. "In the midst of these uprisings, empires topple, kings fall, and shahs flee," he said.

These sentiments were echoed by Dr. Carl Reidel, Director of UVM's Environmental Program, in a talk he gave Tuesday on Vermont's Renewable Resources. He praised the work of "Earth Week" organizers and told them to not give up hope because "most revolutionary ideas come out of universities — they did concerning the Vietnam War and the planning of Earth Day in 1970."

The former president of the Society of American Foresters said that popular support for environmental policies will be forthcoming. "Once the Reagan's programs hit the neighborhoods, they're going to explode," Reidel argued.

The major reason for these disturbances, Reidel said, was that the dismantling of the Environmental Protection Agency and other recent shifts in governmental policy will "mess up resource management," and people will have to pay for the clean up anyway. Without federal controls, he added, that cost will certainly be higher because pollution and mismanagement of resources will increase.

Reidel also said that new coalitions will arise as other cuts — most notably cuts affecting Social Security, Medicaid, welfare, and food stamps — are instituted. "That's going to stir up even the people that supported President Reagan," he said.

Evidence of backlash against "Reaganomics" is already occurring. A recent New York Times article explored the surge in ranks of conservation organizations, and a policy shift that the National Wildlife Federation, Sierra Club, and National Audubon Society are instituting. The shift is designed to combine the increase in grass roots support with more politically active conservation organization

International Instituions Are the Answer

By Jonathan Goodspeed

Who won the Boston marathon? The Japanese guy? Well, if the Japanese aren't nice in the marathon, we won't be nice in the car deal.

–Elliot Richardson

Four-time cabinet member Elliot Richardson said Monday that international problems can only be solved by a number of nations, and that these nations must form multilateral institutions concerned with the development and administration of laws.

Richardson, former Secretary of Commerce, Defense, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and one-time Attorney General of the United States, said that "there are no foreseeable problems that the United States can cope with alone." He also added it is not an opportunity, but a "responsibility" of this country to serve other nations. We still must be the leader, "because we've had practice at it."

Richardson's lecture, "The New Linkage: The Place of Dependence, Independence, and Interdependence," was the sixth and final lecture this semester in the Business Seminar Series.

He described "linkage" as an attachment between two countries. "It's like hot weather and beer," he added. An example of linkage is the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and, as a consequence of that invasion, the U.S. boycott of the Olympics.

Yet there are other types of linkages. He said there is the "good bargain," where each side gets what it wants. "I get the money, you get the house," he joked.

For instance, a good SALT deal would be where both sides get what they want: "A relief of the pressure to buy more nuclear weapons," he said, but he did not elaborate.

A third form of linkage is the "perceived" or "conspiratorial" linkage. As an example of this he talked of his resignation as Attorney General under President Nixon. At that point in history, the U.S. was on the brink of conflict with the U.S.S.R., and Nixon was afraid of what Brezhnev would think if Richardson resigned. "If you resign," Nixon said, "it will look as if I didn't have my own government under control."

Yet the main theme of his talk was dependence and interdependence, both of which are important forms of linkages. "Most countries are dependent on someone else. The United States is dependent on imported oil. If we were to reduce our dependence on this material, we would become increasingly dependent on other materials."

He said we could achieve dependence on imported materials only at very large domestic costs. "We would be poorer then," he said. "We would then be dependent on domestic sources." In essence, he said that whichever way Americans' future goes, there will always be some form of dependence.

There is an "interdependence" among many countries around the world, he explained. "All dependent members are parts of a system, and pressures always manifest themselves somewhere else." For instance, if the United States is not careful how they handle the situation in Namibia, "if we lean too far to South Africa," he said, the Soviets might strengthen Angola, or Nigeria could retaliate. And Nigeria is the second largest supplier of oil to the U.S. He mentioned several other examples of "interdependence:"

–The impact of a new oil embargo could touch off a new round of inflation and recession.

–The taking of the hostages in Iran emphasized the "interconnectedness" of the world. All countries depend on the observance of rules and international

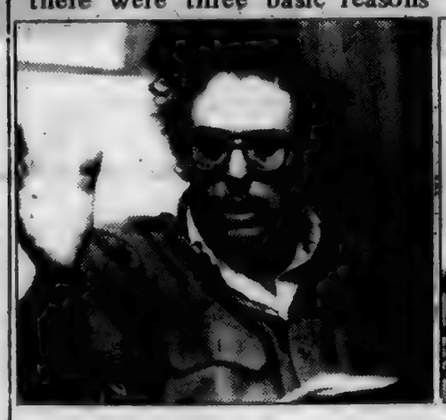
Housing Measures Lose By Huge Margin

By Sarah Bailey

Two tenants' rights proposals were overwhelmingly voted down by Burlington voters in last Tuesday's special election.

Both proposals lost in all six wards by at least a 4-1 margin. The final count was 5,249 to 1,394 against Question I and 5,295 to 1,332 against Question II.

The $360,000 Lakeside Avenue underpass bond also failed to receive a required two-thirds vote to authorize construction. Losing by only one percent, the 4,325 to 2,293 vote means that the underpass will continue to flood, stranding people in their homes.



Both Question I, developed by PACT (People Acting For Change Together) and Question II, developed by Burlington aldermen, called for the formation of a seven-member panel to hear tenant-landlord disputes. The committee would include two landlords, two tenants, and three homeowners. The major difference between the two was that the PACT proposal allowed incoming tenants to dispute rent increases, while the aldermen's version allowed such disputes only if the increase occurred while the tenant was living in the apartment. The aldermen's proposal also would have allowed the panel to rule on evictions.

"We're definitely disappointed," said PACT member Gene Bergman. He added that there were three basic reasons for the PACT proposal's failure: "Our own weaknesses, the aggressive campaign by the opposition, and the lack of tenants who are registered to vote, or who even went out and voted." Explaining that PACT had "never run a city-wide campaign" he said that "we weren't prepared... we didn't expect that they would run a campaign of $20,000 and scare tactics. They ran a bogus campaign from start to finish," he said, "but they had the people who were mobilized and were scared."

The Committee For No on I/No on II campaigned heavily with mailings, radio spots, heavy advertising in the Burlington newspaper, and a phoning session to Burlington voters. People reported being called as many as three or four times and being asked to vote the proposals down.

When asked why PACT had not run an equally aggressive campaign, Bergman explained. "We didn't want to run a militant campaign; we've always wanted to work with people. It was hard to shift gears." He added that they have been working on the issue for four years now, "and at least we've brought it to a first stage conclusion."

No campaigning was done for Question II. Alderman Maurice Mahoney Jr., the plan's chief sponsor, was the only one who spoke out for it at a news conference and public forum.

S.A. Working Toward Less Destructive 'Fling'

By Terri Johnson

"Students have no right to destroy downtown." That's the message S.A. President Mike Deutsch wants to get across to the student body. Deutsch, along with Vice-President Rick Green and President and Vice-President-elect Dave Stewart and Pat McCabe, will collectively write a letter to students to emphasize that the city will not allow the after-finals destruction that has taken place in recent years.

Following the warning that Burlington Mayor Bernard Sanders gave the S.A. Senate two weeks ago, Deutsch says that S.A. is trying to educate the students so they realize that if they break the law, the city police will treat them like they would treat any violator.

"It's the explosiveness of the situation that scares me," Deutsch says. "One bad instance can cause a very bad scene. We are only asking that students behave responsibly."

S.A. recognizes that there is nothing they can do to keep students away from downtown. Last year's party at Gutterson Field House failed to keep students away from downtown and the University will not attempt such a party this year. As Deutsch says, "There's nothing wrong with students going downtown. It's a good party, but there's a fine line between having a good time and being destructive."

Deutsch says that S.A. hopes to get a group of interested students together who are willing to try to stop students from getting destructive. They do not want a "student patrol" to walk around wearing arm bands or T-shirts to identify themselves. Rather, they would like to have some students in the crowd who will have had some non-violence training and can calm drunk and abusive people.

"We want the city and the police department to see that we're trying to do something about it. We've worked hard to establish a good relationship with the city and the (state) legislators and it would be stupid to destroy all that now."

Buying Tickets Was the Anti-Climax

By Hart Van Denburg

"How can you stand in line for three days to see a has-been band?" said one gentleman viewing the Santana line on Friday afternoon. The only conclusion anyone around me could draw was that the fellow had to be narrow-minded, a Deadhead, or both.

On Thursday afternoon the first signs of a "tent city" were springing up next to the bookstore in anticipation of ticket sales for the Student Association's first major "name" concert all year. The Santana Band, now some 12 years in existence, was on its way to Burlington and had caused quite a stir on campus.

By all accounts no one had expected the line to start until Friday sometime, but when students left class on Thursday seeing tents, deck-chairs, beanbag chairs, and cases of beer in some semblance of order next to the bookstore, they realized that there was no point in waiting any longer. This writer went back to his room, took inventory of the available resources at hand, and after a short prayer asking God to hold off on the rain, drove down to join the rapidly growing refugee camp. The prayer was not answered.

Thursday night was cold, but no one seemed to mind too much. The line stretched along the west side of the Bookstore, and cars, vans, and trucks were allowed to make use of the handicapped parking, which made tailgate parties very easy and numerous. No wonder the cold became a negligible matter. Various and sundry mind and body altering liquids and solids were being passed around quite freely, the music from car stereos got louder, and soon the topics of conversation moved from complaining to reminiscing.

People who were here at the time recalled the line for the Bruce Springsteen concert two years ago. It turned out to be UVM's version of the Who playing Cincinnati. People who were camped out for tickets got trampled in the rain, and a massive crush developed outside the tiny side door entrance to the ticket office in Patrick Gym. As one gentleman said, "the paint on that door tasted real good." Students hoped the same thing wouldn't happen again.

Predictably, conversation centered on Santana. What would they play? How long will the show be? Suddenly amateurs became experts in the field of music trivia, and everyone had a common topic of conversation.

Friday was another matter altogether. To begin with, it was raining when the motley-looking crew arose. Added to that was the noisy morning provided by the new brothers of a certain fraternity from Summit Street, who in their drunken, though well-meaning way, insisted on waking everyone up at five-thirty and handing out the early edition of the Burlington Free Press. Needless to say, no one moved, and the thirty-mile-an-hour wind out of the north blew the papers all over main campus. At this point in time, Dunkin' Donuts was looking better and better.

The rain. It started Friday morning, and it never really let up from that point on. The Outing Club was suddenly doing great business, with students rolling up at their door every half hour looking for tents, sleeping bags, rain gear, and other things that surrogate campers have great need of.

By Friday afternoon the line had Eastern Mountain Sports looking like a bunch of amateurs. Every kind of tent was represented, making the area in front of the bookstore look like a small three-ring circus. The acts of many of the tent dwellers would also have warranted that opinion. Things were definitely starting to get out of the ordinary. At that point we refugees were exposed to the first of S.A.

laws; even the U.S.S.R. condemned the Iranians.

–Terrorism is the "most clear manifestation of interdependence," Richardson said.

"We cannot cope with a problem if 50 or 60 nations are involved," Richardson said. "There has to be an institution to deal with it." He explained that the Law of Sea Conference is an example of such an institution. This problem-solving conference, attended by 60 nations, is in the process of determining who can exploit underwater gas, oil, and minerals. The conference will also determine regulations concerning the passage of tankers and navy vessels through straits, and enforce environmental legislation.

"What we have here is a constitutional issue," said this ex-ambassador to the Law of Sea Conference. The adoption of "universal laws" and regulations within international institutions is how "we are to address the realities of interdependence," Richardson concluded.

Comm Department Chairman Frank Manchel

PROFile

"What do the students learn if you give them what they want, rather than what is right?"

Interviewed by Wendy Goodrich

"What does it take to convince the students that the recommendations that have been made are in their best interest, and that I'm doing this for their welfare? Where has that issue been? What do the students learn if you give them what they want, rather than what is right?

"I regret very much that it came to this, because Communications is my discipline and I am a tenured faculty member in this department. Nothing would have given me more satisfaction than to teach communications and to teach communications students. I'm not happy with the present set of events, but I don't see, given all the circumstances, what else could have been done.

"There is a program, then there are resources for a program, then there are facilities for a program, and then there is personnel for a program. In almost all of these areas the Communications program, as it is now constituted, is not of the quality that I think ought to be continued.

"No one has really asked why we are doing what we are doing. It is easy for everyone to accept the reason that it is a personality conflict between myself and my colleagues, but the fact is that we are concerned with the welfare of the students, and, as administrators, see the need for a high quality program that would give the students the best education possible. The question is, were you getting the best education possible? If you weren't, what were we supposed to do, turn our backs on it?

"I believe in Communications as a discipline, but I also believe in excellence. If we do not have the resources, if we do not have the facilities, and we do not have the personnel, then we should not offer something that is not of the highest quality, and it is in the best interest of everybody to articulate that.

"There is a difference between my feelings for the future of the program and my feelings about Communications. They are two separate issues. This is where much of my disagreement with other members of the department comes from. We have professional disagreements over how one should teach, what one should teach, and whether what we were teaching was the right thing to be taught. Those are honest disagreements between professionals and my feelings towards members in the department do not go beyond those professional disagreements. I make absolutely no personal inferences in terms of their behavior or personalities, and it is wrong to think that there are personality differences between us.

"Those professional disagreements have been substantiated in all the documents that have been presented. Remember that I was basically the lone dissenter in the way the department was managed in terms of curriculum, standards, and direction for a number of years. In my judgment, professionals looking at the program from the outside agreed with me, and that is why the department was criticized.

"I don't think anyone fought harder in keeping this Department together than I have. All the years that I was complaining and arguing about the direction of the department was an attempt to make the program better for the students, for the discipline, and for the faculty. I never misled anyone or made any false promises. I have always wanted only the best for the Communications program. Unfortunately, it is very difficult to convince people of that when you are a minority.

"In 1977 when our department was given the chance to develop a program worthy of the College of Arts and Sciences, it was recommended that we have a thorough review in order to insure that that review would give us the best possible result. Three external reviewers were selected from all over the United States and it was those three reviewers that told us what we should do and what we shouldn't do. They recommended where we should go and where we shouldn't go. One of their recommendations was that if we didn't have the money for good facilities, then we should go for a theory rather than performance or production orientation. We tried for three years to do the best we could with what we had and to come to some resolution on this issue. We have been unable to do it.

"I've done what I truly believe is for the welfare of the students."

"Where were the students when attempts were being made to improve and resolve the problems within the Communications program?

"My arguments have been made over the past ten years in an effort to make the department better. I think it is misleading to believe that this has come across at the last minute, or that people haven't tried, or that there hasn't been an effort to make things better.

"In fact, I was surprised at the reaction of the students, and I was disappointed. I don't think that they fully understand the situation, nor do they fully appreciate the position I'm in, despite the fact that they have had plenty of time to examine the documents and have had access to all the information provided in the proposals thus far.

"It should be understood that I was appointed chairman of the department for two reasons. One was to run the day to day operations of the department, but equally important is that I am to look out for the welfare of the people in the department, and, in terms of the next three years, for the majors in the department. There was no one else better suited for the position than myself, and I would like to add that it was not a position that I wanted.

"I've tried to work to the best of my ability with the students and faculty on this issue. The students should know what the problems are. There is gossip around the campus, and they take the courses. I don't know what the students would expect us to do if we felt that this is not the way it should be. As I said before, I'm surprised they did not reach the same conclusions that I have.

"No one is happy about the situation, but I hope that when this thing is straightened out everyone will benefit from it. Students will get a better education, faculty will have more time for research and teaching, and we can improve the Communications discipline here at UVM. I'm doing the best I can to provide a quality education for students in Communications. Sure it hurts when students chant your name and ask that you resign, but I don't know what I'm supposed to do about it. Am I supposed to be a phony or prostitute myself? The students won't learn if you give them only what they want. I feel I'm giving them what is right, what will serve their best interest in the long run.

"I'm just hoping that history will take its course and that in the future people will look back and appreciate the position I was in and appreciate the fact that I've done what I truly believe is for the welfare of the students."

Concerts' attempts to organize the burgeoning camp that was now growing at an alarming rate.

"Why the hell do they want to move us to the other side of the bookstore when we've been camped out here for twenty-four hours," said one irate student. The answer was a little surprising. S.A. Concerts didn't want people jumping up on the roof when the tickets went on sale. I vividly recalled that remark about a "has-been" band, and thought to myself that there was no possible way any new "act" from the last two or three years would have created an anxiety attack like that.

So the fences went up in the direction of the theatre. All the pick-up trucks, vans, beer cases, and people moved in a very orderly way, and were soon settled in a new home, drenched in rain, but caring less and less by the minute. Night was falling, and so was an eerie mist, and as the street lights went on the whole scene reminded me of Apocalypse Now!

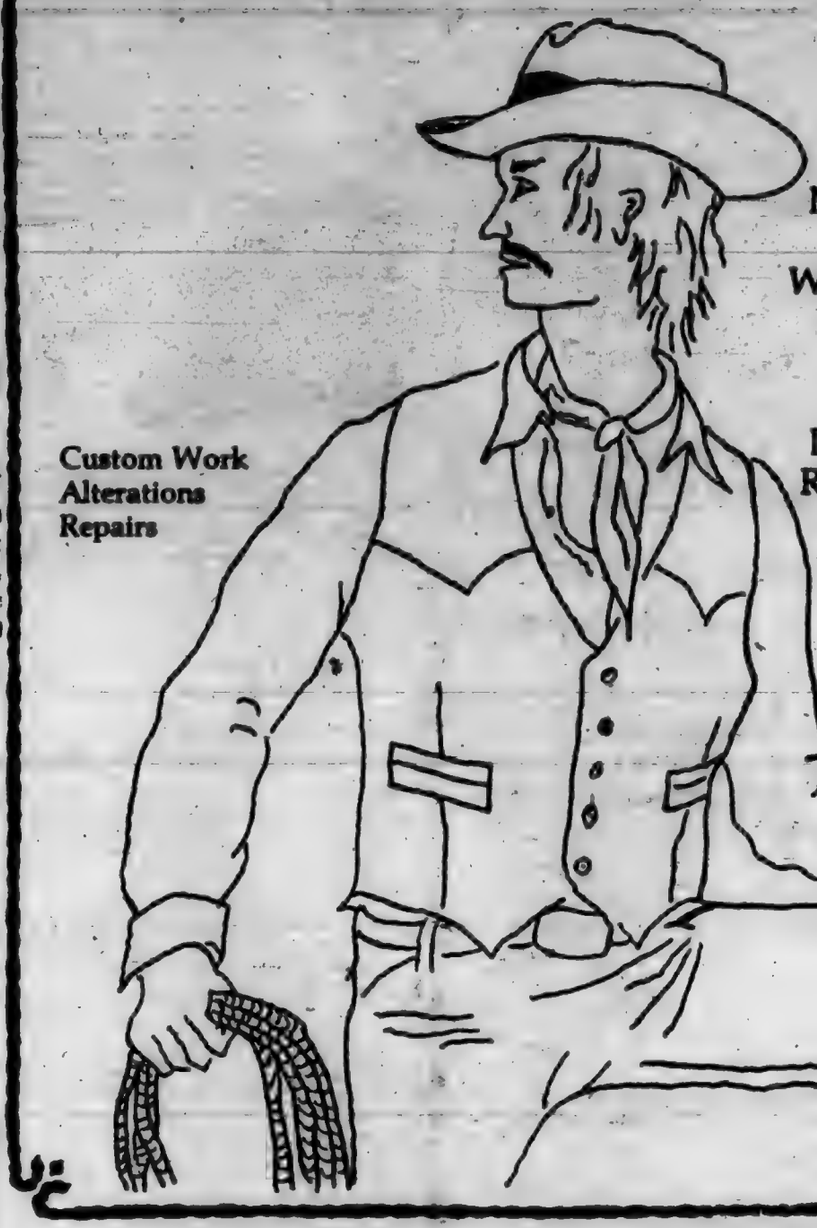
The innovations in tent life and structure were really something to be seen. Plastic garbage bags as raincoats, polyethylene sheets doubled over to form crude tents, and a semi-waterproof tunnel was constructed for those lucky enough to be in the first ten tents. The waterproof quality depended on where you stood, if you could stand.

Another welcome innovation was the way the entire community pitched in for each other and tried to make this damp and miserable experience a somewhat more cheerful event. Donations went out for kegs, pizza runs were made (one rather bemused Dominoes employee arrived at the site and all of a sudden the entire crowd remembered that they had ordered a large pepperoni and mushroom pizza), and two fine bluegrass musicians gave a free show in the portico of Royal Tyler Theatre. The relief was twofold. People smiled, and they also forgot briefly the tension of maintaining their precarious place in line.



At three-thirty in the morning, phase two of S.A. Concerts went into action. Unannounced, they went around to each tent and gave out numbers to those waiting in line. The idea was to guarantee those in the line their undisputed place when the tickets went on sale, stopping people from the back crowding forward. What it also accomplished was stopping people from joining the line "with their friends" in the morning. The purpose of doing this unannounced was that people couldn't call their buddies and tell them to get their tails down to the line. Given that 90 percent of the people in line were awake anyway, and that some mistakes occurred but not nearly as many as there could have been, the plan worked. Everyone who had been there for two days were going to get their seats, and they could rest easy.

As the sun came up on Saturday and one surveyed the scene, it could easily have been transplanted from a Cuban refugee camp. Garbage was everywhere, wasted beer, wasted paper, and wasted people as pie-eyed as they come. One interesting report came from the S.A. Concerts staff. They found one rather lifeless-looking gentleman lying face down in the theatre portico. They tried to wake him, and just as they were contemplating a severe case of mortification, the fellow came to. Did he know where he was? "No." Did he want a ticket? "NO." Did he want to go home? "No." Case dismissed, temporary insanity.

Buying the tickets was an anti-climax in retrospect.

staffs. The Sierra Club, for example, has begun a petition drive to demand Congressional removal of Interior Secretary James Watt. They are disturbed with Watt's decision to develop the entire continental shelf off Santa Barbara, California, despite pleas from ecologists to leave a portion of the area untouched to preserve marine and coastal habitats. The Interior Secretary has also proposed returning some National Parks to local management while halting the inclusion of additional areas into the system, and seeking to increase the number and power of concession stands in the parks.

The Wilderness Society has just appointed former Wisconsin Senator Gaylord Nelson, one of the authors of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969, as their new chairman. His appointment, along with the designation of a new economic and policy-analysis program, is designed to give the organization more political clout.

"Earth Week" organizers are pleased with the outcome of this week's events. "The response has been good," Sandy Smith, a Slade Hall resident, said Wednesday. "Many people are in favor of environmental concerns presently because things have gotten extreme. Carter had no clear-cut policy, but now the message from Washington is clear."

Smith added that "the most important consideration" was not attendance at the workshops and discussions, but the fact that people see and hear the advertisements, and they at least think about the earth, and their relation to it.

Another important aspect of the symposium, he said, was that its planning and implementation was accomplished by over 40 people, "from all majors, as well as students from Champlain and Trinity Colleges."

Eric Frothingham, responsible for organizing "Energy Day" on Wednesday, said that attendance was not the most important consideration, and added that "it has been successful in light of what time of year this is."

The Environmental Studies senior went on to explain that a new coalition to "promote global awareness" is coming together in Vermont. The group, an extension of the Center for Global Education in UVM's College of Education, will combine the talent and enthusiasm of students and faculty from St. Michael's College, Middlebury, and UVM.

"I've learned how many diverse things many people can put together when they just start with an idea," he concluded.

Buscaglia, Master of Human Potential

By Wendy Goodrich

Words cannot describe Leo Buscaglia, he can only be experienced. A professor of education at the University of California, an author, and lecturer, Buscaglia will speak on 'Loving Relationships' at Patrick Gymnasium on Thursday, April 30 at 7:00 p.m., and will also hold a 'Morning Dialogue for Educators' Friday morning, May 1, at 10:00 in Marsh Dining Hall.

Buscaglia has an inexhaustable ability to love, enjoy life, and share that with all those that come in contact with him. He is a living example of peace, joy, and happiness. No one could better characterize Buscaglia, though, than the man himself:

"Some people say, 'he is such a kook,' but oh what fun it is to be a kook!"

Buscaglia is the author of the books, LOVE, The Way of the Bull, The Disabled and Their Parents: A Counselling Challenge, Human Advocacy and the Educator's Roles, and Personhood: the Art of Being Fully Human.

Buscaglia has created and mastered the art of human potential.

"Everyone has something unique to offer. Isn't that challenge enough to get enthusiastic about your self?" he asks.

In addition to his books, Buscaglia has also filmed video tapes which have been shown on public television and are available at most media centers across the U.S. His popularity is due to the simple fact that he mesmerizes audiences and leaves them with an overwhelming sense of awe, warmth, and inspiration. Because of the emotion Buscaglia generates, he has become one of the most sought after speakers in the U.S., and is booked across the nation up to a year in advance of his scheduled appearances.

But even with his hectic schedule, Buscaglia is able to keep living each day to its fullest. After a two-hour speech he is likely to stay for another two hours hugging people in the audience, who can't help but be drawn to his magnetic presence.

His naturally expressive nature as a speaker and the message Buscaglia brings is a refreshing change from the increasingly dehumanizing times of the present. A passage from Todd Rundgrens' album Healing describes what Buscaglia symbolizes to those that have had the special privilege of hearing him speak:

"It said: It's time to make the world a little wiser. There are enough destroyers and criticizers, the world needs a Healer."

Buscaglia heals by loving, and that is the greatest potential any human being can hope to reach in a lifetime.

SPORTS

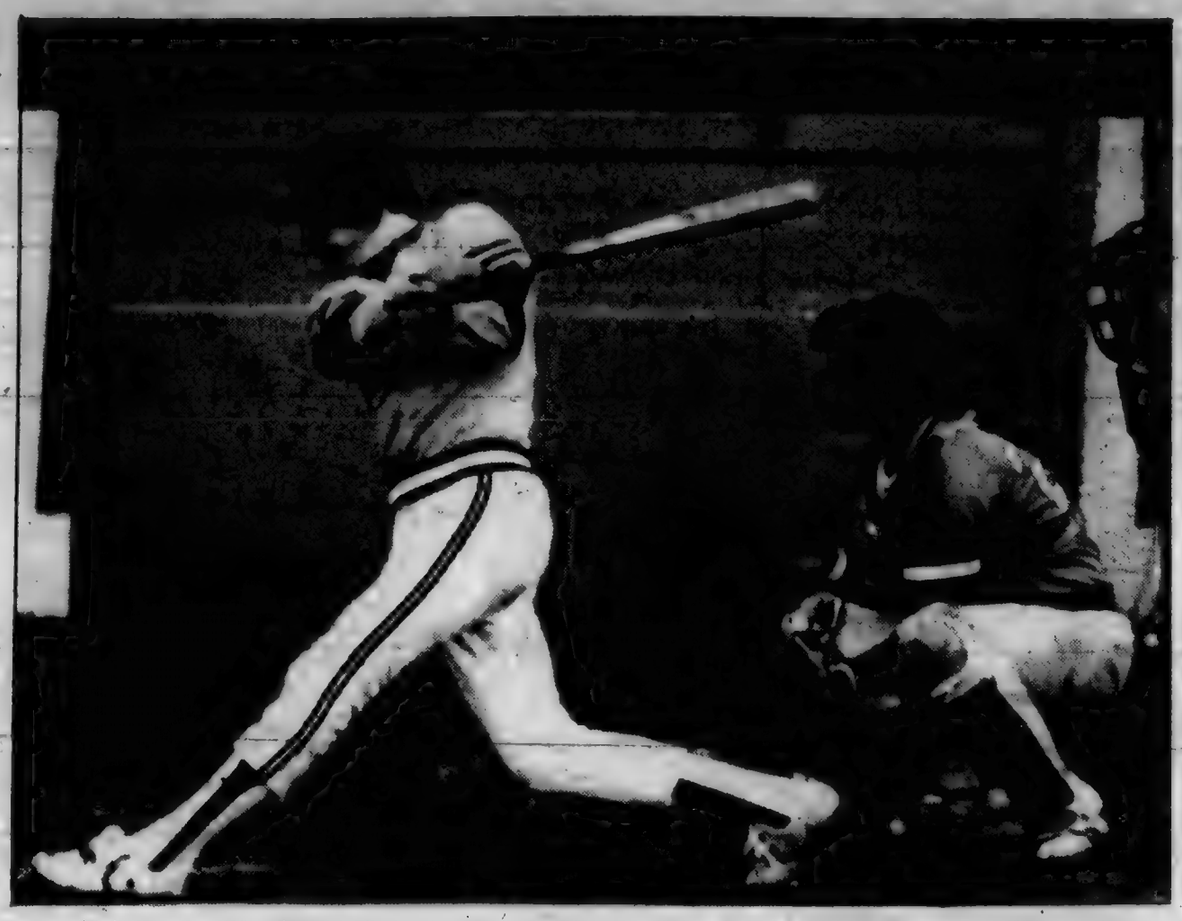
Boston, Philly Play For Title-Again

By Andy Cook

The Boston Globe's Bob Ryan calls it the meeting of I-95. Others will call it World War III. For the loser it will be hell, and a bunch of scratches and cuts.

Whatever it is, the basketball world will be watching very attentively this week and next week when the Philadelphia 76ers and the Boston Celtics, long believed to be the greatest rivals the game of hoops has ever known, hook up in a seven game series to determine this year's Eastern Conference Championship.

Last fall I predicted that Boston and Philadelphia would finish neck and neck in the Atlantic Division, and neck and neck, indeed, was how the standings looked on March 29 after the Celtics defeated the 76ers to win the division only by virtue of a better conference record.



Philadelphia is, as those fans from the city of Brotherly Love and surrounding suburbs in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware can testify to, a rabid sports town which has put up with the failures in post season play of its clubs. Although the Phillies won the World Series last fall, the Eagles, who jumped off to the fastest start in the NFL, lost the Super Bowl. That followed last year's Flyer loss to the New York Islanders in the Stanley Cup Playoffs on an overtime goal by Bob Nystrome. The Phillies, before last year's title, still had nightmares about the infamous choke of 1964 when the club couldn't hold on to a six-game lead with 12 games left in the season. As for the 76ers, there are memories of losing to Portland in the 1977 NBA finals after establishing a 2-0 lead over Bill Walton and company. There was also last year when the team was knocked off in six games by the Los Angeles Lakers, who proved unbeatable even without injured Kareem Abdul-Jabar. And, for long time basketball fans, there are bitter memories of the 1968 playoffs when the Celtics, labeled off by their critics as ole men, came storming back from a 3-1 deficit in games to defeat the 76ers in that year's conference finals. But even that loss couldn't match the frustration of the seventh and final game between these same two clubs in 1965, when Philadelphia, trailing by a point with the ball under Boston's basket with five seconds left in the game, threw an inbound pass right into John Havlicek's hands. The memorable moment in which Havlicek passed the ball to Sam Jones, who ran out the clock much to the delight of the pandemonium-producing crowd, provided the game of basketball and Celtic fans in particular, one of the greatest moments in this sport's history.

On and on we could go, about Philadelphia and its frustrations, but for New Englanders, the Celtics represent the only hope for a banner in Boston following Haywood Sullivan's apparent destruction of the talent-ridden Red Sox, the Boston Bruins' 3-0 loss in games to the Minnesota North Stars in the Stanley Cup playoffs, and another inconsistent year by the football Patriots. Although the Celtics finished with an outstanding 62-20 record, one cannot help but remember last season, when the team won six games only to get knocked off by Philadelphia in five games in the playoffs.

With years and years of frustration licking both cities, which one will be able to drink the champagne next week? Your guess is as good as mine. These two teams are incredibly equal in talent. Last year, Philadelphia had a distinct advantage at the center position, with the bulky Daryl Dawkins having an easy time with the shorter and aging Dave Cowens. But the "hulk" has been incredibly inconsistent during the playoffs so far, and to add to that, he now has to contend with Robert Parish, a seven-foot center, whose clutch rebounds and rainbow shots helped Boston immensely. If the two centers are equal, give Boston the advantage in the backcourt, and Philadelphia the strength in the forecourt. The Celtics have a driving man named Tiny Archibald who killed Chicago defenders with his numerous layups and quick moves. He, along with Chris Ford, possibly the league's best three-point basket shooter, are slightly better than Lyonel Hollins and Maurice Cheeks. Although Larry Bird has really been playing well lately, I still stick with the statement I made last fall, when I called Julius Erving the best player in the game today. The Dr. always plays well when a title is on the line, and is simply fast and versatile enough to penetrate through a great defense like Boston's Caldwell Jones, one of the heroes of the seventh game against Milwaukee, and sharp-shooting Cedric Maxwell are about equal in the other forward position. The benches are pretty good, too. Last year the Celtics had an advantage in this category because the team had four strong substitutes in M. L. Carr, Pete Maravich, Rick Robey, and Gerald Henderson. Maravich, whose three-point shots could turn a game around quickly, has retired, while Carr, the sixth man for Boston, may not be his usual self following an injury-plagued year. Andrew Toney, however, has done a super job for the Philadelphia team, and should help make the 76ers bench a very competent group of men, who are as good as Boston's second stringers.

Other factors to take into consideration are that Boston has the home court advantage, but that the Celtics, thanks to their own expertise in defeating Chicago in four games, may have lost some of their momentum because of a ten-day layoff. Philadelphia, on the other hand, will be entering a vicious playoff just two days after winning the seventh game against the Bucks by just one point.

One thing, however, is clear about this series. Whichever team wins should capture the NBA crown as well, since the elimination of Phoenix and Los Angeles, the perennial powers in the west, now makes it a fair statement to say that Boston and Philadelphia are the best basketball teams in the league today.

Maine Kills Cats In Doubleheader

By Harry Eastman

Coming off a doubleheader sweep of St. Michael's College, the University of Vermont suffered two disappointing losses, 5-2 and 9-1, to the University of Maine in a doubleheader played last Saturday at Centennial Field.

In the first game, the Catamounts jumped out to a quick, 1-0 lead, capitalizing on the wildness of Maine sophomore pitcher Joe Johnson. Jeff Greene scored on a wild pitch after he had been struck in the helmet by a Johnson pitch; and had advanced to third base when a potential double play ball was thrown into center field. However, Johnson calmed down to retire the side on a ground out by Bob Boucher, stranding Farrell on third and catcher Don Gasparino, who had singled earlier, on first. After holding the Black Bears scoreless the first two innings of the game UVM pitcher Chip Ziegler ran into trouble in the top of the third inning. After Maine center fielder Rick Lashua beat out an infield grounder, left fielder Brad Colton hit a shot, which sliced just inside the right field foul pole, for a two-run homer. Pete Adams followed Colton with a single to left field and scored when designated hitter Kevin Buckley slammed a 420 foot home run to left field that gave Maine a 4-1 lead. UVM cut the Maine lead to 4-2 in the bottom of the third when Greene lined a Johnson fastball over the right field fence. The Black Bears chased Ziegler in the top of the fourth after Lashua drove in Maine catcher Ed Pickett with a single to left field. Ziegler was replaced by reliever Tim Goddette, who stifled the Maine bats on three hits for the remaining 3 1/3 innings. Johnson, who pitched the complete game for Maine giving up just six Vermont hits while walking two batters and striking out seven, picked up the win. Ziegler took the loss for UVM.

In the second game Maine jumped out to an early 1-0 lead in the top of the first. After UVM starter Kirk McCaskill had retired the first two batters, Maine right fielder Tom Vanidestine walked and then scored when UVM right fielder Bill Currier bobbled a single by Buckley. The Cats evened the score at 1-1 in the bottom of the inning. Greene walked and then took third on a perfectly executed hit and run, when Farrell punched a single to left field through a spot vacated by the Maine shortstop who was breaking toward second base on the possible steal. Greene then came home after Maine catcher Pickett threw the ball into center field trying to throw out Farrell, who was attempting to steal. The Bears took a 2-1 lead in the third after Dick Whitten singled, stole second base, and scored on Buckley's single to left field.

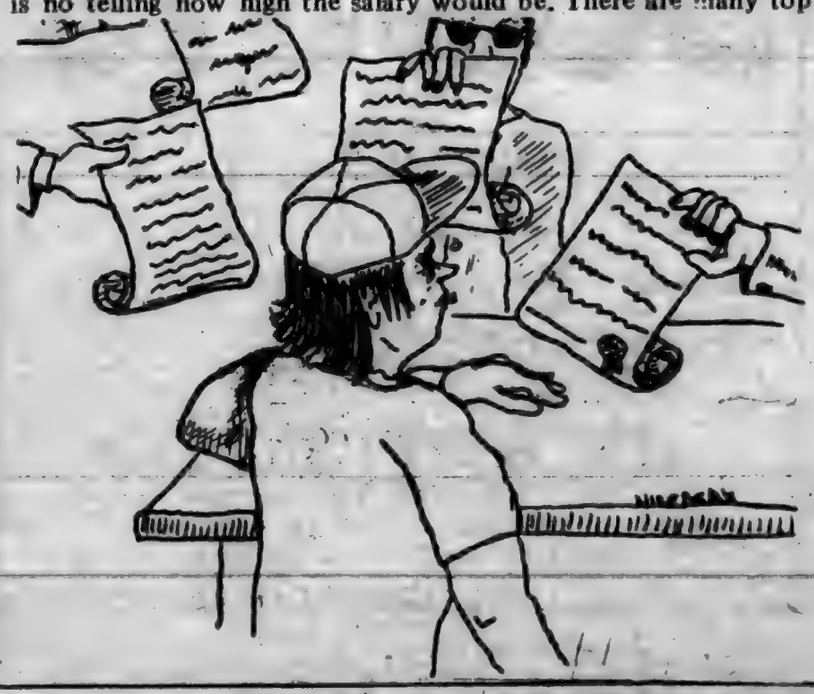
Free Agency Is The Method For Success

By Richard Bateman

For only $13 million, the New York Yankees acquired the services of Dave Winfield for the next ten years. To offset the rising cost of living, this figure could rise as high as $23 million. Is any athlete worth that kind of money? Will the free-agent market ruin the game of baseball? With pro's and con's for each side, there is no clear cut answer, but free agency is a benefit to baseball.

Despite the fact that Dave Winfield is being overpaid, I feel that the free-agent system is a key factor to baseball's increase in popularity over the last few years. After all, baseball is a business as well as an entertainment source. Similarly, baseball players are all businessmen as well as public figures. Financially-minded players entertain bids for their services and choose the deal they think has the most to offer. This is why we are in a "rent-a-player" age. Like hotdogs, double-plays, and home runs, free agency is a part of baseball and it is here to stay.

Bowie Kuhn, the commissioner of major league baseball, is against free agency and has warned owners of the destructiveness he foresees. With salaries spiraling higher and the number of free-agents increasing, Kuhn feels that baseball may become financially troubled. He thinks that most clubs have behaved rationally, but foolish player contracts signed by a few have aggravated the situation. Being strongly against free agency, Kuhn is narrow-minded when weighing the pro's and con's.



Kuhn sees only the bad side of free agency and stresses these flaws more and more each off-season. He fears that one team could monopolize the free-agent market and construct an unbeatable team that would destroy baseball's competitive balance. While it is true, in part, that signing free-agents has an effect on ticket prices, Kuhn fears that an increase in ticket price is synonymous with a decrease in attendance. This, along with his other fears, is not necessarily true.

During the four years of free agency, many players have signed contracts through this route. The salaries have dramatically increased and the ticket prices have climbed, but contrary to Kuhn's belief, attendance has increased. After a period of declining popularity and low attendance, baseball is gradually re-earning the title of "America's national pastime." In the past four years, major league teams set a combined attendance record. In 1979 this combined attendance total surpassed 43 million for the first time and in 1980, this mark was passed again as a new record was almost set. There seems to be more than mere coincidence in trying to explain the strong correlation between free agency and attendance.

Kuhn's counterpart in the free-agent issue is Marvin Miller, the director of the Players Association. Miller feels that free agency is directly responsible for the increase in attendance and has no doubt that free agency has been the single most important factor in the increase in popularity of baseball in the last four years. An example that backs up Miller's claim is the New York Yankees' attendance figures.

George Steinbrenner, the Yankee owner, has spent more money on free agents than any other owner in baseball and the past two seasons, the Yanks have set attendance records. This, in spite of a rise in ticket prices each year. Steinbrenner feels that signing free agents may raise ticket prices, but the excitement generated by these "high-priced performers" will draw the crowds. Steinbrenner expressed this belief when he stated, "the fans pay for them free agents. I don't. We're going to give them the team they deserve."

Many players sign new contracts with their current team because of a sense of loyalty. George Brett, Mike Schmidt, and Steve Garvey are good examples. These players are among the best in baseball, but their contracts are not among the highest paid. If any one of these men tested the free agent market, there is no telling how high the salary would be. There are many top players in major league baseball that feel the same way. The rich owners – Steinbrenner, Ted Turner (Atlanta), Gene Autry (California) etc. – have signed their share of free-agents, but the smaller teams such as Boston and Milwaukee, and the non-contenders such as San Diego and Chicago (AL) have also signed many free agents.

Kuhn Must Understand Baseball's Direction

Players are only human and must do what they think is in their best interest. Many decisions over which team to sign with have been based on reasons other than money. Veteran third-baseman Sal Bando signed a contract with the Milwaukee Brewers because he felt the Milwaukee area was right for his family. Al Bumbry went through free-agent draft, but re-signed with Baltimore (for less money than he could have received) because he felt Baltimore was the best town to play in. Many players, Carlton Fisk for example, have changed teams through free agency because of disagreements with team management. If there is any blame to put on the free-agent market, it must go on the owners. After all, it was the owners that established the so-called "era of high salaries." If it were not for eager spenders (the owners) there might not be so many millionaires in baseball today. In 1976, the Boston Red Sox introduced baseball's first millionaire when they signed Bill Campbell to a $1,050,000 contract. Since that time, more than fifty players have become millionaires this way. Regardless of the money being thrown around, the owners regard their acquisitions as reasonable.

With the birth of the free-agent draft, the baseball season has been extended to a year-round basis. The interest level in the off-season does not decline because many people are interested in the free-agent system and the many trades forced by free agency. This is a plus for baseball and leads to increased advanced ticket sales. The Sporting News, a reputable sports news source, has a weekly story on each team throughout the year. Much of this news is generated from free agency. In past years (before free agency), baseball was forgotten from October to March unless a major deal took place.

Baseball is a public service because it is a major source of entertainment. Like the movie industry, baseball is an expensive operation. The more the owner spends, the more he expects to receive through attendance. If free-agent critics would only compare the salaries of actors and baseball players, a big deal would not be made. A baseball player must work every day and take long trips away from home. He certainly earns his salary as much as an actor or actress does.

The players win, the owners win and most importantly, the fans win from the free-agent system. Financially, the free agent market is good for the players (through salaries) and the owners as well (through ticket sales). I think the fans benefit the most because the free agent system allows any team to sign new players each season and compete for the pennant. With more teams in the pennant race, the game is more exciting and less boring. Imagine how boring it would be if the same team won year after year. With free agency around, the chance of that happening is very slim.

As for Marvin Miller, his stand on the free-agent issue goes against everything that has been written, but nevertheless it is a good point. I hope Bowie Kuhn can change his morbid outlook on the future of baseball because there will always be generous owners and lucrative contract offers, and there will always be free agency.

A Sneak Preview of THE JAZZ CO.

By Janice Cable

"It's show time, folks!"

It's not really, it's actually the Jazz Company's last non-dress rehearsal before their performance on Sunday at Le Club. This is not Le Club, these are not costumes, the fluorescent lights are anything but mood-setting. It is the studio at Main Street Dance, and the leotard, unitard, tight, warmup clad dancers are only preparing for a show in this room amidst the smell of citrus fruits and the scent of sweat that never quite leaves a dance studio.

But with that spoken line, The Warmup, the first of the Company's numbers, begins.

George — Benson's "On Broadway" is familiar even to people who didn't see All That Jazz. The movements of the dancers are all too familiar to anyone who has taken an ounce of jazz. The choreography can be found in any class; it's just as the name implies: warm up exercises. But this does not make the number any less of a dance. The dancers' facing opposing directions and doing different movements make it like a three-ring circus.

The Warmup, involving most of the company, ends with the dancers doing kick-ball-changes (ah, this writer has taken jazz, a little) and people asking, "Now, what was the count on that?"... "Why was there confusion at the end?"... "After that, do we do four sets of those, or...?"

The performance of Main Street Dance Theatre's Jazz Company this Sunday at Le Club promises to be a good one. The show includes punkjazz, modernjazz, jazztap, discojazz, broadway/Rockette jazz and the kind of classical jazz that you usually think of when you think of jazz.

The program includes four repertory pieces carried over from last December's Le Club show: The Warmup, Paradise, a modern jazz number, Git It, a funky, fast and curious dance full of different styles, and The Line, a Broadway-type reminiscent of the Radio City Music Hall and A Chorus Line that makes up in class and style what it lacks in innovative choreography.

Two punk pieces, Mind Control and State of Mind, performed to the music of The Police, are innovative, to say the least. There are quick, jerky movements of heads, shoulders, hips. At one point the dancers drop their paranoid looks and become robots, moving like C3PO's in time with the music. It is a dance of painful expressions, like a primal scream in dance. The contrasts work well, but it is not pleasant to watch. These numbers are, in a word, hot.

Cold Flame, a modern jazz number, isn't unique only in its choreography. This is a Burlington Jazz troupe dancing to a song done by a Burlington Jazz band — Kilimanjaro. This and Paradise, full of uplifted, reaching arms and dramatic expressions, are the modern jazz portion of this well-rounded show.

Diversity is found again in the tap number Minor Drag, anything but a drag to the audience, and Traffic Jam, which brings to mind all too clearly driving in New York City with the dancers bent over road maps and bumpercar-like choreography, each dancer narrowly missing each other. Minor Drag, a Fats Waller number, conjures images of slouching men in zoot suits. It is a far cry from any "good ship lollipop" tap stereotype.

You Two, danced and choreographed by the two chairmen of the board of the Jazz Company, Karen Amirault and Nancy Watkin, is diverse and enjoyable. The dance gives ample solo time to both, and is diverse and enjoyable. Although the two dancers' styles are very different, they move well together.

Staggered choreography, individual movement, intriguing steps are the name of the game of the Jazz Company. There is every type of movement from a funky chicken Charleston in Git It to a dance of paranoia in the two punk numbers. The show is completed by a performance of Chapped Lips, an a cappella singing group of two MSDT dancers and two outsiders, who perform bluesy love songs.

The Jazz Company's goal is to perform a repertory program and to take it around to nightclubs in Vermont. Their performance this Sunday at Le Club in Winooski at 3:00 and 8:00 p.m. will be a step in the right direction. The company is only waiting for the costumes, make-up, lights, and audience. Anyone who can spring the $4.50 reserved, $5.50 door, for the ticket, should go. But remember, it may look easy, but as the poster hanging above the wide expanse of mirrors in the studio says, dance is work.

The Dead Get Nostalgic

By Mark Cahill

"When you go down to Deep Elem
Put your money in your shoes
'Cause the women in Deep Elem Got those Deep Elem Blues."
—Traditional

Jerry Garcia's early background in music was primarily bluegrass in 1965 when the Grateful Dead formed. It was the combination of this bluegrass guitar and the highly electrified San Francisco sound of the sixties from which the Dead derived their immense popularity. I find it fitting the unpredictable nature of this band that they issue a double live album of acoustic music, Reckoning, in their sixteenth year — a move that no one really anticipated.

The general tone of the album is nostalgic. Both album sleeves contain photos of the band during the sixties. The material that is presented is drawn from many of the early Dead albums, as is the case with "Ripple," "Dark Hollow," and "China Doll." Other songs, such as "Deep Elem Blues," were played in concert in the early days but never recorded. In fact, eight of the sixteen songs appear in different forms on other albums.

On hearing this album, I was immediately taken by the incredible beauty of these acoustic tunes. I was particularly impressed by the richly instrumental versions of "Birdsong," from the first Garcia album, and "Cassidy," from Bob Weir's Ace album. Both contain some of the hottest Jerry Garcia leads I've heard in years, and should rightfully be considered classic Grateful Dead songs.

I wonder why the Dead have juxtaposed such memorable songs as "China Doll" or "Dire Wolf" with the needless redundancy of "It Must Have Been the Roses," a song featured on two other Dead albums. "China Doll" is intriguing in the fact that Brent Mydland plays harpsichord on it, a truly novel change.

"I've Been All Around This World" already appears on the live Bear's Choice in acoustic form. It's nice to see that the Dead still perform this song in concert, but did they really need to include it on yet another album? I don't think so, since they can produce high-quality, first-run material like "On the Road Again."

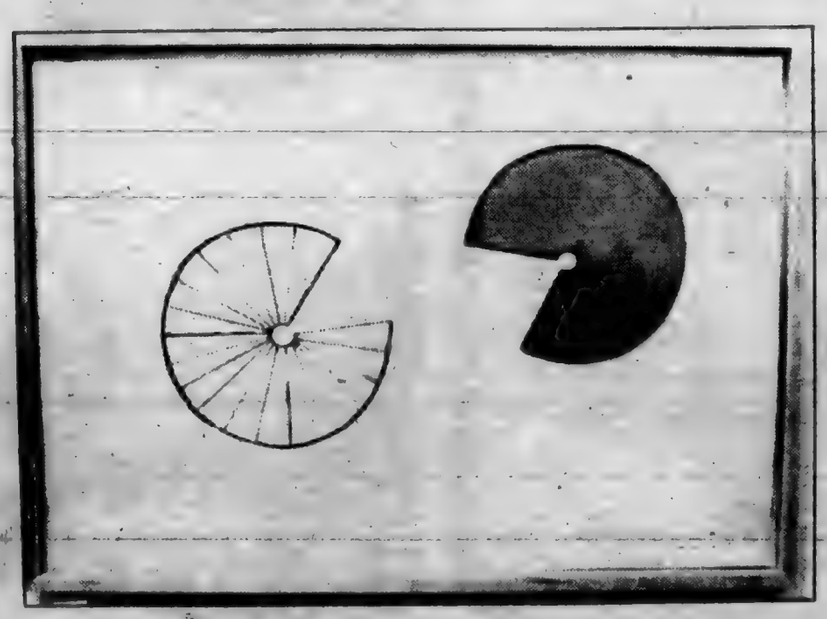
Reckoning is undoubtedly some of the finest music the Grateful Dead have recorded in years. The sound quality is impeccable and for the most part, the songs are definitive. If you're a "Dead Head," you must buy this album (although you probably already have it). If you aren't, I strongly urge you to give it a close listen, and I'm sure you'll be as impressed as I am.

A World of Art Within The Fleming

By Sarah Brayman

The Burlington art community was out in full style and color last Thursday to celebrate the opening of exhibits by Barbara Zucker and Max Kozloff at The Fleming Museum. The addition of these shows to current works on display by William Wegman and Katherine Porter provides a clear vision of a quality and range of artwork now important in the American art world.

Barbara Zucker, chairperson of the UVM Art Dept., has a collection of her sculptures and drawings on display. Her use of color, flocking, and bare metal surfaces are essential to the clean visual understatement of her sculptures. Cadillac Coral and Plume II, the largest sculptures of the show, are variations of a fan shape set on a galvanized steel base. The fan of Cadillac Coral is short, broad, and painted bright copper, while that of Plume II is tall, narrow, and metallic blue. Pipe without Ruffle, an aluminum pipe with a flocked surface, joins the wall and floor in a simple gestural curve. Ms. Zucker's collages and drawings consist of heavily outlined shapes and lines which are carefully placed in their composition.



William Wegman's exhibit reflects his dry sense of humor. In an altered photo, his dog Man Ray sits on a pie plate with his paw on a can and his face inked over with a Frenchman's cap, beard, and moustache. In the drawing Potato Face Gets An Ear, a potato rejoices because he'll now be able to hear. Adjacent to this is a pencil outline of an odd shape, entitled I Can't Figure Out if I'm a Balloon or a Beet. A video in one corner of the room plays some of Wegman's tapes. In a series of short skits, Wegman performs alone and with his canine companion.

Max Kozloff's presentation is made up of numerous color photographs. The artist celebrates patterns and their juxtaposition: crowds dressed in hot pink, red, and yellow rain gear in Piazza San Marco, Venice Rainy Day hung next to rows of metallic strap sandles in Shoe Store, Newbury St., Boston. Similar use of bright color is apparent in his portraits, varying in composition from a man on a horse to a woman on a vividly-spotted couch.

Katherine Porter's drawings hang in the balcony on the second floor. Vibrant energy is contained primarily by the scale of the drawings, as a variety of shapes, swirls, and zig-zags move about the paper. Porter expresses herself in black-and-white, color, loose sketches with lots of splotchy white paint, and densely colored paintings.

Ms. Zucker commented that the grouping of these four very contemporary exhibits is the result of the efforts of the UVM Art Dept. and The Fleming Museum. Wegman came to UVM through a video grant from The National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) and matching funds from the Art Dept. Kozloff, also financed by NEA and matching funds, was chosen by the Art Dept. faculty as part of the "visiting artists" program. Porter's exhibit was available due to the efforts of the Art Dept. and museum staff. Zucker, already a faculty member at UVM, was asked in September to show her work. The Art Dept. has been primarily responsible for the lectures and housing of the artists, while The Fleming has provided space and installation for their creations.

Zucker went on to say that the quality of this group of works is comparable to that found in any fine gallery in the U.S. In Vermont, artists tend to be inward, working privately. Being a distance from major metropolitan areas can isolate an art community, so this exhibit is a chance for artists and others to get direct input from other parts of the art world. Artists in cultural centers are increasingly anxious to reveal their work outside their immediate environment, since they benefit from an expanded audience and the travelling experience. Similarly, the Burlington community can benefit by viewing this extraordinary exhibit.

It's No Game

By Judith Coolidge

The end has come! Samuel Beckett's one act play Fin de Partie, directed by Anne Linton, will be performed in French on Saturday, May 2 at 8:00 p.m. in Billings North Lounge. The play is put on by five students who are interested both in theater and French; it will be free and open to the general public.

Fin de Partie, known in English as Endgame, portrays with humor and pathos the lives of four characters coping with isolation and the inescapability of their situations. The two main characters, Hamm and Clov, played by Eric Matthews and Claude Cernuschi, present the conflict of a father/son relationship. Their dialogue highlights their dependency upon one another, as well as their need to act and participate in life in order to survive. The two secondary characters, Nagg and Nell, played by Francois Bakou and Judith Coolidge, portray the parents of Hamm, and in their roles illustrate other ways of coping with existence.

Please come.

THIS SUMMER GET CLOSER TO NATURE IN Vermont

If your summer studies will involve fields, forest and watershed, Johnson State College's 1,000 acre Babcock Nature Preserve offers the ideal environment to gain field experience. The Preserve combines the advantages of a large field station with the convenience of well-equipped laboratories and the support facilities of the campus.

Our program (May 18-July 11) offers 2 week intensive courses in Field Ornithology, Green Mountains Natural History, Aquatic Plants, Field Mammalogy, Watershed Dynamics, and Environmental Conservation Education. Give yourself some credit this summer.

ALBUM DANCE CRAZE

By Jim O'Donnell

About a year ago England was swept by one of its many fads, ska music. Spearheaded by groups such as The Specials and Madness, the English population started moving its feet to this 1960's predecessor to reggae, which had been imported to England by the many Jamaicans who had emigrated there. Though the originators of the music were black Jamaicans, the neo-ska revival began primarily with white "post-punks," and most of the bands the movement spawned were either all white or bi-racial.

Although it was a huge hit in England, the ska craze made only a minor dent in the U.S. charts, and many people questioned whether it had any musical value beyond "fadism". With the release of the soundtrack to the movie Dance Craze, we can see that it is an irrelevant question. Billed as "The Best in British Ska — Live," Dance Craze is the best dance album to come out in years.

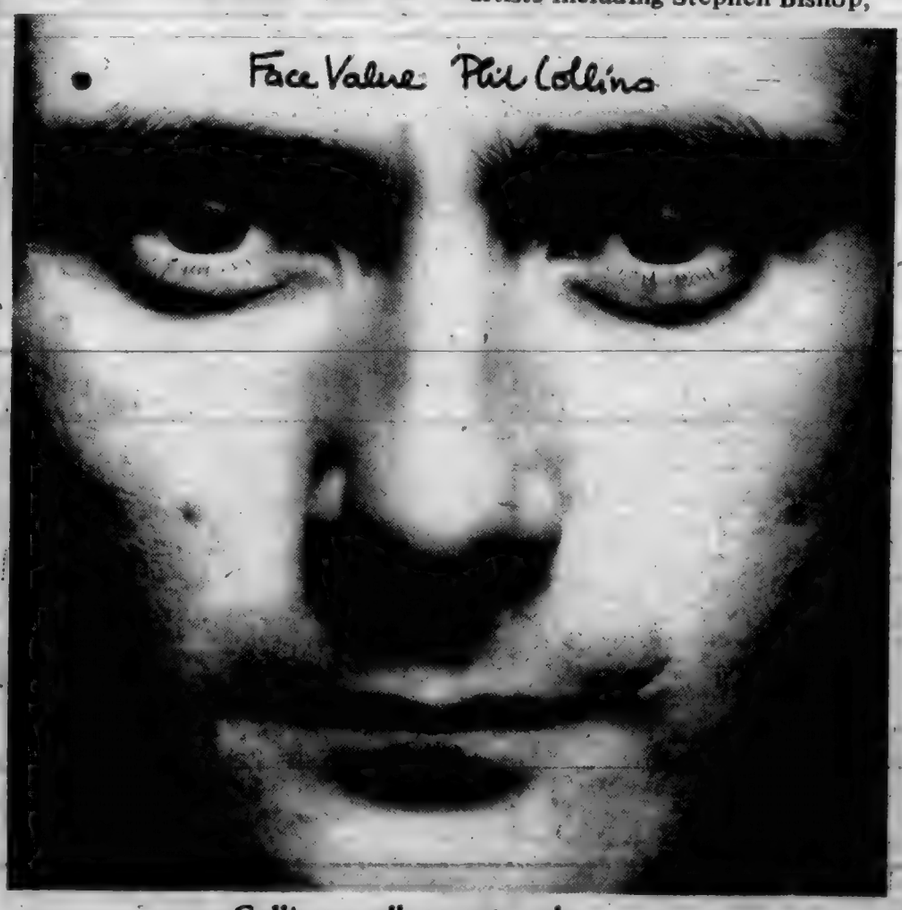
All the big "names" of ska are represented — The Specials, The Selecter, Madness, and The English Beat — as well as a couple of lesser-known bands, Bad Manners and The Body-snatchers. From the raucous opening number, "Concrete Jungle" by The Specials, to the concluding song, "Nite Club," also by the Specials, the album pumps with energy. All the songs are cut live and one would assume at different places, but they segue beautifully without missing a beat. It seems as if all the bands are on the same stage trading songs.

It's hard to say which band comes off the best on this album, so I won't bother trying. However, special attention must be paid to The English Beat for their excellent rendition of "Mirror in the Bathroom," a song about narcissism, "Big Shot," which deals with the realities of power, and the great dance tune, "Ranking Full Stop." Also, the previously-mentioned Specials provide high points.

Of the other groups, Bad Manners shows that it has the potential to be great. They burn up the grooves with the sizzling "Lip Up Fatty" on Side One and "Inner London Violence" on Side Two, although their lyrics are completely indecipherable. The Body-snatchers are an all-girl group, and although they don't come across quite as well, their all-female vocals provide an interesting sound. Madness proves that it has not lost the "Nutty" sound, and The Selecter sound much better live than in the studio.

All in all, I would say if you can't dance to this record you must be dead or pretty close to it. If you are planning a party in the near future, Dance Craze should be on your shopping list. As for myself, I can't wait for the movie to come out.

BRITISH SKA LIVE!



Subtle Complexity

By Jana Panarites

One look at the scrapbook interior of Phil (GENESIS) Collins' Face Value, and skeptical listeners may wonder if the musician spent more time designing the graphics than the vinyl inside the album's sleeve. Happily, the album itself is as intricate as the parcel in which it has arrived.

With an array of guest artists including Stephen Bishop, Ravi Shankar, Eric Clapton, and the Earth, Wind & Fire horn section, Collins has put together an album of subtle complexity which is, surprisingly, all his own. The familiar Collins theme of loneliness and marital trauma pours sweetly out of such tear-jerkers as "You Know What I Mean" and "If Leaving Me Is Easy," while upbeat tunes like "Thunder and Lightning" bounce back reassuredly in between.

Collins as album artwork

An abbreviated re-make of "Behind the Lines," from the Genesis album Duke, takes a bit of getting used to, if only because the orchestration and power of the original version is difficult to match. At the close of Side One comes "Hand in Hand," with punchy horns filling in between the choral voices of the Children of Los Angeles Churches singers. This tune seems appropriately placed, as a resolute conclusion to the earlier confusion of "The Roof Is Leaking" and "Droned."

Face Value is the sort of album that becomes more enjoyable with each repeated listening. Without a doubt, it may be said that the whole is greater than the sum of this album's parts.

CONCERT

A Ray of Hope

By Mark Cahill

Elvis Costello notwithstanding, everyone seemed to have a great time at the Ray Charles' April 21st Flynn Theater performance (early show). I did, my friends did, and most importantly, Ray did. It's not often that you see a performer have as much fun on stage as Ray does. He laughs, sings, dances as he sits at the piano – all the while appearing to have the time of his life. How could we help but enjoy it?

The concert began with two short songs by The Ray Charles Orchestra which highlighted the various sections and soloists of the band. Ray was then escorted to his piano, receiving a rousing applause from the excited audience. He eased through several popular standards, including a soul-warming rendition of "Georgia On My Mind." Among the other songs played were "Oh, What a Beautiful Morning," "How Long Has This Been Going On," and "You Don't Know Me."

Later in the show, Ray was joined by The Raeletts, his female background vocalists. The band promptly cruised through "Rock Steady," a tune dominated by the vocals of The Raeletts. "Fool For You," a mellower piece, led into an excellent improvisation by Ray, which blended into "I Can't Stop Loving You." The pianist also did a moving improvisation during "I Can See Clearly Now," likening life to the sky.

I think that we all hope to see Ray back in Burlington soon.

Are You Information Rich ?

Are You Information Rich ?

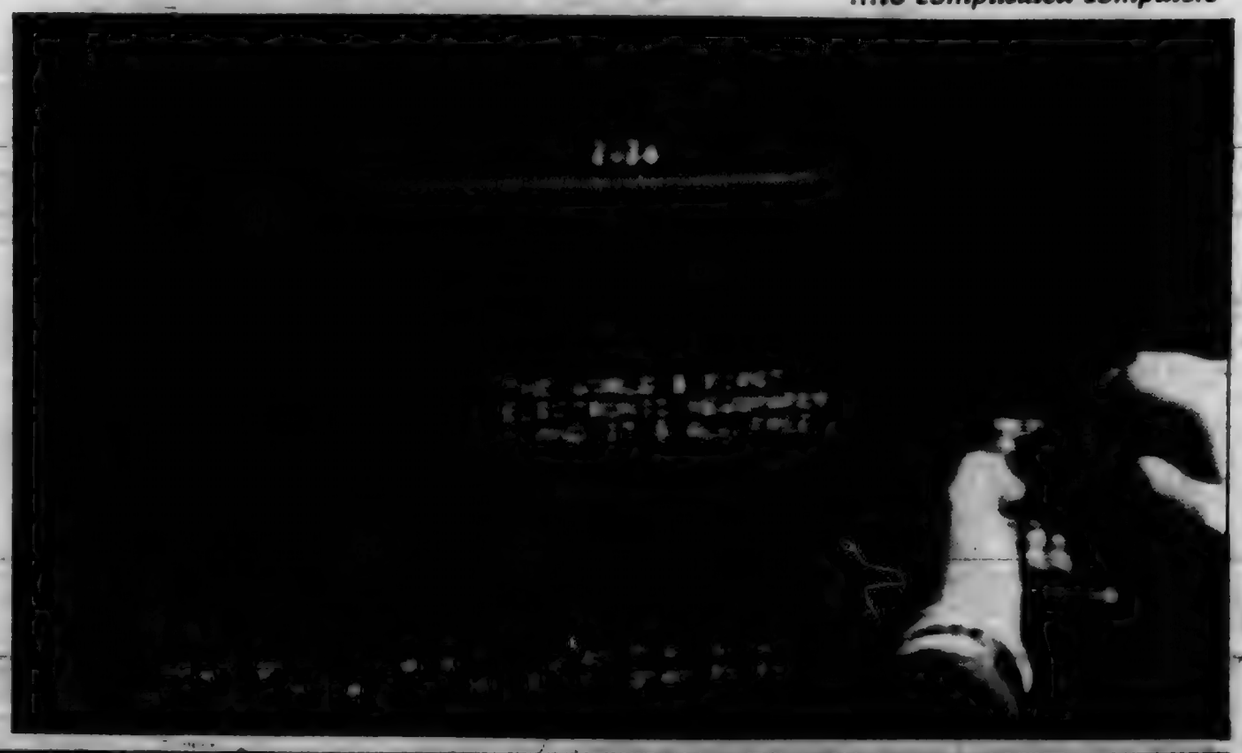
From primitive press,,,

By Ed Stearns

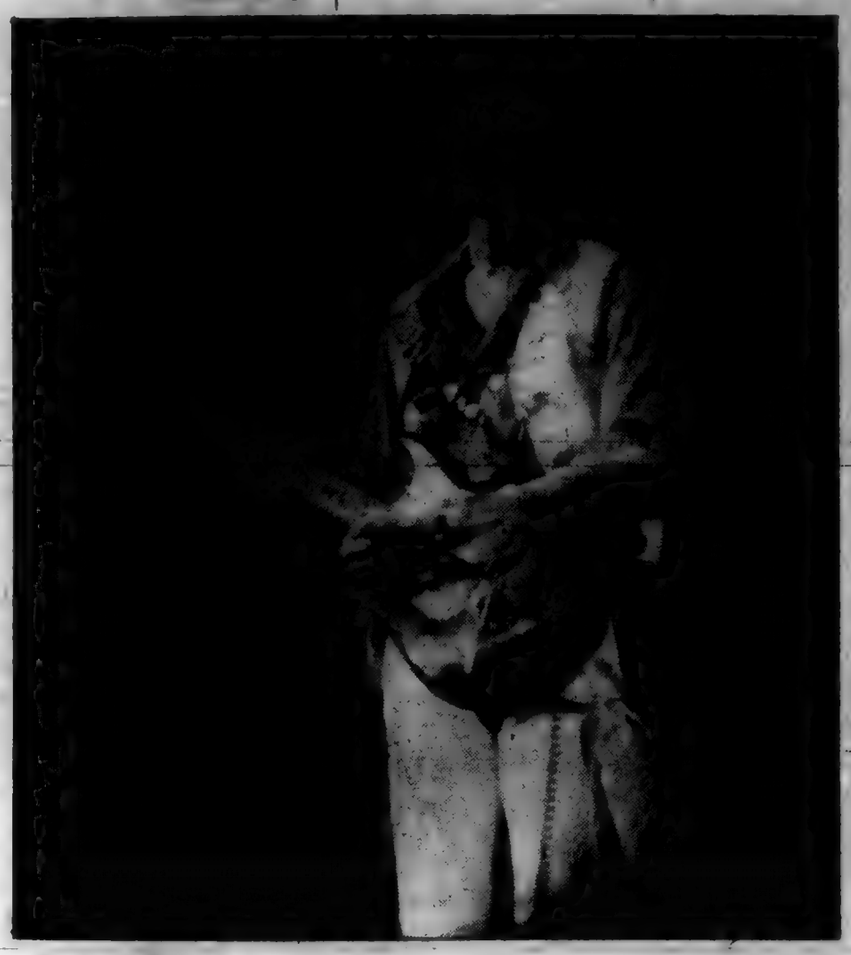
Information is fast becoming the life blood of the modern world. Despite this fact, many among us are confused about the importance of mass communications in our society. Evidence of this problem can be seen in the recent proposal by the Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences to disband the Communications Department at UVM. Not since Johann Gutenberg invented the printing press five hundred years ago has communications technology promised to have such a profound impact on all of our lives. Will we be prepared to meet the challenge of the information age?

This Monday at 9:00 p.m., Vermont ETV will present Goodbye Gutenberg, a 90-minute documentary examining the history, development and future of both the printed and the processed word. This extremely important program is highly recommended to anyone who is interested in the communications revolution that is now taking place. Goodbye Gutenberg is a co-production of BBC-TV and WNET/Thirteen, New York, and is presented by Anthony Smith, Director of the British Film Institute in London. Mr. Smith is the author of The Geopolitics of Information, Television and Political Life, and the recently published Goodbye Gutenberg — The Newspaper Revolution of the 1980's.

Smith examines a wide variety of innovations in communications technology, including Japan's newly developed voice-activated word processors, which may be able to translate languages within the next twenty years. He looks at the new technology being used by the White House to progressively filter and condense vast quantities of information as it passes up the decision-making hierarchy. He also examines how political lobbying groups, such as the American Security Council, use electronic printing equipment to generate "personalized" letters to millions of citizens.



Smith sees our society moving towards a situation where there will be two classes of people — the information rich and the information poor. Those people with the greatest access to information, and the knowledge to put it to use, will be the ones who wield the most power.



Knowing that where there is power, there is also the possibility that it will be abused, Smith travels to Sweden to examine the question of personal privacy in the information age, and how it can be protected. The Swedes have established safeguards to help ensure that the details of a person's private life are not used to influence such non-related matters as job or loan applications.

Smith concludes the show by saying, "The social consequences of the new media are going to be so extensive, so complicated, and ultimately so surprising, that it's impossible to calculate them and foolish to guess." If that is so, this program is but a mere taste of what is yet to come, but a tantalizing taste nonetheless.

Goodbye Gutenberg will air Monday, April 27 on Vermont ETV/UHF channel 33 or cable channel 10.

The Essence of Hendrix

By Mark J. Cadigan

My brother gave me a 45 of "Crosstown Traffic"/"Gypsy Eyes" when I was about 12, and I've been listening to Jimi Hendrix' music pretty consistently since then. So, when I insist that the biographical film Jimi Hendrix (which had 3 showings at Angell Lecture Center last Thursday night) is worth seeing at least once, you'll have to keep my decade-long enthusiasm in mind.

Nevertheless, the movie can certainly stand on its own merit. It portrays the flamboyant side of Hendrix graphically: picking his electric guitar with his teeth or behind his head, grinding it suggestively against his wall of amplifiers, then torching it with lighter fluid. Yet, we are also introduced to other sides of the man: the young boy who strummed a broom like a guitar, the loner who shied away from his paratrooper squad, the rock star who was manipulated by leech-like followers and greedy businessmen.

The film evokes this contrast by colorful concert footage and interviews with Hendrix and those who knew him – his father, Al, girlfriends, an Army officer, business associates, friends, and fellow musicians. Guitarist Pete Townshend, who mentions that he was "completely floored" by Jimi's wild performances, reminisces how he and Eric Clapton became friends when they were both threatened by this young guitarist's virtuoso skills. Hearing such famous rock musicians as these praising Jimi increased my respect for him, especially since they were lucky enough to hear/see/experience him while he was alive.

Certainly, Hendrix was alive in those concert clips from outstanding shows at The Monterey Pop Festival, Woodstock, Isle of Wight, and others. Although the film moves from live concerts to interviews too abruptly at times, disrupting its continuity, the film-makers created at least one highly effective sequence. After several minutes of Jimi's wailing version of "The Star Spangled Banner," the camera's focus switches to him on Dick Cavett's TV show. Cavett warns the guitarist to expect "hate-mail" because some people will think his rendition was unpatriotic. Jimi slowly lifts his head, saying with the utmost sincerity and calmness, "I thought it was beautiful."

The soaring, ultra-bluesy "Red House" is equally satisfying, revealing Jimi as more concerned with his music than his crazy stage antics of past concerts. Rocking gently back and forth while gesturing with his face and body, he expresses an intense involvement with the music he creates. His tightly closed eyes signify an intense inward concentration. This refined stage presence contradicts the outlandishness he formerly employed while rjpping through such raucous tunes as "Johnny B. Goode" and "Purple Haze."

The fast pace of the film partially hides its flaws: some blurry, off-center concert footage, choppy editing in parts, too much unintelligible dialogue, and too few songs from each concert. Yet, as disappointed as I was about the brief live performance scenes, I believe they added dimension to my understanding of Hendrix and his music. I'll always remember Jimi in the studio, sitting alone on a stool picking an old blues song on an acoustic guitar. I sat in Angell Lecture Center, mesmerized – in awe of what my senses were revelling in: the magical union of Jimi Hendrix and his guitar.

Florida Beyond Ft. Lauderdale

By Mika Brewer

Three students from the University of Vermont, Tony French, Dan Berler, and Mika Brewer, spent this spring vacation canoeing in the Everglades National Park.

It was beautiful. The island was in White Water Bay, a large land-locked bay inland from the Gulf of Mexico. It was covered with red and white mangroves. These are common to almost all the islands in southern Florida, especially those in the Everglades.

A mangrove island is the result of many years of the self-perpetuation of mangrove trees. If one tree sprouts, it generates new mangroves by dropping its roots down into the water from branches above. The roots provide a tangled web which help propagate the island. Leaves from the trees shed and fall into the water. With normal trees, these are carried away with the next tide or prevailing current, but due to the fence-like root web of the mangrove, the leaves are caught and held in place, eventually decomposing and contributing to the island's floor. Over the years a rich, black soil is formed, rising above the water table. This allows new species of trees to take root. Some day, all of White Water Bay, the bay that Danny, Tony, Matt, and I were canoeing on, a bay thirty miles long and twelve miles wide, would be overwhelmed by the slow growing mangrove, and, in subsequent succession, become a forest.

At present, White Water Bay enjoys one of the most diverse and numerous fish populations in the United States. Two factors are credited for this. First, White Water Bay is an extremely shallow body of water, only measuring eight feet at its deepest point. Second, White Water Bay acts as a massive salt and fresh water mixing bowl. A slow moving river that runs south through the Everglades, and the Gulf of Mexico merge there. The result is tepid brackish water perfectly suited for the breeding and hatching of fish.

Fish are all over the place. Tarpon, a large Florida fish, can be seen rolling in the shallows of mangrove islands, and sharks love to swim up the shallow channels of the small inland fresh water rivers off the bay. In a canoe, we were quiet and maneuverable enough to go up these rivers and see sharks swimming with their dorsal and tail fins well out of the water. Oblivious to our presence, they moved around slowly. When they noticed us, they shot past our canoe, back towards the safety of deeper water.

The manatee, a walrus-looking mammal of the south, also lives in White Water Bay. On our trip through the Everglades, we didn't see any manatees. They are an endangered species plagued by the problem of motorized fishing boats. Since the manatee is so big (nine to thirteen feet long) it has a hard time staying deep enough to avoid being hit by churning outboard engine propellers. Today, boat traffic is so heavy along the rivers, bays, and estuaries that the manatees inhabit, it is uncommon to find one of these docile mammals without a scar on its back, evidence of a run-in with a fishing boat.

We spent two days here, getting our fill of what this protected bay had to offer. The bay is rich in bird life as well as fish activity. We saw osprey, herons, pelicans, ibises, and comorants during the day. When it got dark enough, we'd star-watch, scouring the heavens for shooting stars and familiar constellations.

It was exciting to be in the Everglades, looking at the stars and thinking, with fleeting sensations of Huckleberry Finn-type anxiousness, that at one time, U.S. marshalls refused to enter this part of Florida because of its known fugitive citizenry. During prohibition rum runners set up their stills and stashed their Cuban-bought rum along these rivers and bays until the goods could be moved to areas with more appreciative inhabitants. Also, White Water Bay is just a stones throw away from the Everglades swamp which used to boast incredible populations of alligators. On one trip fifty years ago, two hunters took out over one thousand alligator hides which were sold to shoemakers in Miami.

We left White Water Bay, planning to canoe around Cape Sable on the south-western tip of Florida. The first day in the Gulf was calm and hot. We stopped and swam off our canoes, never venturing very far away for fear of sharks. None of the sharks we had seen were very big, but the Gulf water was murky. In murky water, sharks have a hard time seeing. When they pick up activity on the water's surface, they are likely to strike immediately without checking out what it is they are biting. It wasn't anything to be too concerned about; shark attacks are a rarity (at least that's what I've been told).

We spent a night in Ponce De Leon Bay. Here a sea turtle swam over to investigate our activities. He was huge. His head jutted up from the water almost two feet ahead of where his shell emerged. These turtles used to be highly prized trophies among gulf fishermen, their shellacked shells adding just the right touch to a den or business-man's office. The turtles, now a protected species, are still subject to persistent poaching. I was told that the best time to see the turtles is on the second full moon in May. This is when instinct drives them in hoards to certain Gulf and Atlantic beaches where they spend the moonlit night digging burrows and laying eggs.

As I rounded one bend in the Shark River off Ponce De Leon Bay, a mature Bald Eagle swooped down off his perch in an old dead tree and came right over the bow of my canoe. Flapping heavily, he gained enough altitude to fly ten feet over my head and then up and over the woods. Mutton, a small fish, leaped here and there in the shallows of the river. The eagle had been waiting patiently on his branch, I imagine, to catch one of these.

We got up early the next morning and headed south. As we moved down the coast, getting closer and closer to Cape Sable, a slow transition of shore environments unfolded. Mangroves, which had predominated the shoreline for the whole trip, began to thin out and white shell beaches and open fields with coconut trees took their place. There were cacti and brown grasses. Hawks and birds with beaks better suited for cracking seeds instead of catching fish replaced the waterfowl seen earlier.

Off from the beaches of the cape, we could see huge fish leaping completely out of the water. They would speckle white, as if bedecked with diamonds, and then fall back into the sea on their sides, sending up cascades of spray.

After a full day of canoeing, sunning, and exploring the cape, we settled down to dinner and coconut milk from nuts we collected. I turned in early, waking up just once to Matt's screams about catching a fish, the one and only of the whole trip.

By midnight, the bugs had found us. The bugs had been bad in White Water Bay, but out on the cape they were terrible. Sand fleas are miniscule buggers. They flew freely through the tent netting and had a heyday with us. By five-thirty in the morning we were all willing to throw in the towel. We packed up and started our twenty mile stint back to Flamingo, Florida.

The last day's paddle was long and hard-going. A strong south-easterly wind had picked up by early morning and this, unfortunately, was the exact direction we were headed in. We bucked waves and took on water. We were never in danger of swamping, but the water splashed up onto our skin, evaporated, and left a salt coating on our bodies. The sun was as hot as it had been all trip, but we didn't want to stop for a swim since the wind would push the canoes backwards. We rounded bend after bend along the coast, each time expecting the buildings of Flamingo to loom up ahead. Each cove was followed by another, and it wasn't until two o'clock in the afternoon that Flamingo finally came into sight.

We paddled slowly past the open fields of campers. Next we passed the pink buildings, pool, and restaurant of the Flamingo Hotel. All the while, more and more signs of civilization came into sight, each one just a little more appealing than the last, coaxing on these four tired, hungry, sunburned canoers.

Finally we turned into the boat channel we had exited from five days earlier. Flamingo is the center of park activity, complete with the Flamingo Hotel, campsites, boat rentals, store, ranger station, and post office. For most of the people visiting the Everglades, this is the extent of the park they see, and for most, I imagine, it is more than they expect.

I was glad we had gone a step beyond. Previous to this trip my visions of Florida had been complete with crowded beaches, condominium developments, and fast-food restaurants — Florida, home for the newly-weds and the nearly deads. Now I know that another side of the state exists. My only hope is that the state, and nation, takes it upon itself to preserve and protect this unique natural area.

Exclusive Interview With

By Cynnie Wheeler

Lisa (pronounced Liza) Alther is the author of Kinflicks and the soon-to-be-released novel, Original Sins; privacy is very important to her. No name appears on her mailbox in Hinesburg, Vermont. Her telephone number is unlisted. A map is needed to get through a maze of doors leading to the living room of her beautiful brick home. Relaxed on a plush sofa, she speaks quietly but openly about her experience as a writer.

"It happened overnight; I went from being rejected to being sought after." She remembers the many rejection slips from magazines for her articles and short stories. But her first published novel, Kinflicks, the bawdy tale of one woman's sexual encounters from adolescence to motherhood, has been unusually successful since its release in 1975. It is a best seller, and has been printed in fourteen other countries.

After graduating from Wellesley College, where she wrote for the school newspaper, Alther worked for a publishing company in New York City as an editorial assistant. "They called it that, but it means I was a secretary. I also did some manuscript editing," she said.

It was during this time that she was trying to get her work published in magazines. "It never occurred to me that the New Yorker wouldn't want my work; not only did the New Yorker not want it, but neither did any of the other magazines, even for free. Rejection was a real shock. Getting published is hard, and many writers give up. I think the ones who can stick with it eventually get published."

She and her husband left New York and moved to Hinesburg in 1967, where she began thinking about writing a novel. However, she wrote most of Kinflicks in an apartment in Montreal. There, Alther worked intensely for week-long intervals before returning, "exhausted," to Hinesburg to type, rearrange, and revise her work. "I guess going away and binging gave me bad habits, but now writing is not as obsessive. I admire people who can sit down for a few hours each day and write. After I finish a draft, I sometimes put it down for months."

The ideas for Alther's novels are from many sources. "Information comes at you from all over — a dream, the newspaper, what people say to you. Some people I've never met come up to me and tell me their life stories," she said. When she writes, she thinks "in terms of scenes — visual ideas."

Some parts of Kinflicks coincide with her life. For instance, she grew up in Tennessee, as does her main character, Ginny Babcock. But her "characters emerge" after she has decided on a theme. "I'll sometimes take a nose from one person I know and a car from another, but then the characters take over. They're almost more real than the people I'm around because I'm locked up with them."

In her novel, Alther reveals her characters in a straightforward fashion. However, she is constantly asked if Kinflicks is an autobiography. "While I was promoting Kinflicks in Europe, I jokingly started a press conference by saying 'I know you all want to ask if I have done all the things Ginny Babcock did in the novel and the answer is yes; I did all of it:..' Some people I meet are disappointed when I'm not Ginny Babcock."

Also, some readers assume that Alther's characters must be modeled after real people. "Girls who went to my high school after me, whom I didn't know, claim that they were the model for Ginny. And my hometown newspaper did an analysis of the football players' numbers for the year I graduated from high school to try and guess which one was Joe Bob Sparks," the "body beautiful of Hullsport High," Ginny's boyfriend. "It's kind of insulting — they imply I don't have an imagination."

Portraying Mrs. Babcock's point of view was difficult for Alther, "Some things are common to everyone, but isn't it presumptuous to think I can know how a middle-aged, dying woman feels? I was challenged by Mrs. Babcock and went after that kind of challenge more in Original Sins."

Her new novel, to be released April 27th, is written to show how five children, of varying backgrounds, view one incident. However, Alther is reluctant to talk about her new novel. "Once you've written your book, it's kind of superfluous to talk about it. Kinflicks and Original Sins say what I want to say in the best way I know how.

"I feel very little connection with Kinflicks now. I did the best I could at the time. I don't have a thought in my head now," since finishing Original Sins. "When I finished writing my first novel, I hated print and words for a while. Then I slowly began reading again. I have started to read since Original Sins, so I guess I'm beginning to piece stuff together."

Sailing Through College

By Linda Ciafo

"For the first two weeks, all we saw was an oil tanker and schools of dolphins," said a University of Vermont student about the start of her semester at sea, organized by the Institute for Shipboard Education and the University of Colorado.

Lisa G. Hodgson, a senior in Elementary Education, and several other UVM students went aboard the Floating University in San Francisco last semester and toured 11 countries for 16 weeks along with over 500 other students from around the nation and several foreign countries. The ship docked at Kobe, Japan, Manila, Philippines and Madras, India, among other ports, on its world cruise.

Like any university, the ship had a bookstore, cafeteria, pool, library and even a theatre and bar. Students chose from courses in liberal arts and business that focused around the places they were going.

"If you didn't know about a country before getting there, you'd have to be deaf, dumb and blind," said Hodgson. Before arriving at port, students saw films and slide shows and attended lectures and discussions. For example, in San Francisco, a woman from Japan, the first stop, boarded the ship. "We lived with her, ate with her, and found out everything we wanted to know about Japan from her," said Hodgson.

Once the boat docked, students could either sign up for Pay Trips and go sight-seeing or go off on their own which Hodgson described as "cheaper and more fun."

The only restriction the students had was time. They spent 3-5 days in each port, "but we always wanted to stay another week or two," Hodgson added.

Most students traveled in groups of two or four to avoid looking like tourists and being approached by people selling souvenirs. "We weren't tourists," said Hodgson, "we were students."

The best way to learn about the culture of a foreign country, Hodgson said, was to live with a family and "eat what they ate, dress the way they dressed, use the bathrooms they used."

Toting a sleeping bag and knapsack, some people traveled by train or bus from Madras to the Himalayas, a trip of a couple hundred miles, while in India. Hodgson said once you left the ship you were responsible for your own accommodations.

Nevertheless, the ship was always docked at the port city. "It was always some place to go back to," Hodgson said. "The first day in India freaked me out. As soon as I stepped foot off the boat, beggars were all over me. After four hours in the country, I went back (to the ship) to get myself together."

While in a country, Hodgson tried to meet people of different castes and classes. She spoke to Untouchables, the lowest caste of people in India, and said she felt inadequate and dumb. "We (the students) always wanted to learn key phrases in the country's native language like 'Hello,' 'How are you?' 'Bathroom'," she explained. "Then I met these beggars who can beg in 5 different languages."

Hodgson said it was easy to meet people. When the ship docked in India, she and a friend set out to find the Peace Corps workers in the village. "We asked directions from two kids our age," she said. "We gave them a light (for their cigarettes) and ended up spending five days shopping, going to the beach, and having dinner with them." Hodgson always reciprocated the generosity whether it was giving away a T-shirt or a meal on the ship.

"When asking directions, they (the native people) will not only tell you, but take you there," she continued. "When people heard that the Floating University was in town, they'd meet you and invite you for dinner."

Hodgson said she was flabbergasted by the friendliness and generosity of the people she met in foreign countries. "We didn't know how to take it at first," she said, "but now if I meet a foreigner in this country who needs help, I'd give my bed for a night if I had to."

The students had some contact with the States while on the cruise. The New York Times and Newsweek were available in most ports and a Telex station on the ship received information from United Press International and Voice of America. However, Hodgson said that out in the middle of the Indian Ocean there was lots of static and the news was misunderstood at times. "We thought the Dodgers were in the '80 World Series," she said.

Back home, Hodgson said she had a hard time adjusting at first. "Sure we had Coke machines and candy machines on the ship, and we swarmed to get the Times when we got to port to see what was happening at home, but back in the U.S. I felt like I was in another new culture, and thought, 'God, this is a strange place.' I went through three weeks of depression noticing how wasteful, unfriendly, materialistic, and money-conscious Americans can be."

U[illegible]ng Efforts, [illegible]sibility Improving

Generally, students at UVM are at most hindered temporarily by crutches after a skiing fall. That is not true of the ten students on campus in wheelchairs, and one who is disabled by legal deafness.

Nancy Oliker, coordinator of Specialized Student Services housed at the Counseling and Testing Center, says that we non-disabled people are called "Tab's" which stands for "Temporarily Able-Bodied." "We're all temporarily able-bodied, and at some point in our lives we're all going to be disabled." Disability can occur through pregnancy, old age, sickness, being confined to crutches, or a cast.

UVM is, according to Ms. Oliker, fairly accessible; more so than other schools that are not solely for the disabled. Since mid 1972, when the Office of Barrier Controls was set up, one million dollars will have been spent to make UVM more accessible. Two-thirds of these funds were appropriated by the state. Now 80 percent of the academic/administrative buildings are partially accessible, and of that 45 percent are totally accessible. Seventy percent of the dorms are partially accessible, and of that 35 percent are totally accessible. All dining halls are accessible. The University is not required by law to make all buildings accessible, but must make all programs and classes accessible. This may involve moving classes or changing schedules.

Physical accessibility is aided by ramps, elevators, and the handicapped van which is available on weekdays for campus travel. Visual impairments that hinder learning are helped by taping and reading aloud, braille writers, magnifiers, and a Kurzell Reading Machine due to arrive in May. Housing is specially adapted; note-taking services are offered; the university employs one sign interpreter for the deaf; tutoring is available.

Tom Brettel, a UVM Continuing Ed student in a wheelchair, says that the biggest handicap in getting around are doors. "There are too many doors. When I go to the (Living/Learning Center) Cafeteria, it's a pain in the neck to open ten doors to get there." He suggests a system where the doors would be held open by electricity, and closed in the event of a fire.

While most of the major buildings on campus are accessible, some are not. Most notable are Billings, whose upper levels are only accessible by stairs, and Ira Allen, which has no ramp. Many offices and departmental houses, such as the Sociology department, Pomeroy, the Government Research Center, are others.

The City of Burlington presents more problems, however. The sidewalks are bad, and there is often a cut-out on a curb on one side and a full curb on the other. Ms. Oliker states that the biggest problem in Burlington is presented by Memorial Auditorium, which has no access. Mr. Brettell says that "the only access there is a security officer who will carry you up the stairs." The purchasing of the Flynn theatre would help some, says Ms. Oliker, although the bathrooms are downstairs.

The city itself is hard to get to for students without cars, or those who are blind. Although the CCTA provides a bus, it is hard to book in advance, and it does not run at nights or on weekends.

The Office of Specialized Student Services offers help in three areas, accessibility, attitude change within the community, and resources such as transportation and aids such as machines in the library.

Attitudes on campus, says Robert (not his real name), from a wheelchair, are generally good. "If anything, people are too helpful." Robert says, "I don't mind the help when I need it, but I don't like people feeling sorry for me and rushing to help when I'm struggling with a door." Tom Benante echoes his point saying, "Sometimes they're a little too helpful. Some people automatically come up and start wheeling you around. I'm not used to the chair either, and sometimes you wind up on the floor."

Ms. Oliker says much can be done to help "TAB's" attitudes. She cites mainstreaming as one important effort. She notes that disabled people are not much different. Counseling them, as she does, is just the same as counseling able-bodied people. "It's just teaching them to take control of their lives."

One part of counseling includes helping to schedule time. Ms. Oliker says that if it takes an hour and a half to get dressed in the morning, then the time must be found.

The University, with its many unaccessible buildings, is far from perfect. Ms. Oliker says that it needs more sign translators, should offer sign as a language, and more cultural events that are signed.

Robert says that "It all depends on how I act toward them (able-bodied people). If I act cold and bitter, it's hard to make friends... I've learned that I shouldn't sit in a bar and feel sorry for myself."

I Scream, We Scream...

By Donna Francis

Ice cream lovers waited in long lines Sunday for the ever popular homemade flavors at Ben & Jerry's Ice Crea[m] [P]arlor. What has made thei[r] [i]ce cream the highest selling [i]n Vermont area? Ben Co[hen] of Ben & Jerry's. attempted [to] keep the secret to their succe[ss] ic[e] cream.

Ben Cohen and [Jerry] Greenfield met one [day] while attending Merrit [Beh]rendt School of Long Island, N.Y. Cohen says his first experience in the ice cream business began while working as a mobile ice cream vender on Long Island.

After attending Colgate College for two years, Cohen started working at a school for emotionally di[sturbed] children in the Adirondacks. While working at this [job] Cohen began to [experiment] his ideas on ice cream [flavors] to make ice cream [in the] machine they had in the kitchen. I tested my recipes out on the kids. I loved making the ice cream and the kids loved eating it so everyone was happy," Cohen says.

Cohen and Greenfield collaborated and decided to go into business for themselves. "We bought every homemade ice cream book we could find. We took a correspondence course from Penn State University for five dollars on 'How to Make Ice Cream.' It was a great course," Cohen said.

Why Burlington, Vt.? "It was obvious to us that what this town needed was ice cream and bagels. We chose ice cream because the equipment investments were cheaper," replied Cohen. Cohen added that because Burlington was a college town it would be an ideal location for their business.

"We started off with $4,[000] each and a bank loan. We put the money we had into the business," stated Cohen.

Cohen and Greenfield opened their shop in May, 1978. From that time "Ben & Jerry's" grew and they were faced with greater demands for their homemade ice cream. In 1980 they started to sell their ice cream whole sale, on a very small scale, "just driving around in the back of my VW Squareback," added Cohen. Since that time they have opened a small plant on South Champlain Street in Burlington.

What makes their ice cream different from any other? "We use egg yolks and extra cream. Egg yolks account for the creamy rich flavor," Cohen [said]. In addition to these [they] they use milk, extra [so]lids, sugar, and [sta]bilizers which keep [it] from becoming [ic]y.

[Ben] flavors are the [most] Ben & Jerry's. [Th]at Oreo Mint has [been] far, their most [popular] flavor. Cohen says his [personal] favorite is Uncle Ben's Delight, which is chocolate ice cream, pecans, almonds, raisins, and chocolate chips. He also likes the Mocha Chip and Mocha Almond with their chocolate dip. "I really like that chocolate [dip]," added Cohen.

Cohen likes to experiment [with] like Khalua and [add] them to their ice cream. "Sometimes we end up with some weird combinations. The ice cream makers will forget which batch they're making for example, instead of adding walnuts to an Apple Raisin Walnut batch, they add oreos and you come up with Apple Raisin Oreo."

Cohen is responsible for many of the unique flavors created at Ben & Jerry's. He thought of the idea for flavors like Uncle Ben's Delight along with Apple Raisin Walnut while riding an Am Trak train down to New York. "The idea just came to me," said Cohen.

In addition to ice cream, Ben & Jerry's offers a large selection of baked goods. "I'm really proud of our brownies. We consider our brownies to be light yet chewy, which is really a difficult thing to find in the Burlington area," Cohen exclaimed.

Hot chocolate is another homemade specialty at Ben & Jerry's. "We use Drinking Chocolate Bars to make our hot chocolate. We get them from Goya Foods, which is a large Latin American food corporation. We call them up and they talk to us in Spanish. They have to call around the plant to find someone who speaks English," said Cohen with a laugh.

So, what about the bagels? "The bagel people take care of the bagels, we've got our hands full here," replied Cohen as he slipped behind the counter to get a large scoop of Uncle Ben's Delight.

Burlington's Urban Facelift

By Bob Frank

When UVM students return to Burlington next fall, they'll be greeted by a Church Street with a new look, a scene very different from the construction machinery and barricades cluttering the area now. Instead, you'll gaze over fifty trees lining a bricked walkway with interspersed gardens, tables, benches, and art displays.

According to Joyce Wasson, public relations director for the Marketplace Commission, construction is on schedule and the entire project should be completed by November 1. The visual impact will be the most noticeable feature of the $6.8 million project, but downtown merchants hope the change won't be limited to aesthetics. They are looking forward to the tremendous retail potential The Marketplace hopes to generate.

Mr. William Preston Jr., co-owner of Preston's Jewelers, says the performance of the Marketplace Commission and Construction crew has been "excellent." "I couldn't be more enthusiastic."

This enthusiasm is echoed by most downtown merchants, who see the project as a shot in the arm for their businesses and downtown Burlington in general. But Donald Lafler, chief executive and vice president of Magram's department store, believes it will take a concerted effort between city government and the merchants to make the proposal successful. He warns, "The work to make The Marketplace a success will be far from over when the construction is completed. There will be an arena in which to perform and it's going to be up to the players to produce, and everyone is paying for the arena."

Although the federal government supplied the city with a $5.3 million grant, Burlington voters approved a $1.5 million general obligation bond in October, 1979. The entire city has invested in this effort to lure shoppers back downtown and away from shopping centers on Williston and Shelburne Roads. It is also hoped that The Marketplace will provide the community with an exciting social gathering area.

An important element of the overall project is the Marketplace Bus Loop, providing a continuous terminal from which riders can catch most buses in the Chittenden County Transportation Authority system. As a result, riders can expect more consistent scheduling and no more than a block walk from any point downtown to their bus stop. A major terminal will be constructed on Cherry Street.

Another crucial component of The Marketplace's success will be promotional events and activities to attract people downtown. These could range from large performances like dances, concerts, and movie festivals, to daily art exhibits, lectures, and pass-the-hat performers. The Marketplace Commission will take charge of promotions after construction is completed. The possibilities are almost limitless. Downtown could be a community stage for all types of local resources, including those from UVM and area colleges. Imaginative creators of The Marketplace envision a constant festival atmosphere, like Faneuil Hall in Boston, and maybe the construction of a civic center.

Whatever impact The Marketplace has on the city will partially depend on the new city hall administration. Mayor Bernard Sanders, who campaigned against former Mayor Paquette's obsession with downtown revitalization, has to re-evaluate the project's merit from his new perspective. Sanders' policies don't appear to be an immediate concern of downtown merchants, who are generally adopting a wait-and-see attitude. Lafler said that "so much of the success of Burlington is tied to the downtown, and he (Sanders) wants what is best for the city."

Regardless, The Marketplace will be a forum of change in Burlington. Returning students can look forward to a more attractive and vital city. Downtown merchants look forward to the Marketplace for its obvious financial potential. Hopefully, the entire community can anticipate an exciting gathering area and improved shopping opportunities. The Marketplace could be a place where UVM, downtown business, private citizens, and City Hall come together – all with a common interest in Burlington.

Barry Cutlass...

Abducted Terrorist

By Sonny Valentine

His mouth as dry as ashes, his tongue swollen from thirst, his feet tired from pounding the North African soil, our hero, Barry Cutlass wonders how he landed in this unenviable predicament in the international terrorist army of Libya's maniacal ruler Colonel Qaddafi.

"I was visiting my friend Paco Ayude in Bilbao, in northern Spain, when someone slipped me a Micky Finn," Cutlass thinks, "and the next thing I know, I'm in the army in Libya along with thousands of other non-African recruits."

The training group Cutlass is in includes Irishmen from the IRA, Frenchmen, Italians from various terrorist groups, Germans, Greeks, and Spanish Basques. Cutlass presumes that he was mistakenly abducted as a Basque separatist.

"I've tried to explain their mistake to my captors, but they won't listen to a word I say," Cutlass mutters. "I seem to be the only one around who doesn't want to be here. Everyone is very serious about their training," he thinks. "I've got to find a way out of this before things go too far."

As Cutlass is deep in thought, one of the marchers ahead of him stumbles and falls. A drill leader quickly drags the man out of line and begins shouting at him.

"We can not afford to have clumsy men in this fighting force! We are the most highly trained army in the world! We will be carrying out special missions all over the world in our fight for Libya and world peace! Never, never fall down again!"

Before letting the man rise to his feet, the drill master begins to flog him with a long whip. The company continues to march by. Cutlass hears the whip cracking until he is out of earshot.

That night in camp, Cutlass finds a Frenchman who will talk to him.

"What is going on here? Where did all these men come from?" Cutlass asks him.

"We are training to become political terrorists. Colonel Qaddafi brings us together from all over the world. He may keep us here to fight in Africa, or he may send us home. After training, he will give us all passports and guns."

"But what are you fighting for?"

"I'm fighting to free France from the hands of the wealthy pigs! Bombs and murders are all that they will listen to!"

Cutlass senses the danger in this man's rising anger and moves away from him.

"I've got to get out of here. This guy Qaddafi must be a lunatic to be supporting this operation. I'll make my break now while it's dark," Cutlass thinks.

He rolls up the blanket he was to sleep on and carries it out into the black desert night. In the distance, he can see the light of a campfire and he starts jogging toward it. After what seems like hours, Cutlass approaches a large tent with a roaring fire near it. He cautiously hides near the back of the tent to learn who is inside. He hears crying within.

Cutlass listens for several minutes and decides that the person crying is alone. He enters the tent.

Curled up on large pillows on the floor is a young village girl.

"What is the matter?" Cutlass inquires in French.

The startled girl looks up and demands.

"Who are you? Are you one of the Colonel's men? If he finds you here, he will kill you."

"No, I'm an American. I was taken prisoner in Qaddafi's army. I'm trying to escape."

"I am also a prisoner. Qaddafi, the mad man, stole me away while I was herding my father's cattle. If you help me escape, I will help you."

Cutlass takes off his high boots and places them beneath a hanging tapestry. He then hides behind a portable closet. At that moment, a gruff cough is heard outside the tent.

Colonel Qaddafi, a small, dark man with fiery eyes, enters the tent.

"I thought I heard voices in here," he begins. "Tell me Tasha, is anyone else in the tent?"

"No, master. We are alone."

"You liar!" Qaddafi shouts as he backhands the girl across the face and draws his revolver, ripping four shots into the tapestry above Cutlass's boots. "Now drop intruder."

Cutlass steps out from behind the closet and knocks the enraged Libyan unconscious with a blow behind the ear. He ties and gags Qaddafi and places him in the closet.

"Let's kill him now," the young village girl shrieks.

"No, we cannot. That would make us no better than he is, a killer. He will meet his end soon enough," Cutlass says. "We've got to get moving. The sun will be up soon."

The two begin moving out of the tent, but the girl quickly picks up the gun Qaddafi dropped and empties the remaining two bullets into the closet.

"I feel better now," she says dropping the revolver.

"Don't be too certain that he's dead. Dictators have an uncanny knack for surviving," Cutlass warns, "Now let's go."

The pair make their way into the black desert night.

Barry Cutlass is attempting to vacation. He will return next fall.

"Last summer I had the best tan on the beach!"

"Last summer I hit the books so I could graduate in the fall."

Some students think of education as a nine months on-three months off process. In this day of higher costs, it makes sense to use the full year to complete an education program and get into the job market as soon as you can.

The University of Vermont offers over 200 courses in sessions beginning throughout the summer. It is possible to complete 12-15 hours of credit between the close of spring and the beginning of the fall semester.

The summer catalog will be available in April at the Registrar's Office, Waterman Building and Continuing Education, Grasse Mount. Students are encouraged to use the registration material in the catalog to insure a place in class. For further information contact the Summer Session Office, Continuing Education, 656-2085.

Now is the time to begin planning your summer.

AT THE CHAMPLAIN MILL!

That's All She Wrote

By Jon Goodspeed

Like prehistoric mastodons and brontosaurs, our communications department – UVM's very own living monolith – died this summer. The climate had changed. Communications couldn't adapt. Or maybe it wasn't allowed to adapt. (The issue will long be debated by scholars and students.) In any event, the department is no more. That's all she wrote – communicated, as the case indicates.

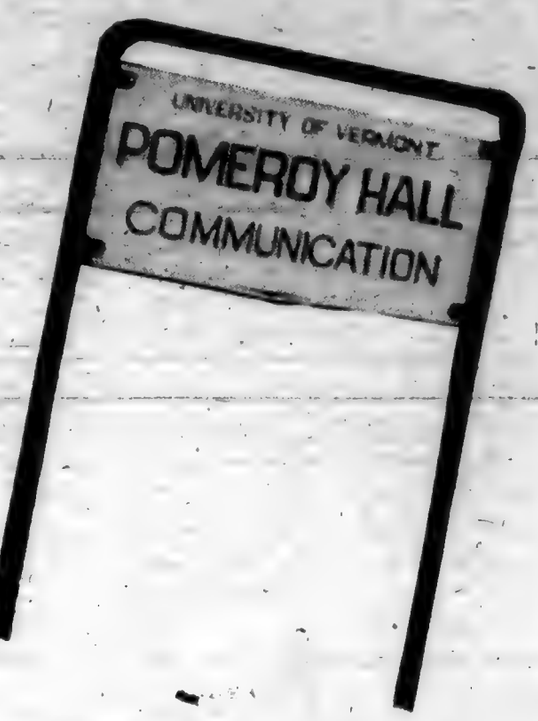
It all began last February 11, when it was revealed to the public that admissions to the department would be suspended. Dean of Arts and Sciences John Jewett had announced the decision to the Arts and Sciences faculty earlier in a memorandum.

The glaciers progressed further when, on March 4th, Jewett formally proposed to phase out major programs in Mass Communication and Communication Studies and to disband the discipline entirely.

These decisions were made as a result of studies and reviews of the department which have taken place since 1970, and which concerned the quality of the education in the department. Jewett said three fundamental problems led the administration to take this measure: the "unacceptably low" quality of the program, the "lack of effective support" by the Communications faculty for appointed departmental leaders, and the "extremely thin" recruitment pools for the vacant faculty positions in the department.

Communication students rallied together in a stand of non-support for the administration's decision by forming the Student Steering Committee, which actively sought a solution to the possible closing of the department.

On April 13th the Steering Committee held a demonstration on the green in front of the Waterman building. They formally asked for the resignation of Dr. Frank Manchel as chairman of the Department of Communication. Incoming Student Association president Dave Stewart read a statement of unanimous S.A. Senate support for the Steering Committee's position.



In the meantime, the Administration's proposal underwent a review process which stretched into the summer. The recommendations from the various committees involved in the review process reached the Board of Trustees at their July 31 meeting. On that date the Trustees authorized "the discontinuation of the Department of Communication effective September 1, 1981, and authorizes establishment of a Program in Communication effective September 1, 1981."

"The Program in Communication proposed for currently admitted majors requires the allocation of all resources currently dedicated to the present Department of Communication for at least the next two and one-half years," stated Robert Arns, Vice President for Academic Affairs, in his July 31 memorandum to the Board of Trustees.

This means that all of the current tenured faculty members (or their full-time replacements), the tenure track faculty member assigned to the debate program, the Visiting Scholars and the part-time faculty members will be "dedicated" to the Communication courses until all the current majors complete their program of study, according to the memorandum.

Visiting Scholars will teach one semester each, and the plan, said Professor Frank Manchel, former Chairman of the Department of Communication, in an April memorandum to Jewett, will be to have "every Fall a Visiting Scholar in Mass Communications and every Spring (save for Spring 1984) a specialist in Communications Studies."

Ms. Pearl Bowser, executive director of the Chamba Educational Film Service, and Dr. Worth McDougald, Director of the George Peabody Broadcasting Awards, will each teach two courses this Fall.

In the Spring of 1982, Dr. Herman Cohen, currently a professor in Communication at the Pennsylvania State University, a book review editor of Philosophy and Rhetoric and Associate Editor of Communication Quarterly, will teach two courses.

21 Fundamental Laws You Can't Break

(even if you want to)

By Mike Hambly

We've all heard Murphy's Law. If anything can go wrong, it will go wrong and at the most inopportune time. But what about the other fundamental rules that govern our lives from day to day? Here's a few of the ones I've observed in operation:

1. The Law of Futile Line Jumping – If at a bank or supermarket, you desert a long line to get in the back of a short one, the short one will move slower than the original due to a person changing Canadian currency or needing a price check, etc.

2. The Law of Missed 8 O'Clock Classes – If you awaken too late for just one class a semester, it will be the only one at which attendance was taken and will feature the key lecture of the course.

3. The Law of Cinematic Seating Snafus – After you've chosen the optimum seating arrangement in a theater, either a woman with a beehive hairdo or a noisy pack of cub scouts will sit right in front of you.

4. The Law of Ruined Fictional Finales – In a literature class, your professor will tell you how each novel ends before you read it, thus removing all incentive for finishing the book.

5. The Law of Botched Demonstrations – A feat you can accomplish flawlessly when by yourself will become impossible when you attempt it before an audience. Remember the old Warner Brothers cartoon about the construction worker who found a singing frog? It's a perfect depiction of this law.

6. The Law of Ad Nauseam Record Replays – Even though the guy next door (who blasts his stereo at 5,000 decibels) has 615 albums in his record collection he will play the same 5 records over and over and over...

7. The Law of Selective Speeder Snaring – After 26 cars have sped by you at the speed of 75 mph on the interstate, you decide to go 65 instead of 60. You will be instantaneously pulled over by a quota-filling trooper.

8. The Law of Mis-Taken ID's – ID photos are invariably taken in a hurry. If you actually look like the picture on your student ID you should get to the infirmary... FAST!

9. (For Males) The Law of Amazing, Colossal Boyfriends – The girl you are most attracted to at a party or in a bar will invariably have a boyfriend the size of a Tyrannosaurus Rex with a temper to match.

10. The Law of Out-of-Stock Normal-Sized Merchandise – When shopping, the clothing items you most want are available only in sizes suitable for Munchkins or blimps.

11. The Law of Important Interpersonal Inconsequentials – The end of a relationship is usually not precipitated by anything major but rather by something silly like excessive knuckle cracking or a cohabitant leaving the cap off the toothpaste.

12. The Law of Newly-Expired Warranties – The day after its all-inclusive warranty expires an appliance, stereo or automobile will break down.

13. The Law of Ruined Recordings – If a severe scratch appears on an album it will invariably cut a wide swath through your favorite song on the LP.

14. The Law of Long-Awaited TV Programs – Even though you hate television you've looked forward to a particular program for a month. Therefore it will be pre-empted by a Presidential address on the economy, there will be a power outage, or you'll have to work overtime.

15. The Law of the Vehicular Money Vacuum – Anytime you have a surplus sum of money on your hands it will quickly be dissipated to pay for car repairs.

16. The Law of Telescoped Term Paper Time – No matter how long the advance notice about a term paper, it will be completed on the night before due date and will have been written in the least amount of time realistically possible, perhaps with the assistance of industrial strength No-Doz.

17. The Law of One-Way GPA Movement – Even a 4.0 can be brought downward easily by a 0 for instance but GPA movement upward is painfully slow. To get from a 1.0 to a 3.5 one would have to become a perennial student.

18. The Law of Increasing Attractiveness – Members of the opposite sex will continue to get more and more attractive as the night and booze wear on at a party or downtown.

19. The Law of Unrepresentative Question-Answering – Example: You have silently known the answers to all questions asked by the prof so far but when he finally calls on you he will ask the one question that you can't even bluff on and you'll end up appearing like an ignoramus.

20. The Law of Disappearing Coinage – The 3 pounds of coins that have been accumulating in your pockets are nowhere to be found when you need to use a vending machine, parking meter or, worse yet, pay toilet.

21. The Law of Sequential Red Lights – Whether you're poking along in your car at 10 mph or flying at 110 mph, as you hit each intersection the light will change to red. Locally, this rule is particularly in effect in Winooski.

None of these laws is inescapable but to get around them one must be ver-r-r-r-y clever.

From the Mayor's Office

On behalf of the City of Burlington I am delighted to welcome you back to school for the Fall semester. It is my view that the students, faculty and staff at UVM, and the other area colleges, are an integral part of our city – and we hope to establish as mutually beneficial a relationship as is possible. UVM has much to offer this city, and our beautiful city has much to offer UVM. Let's work together.

The UVM Cynic has kindly offered me the opportunity to share my views with its readers on an occasional basis. I am very happy to accept this offer and will, as best I can, keep you informed of issues relevant to our city.

In order to gather input from citizens of our city who, in the past, did not often have access to City Hall I have established a "Mayor's Advisory Council." This Council consists of representatives from low-income groups, community organizations and our city's trade unions. Among the people invited to our meetings are representatives from the UVM Student Association and the UVM Faculty Senate. At our last meeting we discussed ideas on how best to spend the $850,000 the City will soon be receiving in the form of a Community Development Block Grant.

As some of you may know, I have been concerned about the very large sums of money involved in the expansion and development policies of the Medical Center Hospital of Vermont. My concern revolves around the fact that with the cost of medical care escalating at an alarming rate, more attention must be paid to preventative medical care and to approaches which deal with the causes of illness. It is far cheaper, and easier, to deal with the cause of drug addiction, mental illness, alcoholism, sexual dysfunctioning, ulcers, stress related heart illness, nutritional deficiencies, etc., etc., than to "cure" the illnesses that develop. In such faculty members as Dr. George Albee, Dr. Huck Gutman and Dr. Joyce Livak the University of Vermont has some very knowledgable individuals who have provided me with valuable information in this area.

During the summer, those of you who were in Burlington know that the Mayor's Council on the Arts sponsored an exciting and successful free concert series at Battery Park. It is our hope that we will be able to put together a similar type series indoors in the Fall and Winter. We are working hard to develop a sense of community in Burlington – and people sharing and enjoying art and music seems to us to be a healthy step in that direction.

Time To Tap The Energies

Friends,

We offer you our Back To School issue, a hurried but nonetheless enthusiastic effort to provide you with a wide-angle view of the area services, merchandise, restaurants and various fun centers at your disposal in the Queen City. We've also attempted to recap and preview some campus news and events, in order to get you back in touch with Burlington and your school.

The Cynic sees a fine semester ahead, and we're hoping you see the same. That is, we're hoping that all of us— the elusive "student body"—will feel the need to open up our minds and hearts a bit more this semester. Perhaps we can continue to be concerned, as we were last semester when we found our communications department was being shut down. As inconsequential as it seems now with the benefit of hindsight, the protest we raised got the blood running at UVM. We cared enough about UVM and the communications discipline to debate the administration's decision responsibly, first among ourselves, then with a somewhat remote administration. We lost that battle. The cards were stacked against us. Yet there was something wholly refreshing about the experience. It was as though the campus came out of deep freeze that day. Most importantly, we initiated a meeting of the minds, of ours and theirs. In the end there was less 'ours' and 'theirs' and more of a unified effort between students and administrators to resolve conflict on campus. That's progress.

We had energy, enthusiasm, youth and concern. Our reward was slim, yet it was substantial: we spoke up and we were heard, by UVM and the City of Burlington.

We can move ahead now towards some real gains, if we're genuine and innovative. We can continue to speak out.

This semester, the Cynic plans to keep you informed of, and up to date with, on-campus happenings in particular, so that we may collectively come up with some conclusions about our school and maybe make a few changes.

They say that everything great starts small, that the most beautiful butterflies grow from the ugliest cacoons. If and when the time comes that we can make a change, the effort may be a bit awkward at first. No matter. There's beauty in awkwardness, and our efforts would be worth the discomfort, to be sure.

The talent and the creativity and the vision is here, on campus, in us. Now more than ever is the time to tap those energies.

Welcome back. We hope you'll stay with us. We'll do our best to keep up with you.

Still Got No Time

By Grove Potter

Whipping a dead horse is bad news in journalism, but this horse is far from dead.

A Cynic commentary printed last year criticized the lack of adequate time allotted to students to prepare for exams. This semester the same problem has arisen, only it has passed from the ridiculous to the totally unacceptable.

Believe it or not, the calendar this semester calls for Wednesday classes and Thursday exams. We are being forced to attend classes up until the day before Hell Week begins on December 17. Those of you who feel capable of bringing together four months of important work, in addition to completing labs, papers, and projects in one night, can stop reading. For the rest of us, the time is ripe to open the floor for discussion about changing the calendar making guidelines.

In fact, the calendars for the years '83-'87 will be on the docket for radification by the Faculty Senate in October. If students share their concerns about the calendar with professors, and stir up debate elsewhere, the process for changing the calendar guidelines to include a guaranteed study period before exams can begin soon. Letters and petitions to David Holmes, chairman of the Academic Affairs Committee, will also have an impact on the administration's view of the present set-up.

No one person is at fault for the way the calendar now stands. In 1978, the University Calendar Committee framed a document outlining the guidelines to be followed when preparing the school calendar. As you can imagine, this greatly facilitates the calendar-making process, but the rigidity of the procedure also causes problems.

The guidelines state that the total number of teaching days in an academic year must at least equal 139 days. This should be accomplished with the most even distribution between fall and spring terms possible. Ideally that would be 69 days in the fall term and 70 days in the spring. According to the guidelines, registration should take place on the Tuesday following Labor Day, and classes should begin on Wednesday. The rationale here is to avoid conflict with summer jobs. The last fall term exam should be scheduled no later than December 22.

These two dates serve as bookends at each end of the fall semester. UVM President Lattie Coor said, "a reading period could be accomplished in the fall only if the term began before Labor Day." While not uncategorically supportive of a reading period, Dr. Coor said, "I would like to open this for discussion with some thoughtful students."

Many universities and colleges begin school before Labor Day to make room for a reading week before exams. Summer job conflicts do exist for most of us, but for the four years of unique opportunities that college provides, returning from vacation and terminating a job early to enhance those opportunities seems a wise move.

When during the seven year cycle extra days are available during the fall term, the calendar guidelines now propose the following usage priority; (a) one reading day; (b) one reading day and fall recess; (c) two reading days and fall recess; (d) two reading days, fall recess last exam scheduled prior to December 22.

There seems to be an innate aversion to adequate study time written into this document. When days are available for studying, these guidelines mandate their use in perfunctory disregard for contemplative time. Higher education, by nature, depends on careful, constructive thought. When a university forcefully limits the opportunity for this thought, it actively degrades itself.

Think back to last semester when we had only one day to prepare for our all-important, make-or-break, do-or-die week of exams. This fall the tension, frustration, and ultimate feelings of futility will be magnified by the further decrease in studying time.

We are students. We are also consumers. And as consumers, we have the rights and power to affect what we are buying – an education. Rather than decrease the value of our investment by reducing its effectiveness, we should work to strengthen the product that we and our families sacrifice so much for.

President Coor feels that "we should examine how good an academic atmosphere we are providing." Included in this examination must be a close hard look at the opportunities that we students have to develop, and bring to fruition the intellectual pursuits we have chosen to follow. For, alas, we may never again have the good fortune to engage in these cerebral undertakings so freely.

Present

Where have we come to
From our going to
On our ride through
What is,
Is it
Out there with the stars
Way, way out
Can it be found Within the brain
Deep inside
Can it be uncovered in Thirsty for an answer or
Searching for a truth
No
That will never come
That will never be understood
That cannot be grasped, interpreted, or found
For
Matter will be anti-matter
Forever
Continuing on
Lost from time or place in space
Always that which They are
Undiscovered mysteries of mind
Hidden treasures of the soul
Gold on gold upon gold
Riches
From that which wasn't given
Humans
Trying to cope and comprehend
Trying to keep on with their ways
No compass to keep track of their path
That lonely path
As its known
Is just life
Right here and now, maybe somewhere else
Accept it simply
Life was there before man
Knowledge stored another
Time and place in space
Surrounded by the spirit
With its infinite ways and just always are powers
Because
Nothing was ever simple
It was also caught up in time
It also had meaning
It hustled and bustled, had chaos disorder and logic
So
Continue down the road
The endless road
The eternal road
The invisible road
Forever.

Sanders' Hottest Summer

By Jonathan Goodspeed and Kenneth Jaffe

Anything different is sometimes very scary. For a freshman, entering college is scary, maybe even downright frightening. Remember?

In that same vein, there's been a whole lot of anger and a bit of fear here in the "People's Republic" of Burlington since the Bernie Sanders difference hit town. It's a big change here, much different from native Gordon Paquette and his Victorian cronies, who left ideology to the philosophers and business to money man Antonio Pomerleau. Yes, in this New England city, where business is growing and dollars are ready for the making, Socialist mayor "Bernie" Sanders – the one who speaks of the terrible power of the "elite" and the need for "community," and who wails on those who make Burlington's money – has caused quite a bit of shaking to go on, angry and otherwise.

This summer was very hot for the new mayor. He has had to struggle with Burlington's business biggies and with the Board of Aldermen. Last Spring Alderwoman Joyce Desautels was quoted in Rolling Stone magazine as saying she would "resort to 'street fighter' tactics to keep the new mayor in line."

This summer Sanders took the Board of Aldermen to court when they refused to ratify several appointments. He lost the case. Very hot indeed.

An editorial in the Burlington Free Press this past summer said "The aldermen seemed to be more preoccupied with Sanders' ideology – and all the frightening visions that are conjured up in the name of Socialism – than in seeing to the welfare of the city." Hotter.

Sanders must be used to this kind of struggle. He's been doing it for years, with very little success. He ran for Senate twice, in 1971 and 1974 (under the Liberty Union Party), and ran for Governor twice, in 1972 and 1974. He lost all four races.

But last April 6th, Sanders stunned ten year Mayor Gordon Paquette, defeating him by 10 votes. Since then, Sanders has been attempting not only to run a small city, but considering the times we are in, to run it in a very unusual fashion.

What it all boils down to is this: Sanders is attempting to reach the people of Burlington and get them involved directly, not so much through legislative measures, but primarily through his various "task forces."

"There's only so much we can do," Sanders said. "It's distressing. We would like to raise the standard of living in Burlington, but given our powers, it won't be easy. What we can do is hold up a vision of what life could be like in Burlington, in Vermont and in the U.S."

Sanders sees his vision in the Socialist philosophies of men like labor leader Eugene Debs, who Sanders said had a strong belief in democracy. "I am trying to instill a sense of community... cooperation instead of competition," and one means to this end, Sanders feels, lie with the various task forces he has created.

"People are at the heart of the community," said Doreen Kraft, recent organizer of anti-draft registration efforts in Burlington, who is the head of the Arts Task Force, "and that's who we are trying to affect." This is the goal of the task forces concerning youth, women and the elderly.

Kraft said that since little money is coming into Vermont, due to the Reagan cutbacks, "communities must turn inward. We must use what the state or city has available." This includes artists who want to volunteer their own skills and supplies, or towns which donate unused land where artists have room to perform – in fact, anyone who is interested in supporting the arts in their community. Battery Park is an example.

"The concerts at Battery Park," Kraft said, "consisted of nine weeks of Vermont performers. These performers worked for less than they usually make." Additional money came from Parks and Recreation, the Vermont Council on the Arts and many small businesses on Church Street. Money was also raised at an art auction at Hunt's.

These task forces, Kraft said, bring people who are not normally together, together. "Alienation is at an all-time high," she said. "Many people are sitting at home watching TV. This is disgusting. You're all by yourself. So it's TV versus small scale arts events. And this is radical – people getting together, to talk."

The programs for youth, women and the elderly are developing along the same lines. All are designed, said Sanders, "to develop a sense of purpose."

He cited the problems of youth as another example. "The system has really deprived youth of alternate ways in which life can be organized. They take to drugs and despair because their energies are being taxed – it's understandable. Societies don't have to be like this. There are other forms they can turn to."

What about all of Sanders' larger campaign promises – those concerning basic service delivery, taxes, the waterfront, the highway connectors and the housing problem? He says he is working on them. An associate of Sanders, architect David Sellers, is working with developer Pomerleau on the waterfront design. Economic meetings are held every two weeks (they are trying to obtain up to a million dollars from Housing and Urban Development for low and moderate income families, and a Cost Control Council has been set up to cut down on the cost of city government), and he has a constituent case worker for housing problems.

Yet many people are skeptical – and maybe a little scared. A two-page leaflet hostile to Sanders, with cartoons and fairy-tale-style prose, entitled the Burlington Flea Press, is regularly sent to the aldermen through city hall mail. It's not quite the objective newspaper one is used to. "Bern A. Sunder" is the "red" mayor wielding power in the "Queen City." It parodies many other politicians in Burlington, and it even delves into Sanders' relationship with a female friend. But Sanders has had more pressing worries.

On June 1 the Board of Aldermen voted to disapprove Sanders' appointments to City Hall, and voted to keep those employees who had worked under Paquette. Sanders felt the Board did not evaluate his appointees in "good faith," so on June 22 he brought a complaint to court against the Aldermen, and on July 23 filed an amended complaint against not only the Aldermen, but also against four Paquette appointees who had remained entrenched in their posts.

The case was dismissed on August 31. Judge James Morse, the presiding judge, wrote: "The standards by which the Board evaluate the Mayor's appointees are not articulated in the Charter but rest within the personal judgment and discretion of each member of the Board." Each alderman had the right to make his own decision.

Alderman Maurice Mahoney said he did "review the people's [Sanders' nominations] manuscripts for two days, and I did question their qualifications." Mahoney felt it was not Sanders' place to fire "hard workers" at City Hall just because a new Mayor was elected.

Mahoney also feels Sanders has not fulfilled many of his campaign promises. "He said he was going to ask for Pomerleau's resignation," Mahoney said, "and that he would do something about the connectors and the Lakeside Underpass. And he said he would take care of taxes."

"If he could just settle down and work with people," Mahoney said, "he would be much more effective."

"Alienation is at all-time high."

Hospital Redevelopment Project Near Approval

By Jon Goodspeed

Construction on the Redevelopment Project at the Medical Center Hospital of Vermont could begin April 1, 1982 if the application for the project is not appealed by the Friends of Health Care.

The project calls for renovations in the existing Mary Fletcher and DeGoesbriand Units, both of which are on campus, and the construction of a new wing and a multi-level parking garage at the Mary Fletcher Unit, all at a cost of $49.3 million.

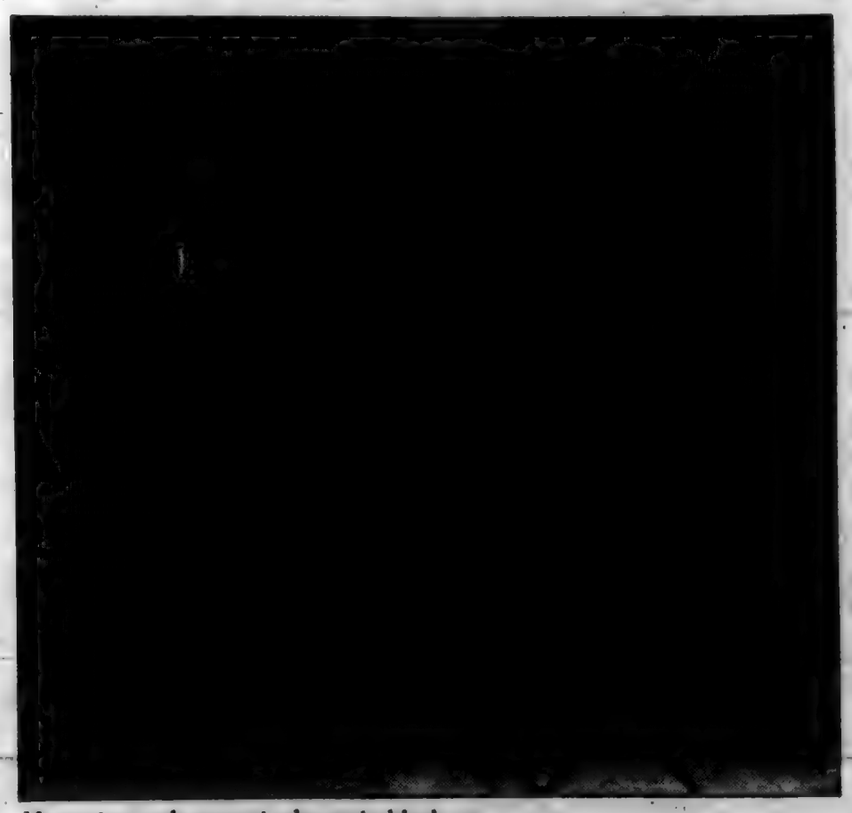
The only thing stopping the go-ahead on the project is a possible appeal by the Friends of Health Care, an interest group opposed to the project. The Vermont Health Policy Corp. and the Health Commission have approved the project.

The Friends of Health Care, headed by former Vermont governor Philip Hoff, believe the money should be spent on programs which more directly affect the people of the community, such as alcohol and drug rehabilitation, neighborhood clinics, and even low income housing.

But if the Redevelopment Project did not exist, said Beverly Rutherford, hospital Public Relations specialist, "then the funds would not exist." The project will largely be funded through the sale of tax-exempt bonds. If the project is not undertaken, the bonds will not be sold.

On April 24, 1980 the Medical Center Hospital of Vermont Board of Trustees "voted to seek a Certificate of Need" for a redevelopment project totalling $64,000,000. After months of hearings and reviews concerning the cost, on July 9, 1981 the Trustees voted to amend their original application and reduce the total expense by 23 percent to $49,313,000.

The Friends of Health Care's decision as to whether or not they will appeal the project "should be made by September 21," said Rutherford.



On April 24, 1980, the Medical Center Hospital of Vermont Board of Trustees, after months of hearings and reviews concerning the cost, "voted to seek a Certificate of Need" for a redevelopment project totalling $64,000,000. On July 9, 1981 the Trustees voted to amend their original application and reduce the total expense by 23% to $49,313,000.

The project will include a two-story car garage with 300 parking spaces, and a new wing built on what is now the East parking lot of the Fletcher Unit.

The six-story wing will contain a new emergency department, a new Radiology Department, an expanded Cardiology Lab, a new Central Sterile Supply (which is currently scattered at five locations throughout both units), a consolidated Surgical Suite and a Medical Intensive Care unit. The two top stories will be 45-bed nursing floors.

Officials say the Redevelopment Project was formulated for several reasons: (1) the operating rooms are overcrowded in both units; (2) critical care units are located in three separate areas and they are inadequate to handle modern life-support equipment; (3) many patient rooms are not big enough to accommodate modern emergency equipment, and are too crowded to allow proper privacy; (4) Several hospital buildings are over 30 years old and do not meet safety codes for hospital construction; (5) there are few private rooms, therefore patients requiring isolation tie up several beds.

"The Project would consolidate all acute care services in the Mary Fletcher Unit." In addition, the new wing will house some of the most modern medical equipment.

Students Creating Experience

...I began to realize the true essence of education – to be in a relationship with my students...

Interviewed by Wendy Goodrich

"I went into the Peace Corps right after college. I wish I could say it was to save the world or do something great for humanity, but it wasn't. It was then 1966 and Vietnam was really reaching a peak, and the Peace Corps was a way out.

"The Peace Corps ended up being a great turning point in my life. I was a headmaster in a very small secondary school in Guyana, South Africa, and what I began to realize was the real essence of education – to be in a relationship with my students. And yes giving out information, but also learning, growing and changing myself.

"After the Peace Corps, I received a Masters in Public Health from Yale, worked for the Vt. State Department of Health, and was fired after two years for speaking out too much about issues that the Governor didn't agree with. I was politically very naive.

"My Photo Tells You What I Saw"

By Maggie Hayes

The "champ" paraphernalia is big business in Burlington now. Champ T-shirts and Champ chowder. Do they exist to remind us of a creature which lives only in someone's imagination? Several persons claim they have pictures of the Lake Champlain Monster. This could make "Champ" a little more than T-shirts and chowder.

The long search for the Lake Champlain Monster has become a serious and controversial matter for those who believe and those who question the existence of such a mysterious creature.

"Does Champ Exist?", a seminar held recently at Shelburne Farms, proved that a considerable interest and concern exists among the public as 150 people attended to hear theories and eyewitness accounts. Sponsored by various groups, most notably the Lake Champlain Committee, the seminar invited several scientific authorities to speak on the subject, as well as Sandra Mansi, the person who snapped the famous photograph of an unidentified creature in the lake.

"My photo tells you what I saw," claims Mansi, who is an ardent believer in the existence of Champ. Mansi took the photograph in July, 1977, but didn't tell anyone about the finding in order to avoid ridi-met Hal Woods, who is now the Director of the Center for Service Learning. At that time though it was a place called the Office of Volunteer Programs, which offered a University Year for Action. Because it so paralleled my Peace Corps experience, I was intrigued.

"A lot of changes have occurred over the nine years since I became involved here. Initially I thought that our job was to place students in agencies and let them have a nice experience. That was the basis of it, giving students the chance to participate in the world and make a contribution. Over the past ten years that this office has been in operation we've come up with some good models of how people can be supported, of how learning can be validated, and how agreements can be reached over what has been learned by faculty and students.

"The educational model we've developed over the years is very exciting. The seminar – a chance for students to step back from their experience; to see what they are learning, how they are growing, how they are changing and how, essentially, they are creating their learning experience.

"I think we have something very special at Center for Service Learning. I've travelled to other schools and have seen the other programs, and I've rarely seen the level of involvement, the level of special work that our students are doing in the community and the way they are integrating that work into their own learning process.

"The students in these programs that we are working with have to be very pro-active, they can't be passive and just wait for something to happen. I'm not saying that all students in the classroom are passive. I've seen many that are – I certainly was – sort of just waiting for the information to come to you. You take notes, you put it back cule. "I was terrified – my husband and I decided to call it a 2000 pound duck!" Mansi said.

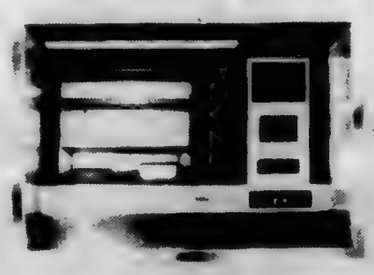
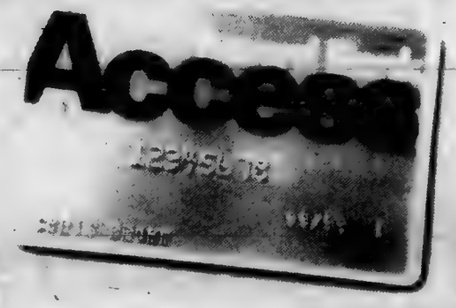
Later, Mansi was encouraged by Roy Kapler, a fellow worker, to send the photo to Dr. Philip Reines, professor of mass communication at the University of New York at Plattsburgh. Reines has long been interested in the possible existence of unknown water creatures. At the time, Mansi was a tinsmith working on the Trident submarine. Asked why she didn't opt to go on a working trip to Scotland where she could perhaps see the Loch Ness monster, she replied, "Don't go to Scotland, go to Lake Champlain!" She proceeded to tell of her experience and her photographic evidence became a piece of public controversy.



The controversy about the photo, according to Reines, is that Mansi cannot find the spot on the lake where she took the picture. In a conversation between Reines and Mansi, Mansi demanded "Tell me what I saw." Reines answered by insisting that the location must be found first. He later told the audience "That photograph is either the truth or a hoax," adding that it could give more clues to the mystery than any other available evidence.



Throughout the morning, other eyewitness accounts were presented, including a most on the exam, and then get evaluated on it.

"An internship or field experience that just doesn't work? The real world doesn't work that way. I see the internship program as a bridge between the academic world and the world outside.

"I believe strongly in the academic integrity of our programs at UVM, and of the classroom work that our students are involved in. I just think that learning can be enhanced tremendously when students see that what they are reading in a course can actually be applied.

"What it comes down to is that it's a business of making a personal meaning out of what people have been reading. A lot of my undergraduate work was devoid of any personal experience. I honestly think that each of us needs to make a personal meaning out of what we read or hear in a lecture or dialogue, and that we each do that in our own way.

"So the educational context here at Center for Service Learning is one of helping people make individual meanings. It's a matter of going out, trying it, coming back, looking at it, drawing theory to it, maybe changing your ideas, going out and trying it again. And that's all done in a supportive educational community.

"By supportive I don't mean just a group of students away richer from what I had learned from my students — their ideas and their work — then I wouldn't continue to do what I do. I see it as a reciprocal process.

"I'm not sure I can teach anybody anything. I'm good at creating environments where people can learn what they need to learn. I don't know how people feel about that, but that's just been my experience. I look at mentors in my life, people who were there with me during my learning experiences. They were people who cared about me and had the sense that I had intelligence. Rather than jumping on me when I made a mistake they turned it into a learning experience in itself, i.e. 'what could I learn from my mistakes?'

"That's why I love the context of UYA and our relationship with the students.

"Education is each individual's responsibility. Life is our own responsibility. Unfortunately, many learn that the answers are in a book or "out there" somewhere. One must reach the conclusion of — 'what does this all mean to me, what is its relationship to my life, how am I going to use this?

"Integration is very important for planning courses. We need more advising. You can't do academic advising in a vacuum, you have to deal with the whole person, with the whole student. The courses have to fit into who they see themselves as, and what their purpose sitting around saying nice things to people and agreeing with one another. What I do think — our UYA community in particular — is people respecting one another, their beliefs, values, and ideas. And, that they have a right to use them, and that people will listen to them.

"I think each of us is unique in how we learn best. Learning through experience and tying experience to theory is an important part of life. It may not work for everyone, but I think for most of the students that are interested in internships and field work it can be a powerful, powerful, learning experience.

"One of the things I hear from faculty is the students go out there and do their work and you give them credit for the work. That is not what we are talking about here. The credit comes from the learning that comes from the work, and the learning has to be documented and communicated clearly.

"I don't necessarily think experience based education has to happen outside the classroom either. I'm sure that other of my colleagues here at UVM want students to go out into the community and put theories into action, but I don't think they know how to do it, how to evaluate it.

"I still think some faculty are unsure because they aren't in charge all the time — they're not up there with all of the answers. As I began to get more involved with students who were out in the community making a contribution to people, making a difference, the myth that I knew it and they didn't was blown away. I have some skills and good information to share with the students, but if I'm not learning equally from the students, and each year coming for education is. If they aren't clear, that's fine too, but there has to be some integration of what they're doing with who they are. Education is understanding our uniqueness.

"We all need relationships and every student should feel that there is at least one faculty member with whom they have a personal relationship. One of the disadvantages of a school this big is that sometimes that's hard to do. One has to be willing to look, and put oneself out there.

"I honestly believe that we teach best by modeling, by putting out what we know is true for us and by being authentic and honest. It's hard to keep putting that out when other colleagues aren't supportive, but many are.

"One of the things I've learned more and more is that people do want to make a contribution to other people, they want to be in relationship with other people, and want to make a difference in the world. I hear a lot of "once I get my B.A., then I can make a contribution." My belief is that you've got plenty to do right now. Do what you need to do as a human being, in relationship to other human beings. Learn from that, grow, and make an impact.

"If each of us asks the question 'what can I do?' and then does it, we can really make a change in the world."

Admit it. There has to be a time in everyone's academic career when they have seriously thought about buying term papers, plagiarizing articles or copying someone else's answers in an exam.

Most of us would never actually do it, and of the few who do only a handful actually get caught. But for those few the price is high and the message is clear. UVM treats academic dishonesty very seriously. If one is caught and found guilty, two semesters of suspension follow. There is also a black mark on your college transcript that can be hard to explain to a graduate school admissions officer or job interviewer.

Laurel Ginter, the Student Activities business manager, has been a student representative on the University Hearing Panel for three years. She says that most of those students caught aren't even the serious offenders. They are usually the desperate students who in a moment of panic violate the academic honesty rules.

"Those people need help," not a year's suspension, she said. But she also said that the Committee on Academic Honesty does not take ignorance of the rules on the part of the student as an excuse either, even though she said that many of the students who are accused are not even aware that they were in deep trouble.

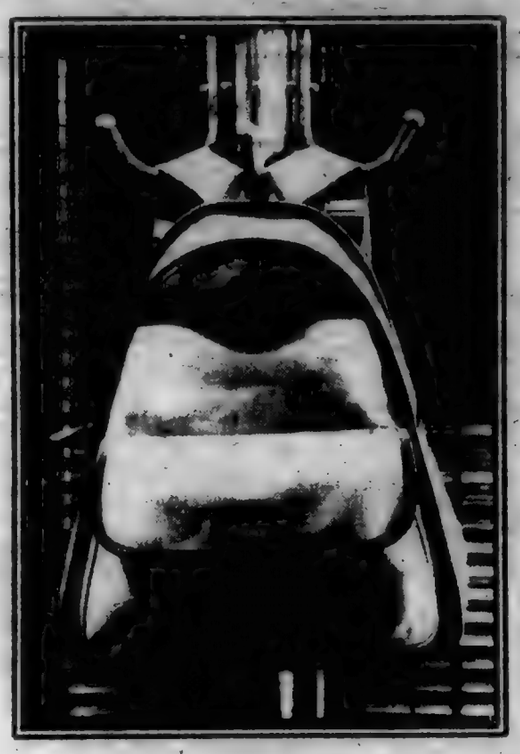
"One example I can think of was when a freshman with little paper-writing experience accidentally forgot to attribute some quotes in a paper he wrote. The guy had never had to write a serious paper in high school and never had to footnote before. He simply carried on this habit in his paper. The professor spotted what he viewed as formal plagiarization and the student was brought before the University Hearing Panel and suspended for a semester." Not all are that lucky, she said.

Dr. William Young, Associate Vice President of Academic Affairs, is the Administrative Coordinator for the hearing panel. He acts as a go-between for the student who is accused, the professor and the panel. He also determines whether or not the accusations contain enough evidence for the student to be brought before the panel. If there is, the student gets a waiver notice. By signing it, he pleads guilty. By not signing it, he requests a hearing.

The panel itself is made up of five people, three tenured faculty and two students chosen by the S.A. President. The accusing professor attends the hearing but only to answer questions. The student also attends, and the verdict is reached by a vote.

There are opportunities for the student to defend himself, including the use of character witnesses. A guilty verdict is only delivered if there is "substantial documented evidence" to show the student is guilty.

Dr. Julian Jaffe, professor of Pharmacology at UVM, served on the Hearing Panel for four years. He said he was very impressed with the approach the panel had.



"Even though it isn't a court of law, the proceedings were very professional. I used to talk to students after the hearings were over to ask them their opinion of how the case was handled. I never heard one student, even if he was found guilty, complain that the hearings were biased or that he was being railroaded," Jaffe said.

The chances of infraction of the rules are great. Ginter said many students aren't aware of just how picky the rules are. Just using an author's idea or paraphrasing a sentence counts as plagiarization, she said.

But the rules cover most areas of study in the university. Forging records, outright cheating, having people sit exams for you, getting on to another student's computer line and a host of other offenses are punishable by a year's suspension. The Cat's Tale outlines the various offenses in detail in the "Rights and Responsibilities" section.

As Dr. Young said in the 1981-82 Cat's Tale, "the purpose of academic honesty policy at UVM is to punish, in order to deter, acts of academic dishonesty so that the integrity of the University of Vermont as a learning institution is preserved and so that the moral norms of society are maintained."

recent sighting by Mary Carty, a Burlington photographer. On July 17, 1981 six people, besides Carty, saw the phenomenon. She held the 17 photos in sequence to prove their sighting. On film, she captured six humps with black circles breaking the surface at Shelburne Point. Before Carty arrived in the scene, the others saw a neck appear on the surface. "The creature moves at a steady rate and I had to run very fast to keep up with it on land," said Carty.

Eugene Viens of Colchester also spotted the elusive creature ten years ago. At first, he thought the disturbance was a school of fish, but when five black humps protruded from the water, he realized he was seeing something unusual. Both reports from Carty and Viens state that the creature moves straight ahead like a whale with an estimated length of 30 feet.

Joe Zarzynski, founder and head of Lake Champlain Phenomenon Investigation Group, which has been searching for Champ for seven years, has documented a total of 144 eyewitness accounts. The sightings go as far back as 1609, when Samuel de Champlain first noticed some type of "water beast." 109 sightings were reported through the 19th and 20th centuries.

Because of the considerable increase in the sightings of Champ, and more importantly, because of widespread sightings of similar phenomenon reported in Scotland, Wales, and Canada, Zarzynski feels it "warrants further investigation and encourages the search." The Phenomenon Investigation Group has been using technical equipment in the search, including the side-scan sonar to "bring credibility to the search." Zarzynski is disturbed by the mockery of Champ and hopes to legitimate its existence with the passing of a legislative resolution to protect the Lake Champlain Creature.

Dr. Reines, the authority who maintains that "objectivity is imperative" and admits that he must "play the devil's advocate," did present a convincing eyewitness account which was on tape. Sixty-one year old Elsie from Port Kent reported that she has seen such a creature many times, especially as a child when playing on a high bluff. Elsie saw a head and neck similar to the other accounts. She never reported it because she assumed that everyone else saw it. "I didn't know it was anything odd."

The second half of the seminar presented scientific evidence by several experts on Champ. J. Richard Greenwell, from the University of Arizona, has concluded that the Mansi photo is not a fraud. The photo underwent the technical process of computer enhancement. Greenwell also compared the 1934 Wilson photo of the Loch Ness Monster with the Mansi photo and found the head and neck shape to be extremely similar. This similarity, according to Greenwell, suggests that the two creatures are members of the same species.

Dr. Roy Mackal, a biologist at the University of Chicago, presented his hypothesis that these creatures, reported elsewhere in rivers and lakes of the Northern hemisphere, are actually mammals. Factors that support his theory include the reported vertical movement characteristic of mammals and a

Tuition Rise Could Explode Campus

Moscow, ID (CPS) – While tuition protests elsewhere have been as large as the tuition increases imposed for next year, at the University of Idaho some protesters threatened to blow up much of the campus if fees are raised.

Members of a group alternately calling itself the Socialist Action Coalition, the National Socialist Party Organization and the National Socialist Association phoned in bomb threats to area police and media in the early morning hours of April 27th.

The callers pledged to detonate five bombs on the campus unless the legislature and education officials agreed to maintain fees, academic programs, and student services at their current levels, to use funds earmarked for expanding the football stadium for academic programs, and to make faculty salaries "competitive" with other schools.

Though the calls and a letter detailing the demands didn't specify which buildings would be destroyed, the student radio station said one bomb was in the Student Union Building.

The building itself was closed for an hour while police searched it. They found no bombs. Moscow and Latah County officers searched other campus buildings through the week, but found no explosives.

The threats came just a month after the Board of Regents imposed a $100 fee increase for next year, and as the legislature debated charging tuition for the first time.

The state constitution prohibits tuition at state schools, but budget cutbacks in the wake of a Proposition 13-type tax relief measure have led to drastic fee increases in the last two years, and to legislative consideration of charging tuition.

Similar increases at schools across the country have sparked protests. The most violent have been at Cornell, where marches and a purposeful tangling of campus phone lines climaxed with a three-hour sit-in at the president's office.

Many on campus in Idaho now consider the threat there a hoax. Dick Beeson, UI assistant professor of sociology, suspects the person or persons who made the threats aren't "hard-core" revolutionaries.

"The ideas expressed (in the threats) reek with middle-class values," Beeson says. "A professional revolutionary wouldn't give a damn about the faculty."

Police currently have no suspects. "We had sent an original of the letter to our lab, but it takes three-to-six months to get any results back," says Lt. Dave Williams of the Moscow police department.

Terry Armstrong, executive assistant to the president, says typewriters are being checked all over campus to see if the letter was written on campus.

Diabetes Walk-A-Thon

There will be a 17-mile Walk-A-Thon for the Vermont Diabetes Association on Sunday, October 4th.

You can register and obtain sponsor sheets at the University Mall, Dorset St., South Burlington from September 14-15 days and evenings, and on the evening of the 18th of September.

Prizes will be awarded for the most money collected. Joggers welcome. Snacks provided.

Merit Scholarships Offered

Each year, beginning with the 1982-83 academic year, 10 awards of full in-state tuition will be offered to top graduating high school seniors in Vermont. The goal is to award two scholarships in each of the five districts in the State.

Finalists will receive early notification of their admission, guaranteed enrollment in their freshman course selections and preference in their freshman room choices.

The awards will cover all four years, or up to the conclusion of the baccalaureate, as long as an honors level grade point average is maintained.

To be eligible, applicants must be in the top 5 percent of their high school graduating class and have combined SAT scores of 1200 or better. Leadership in school and community involvement are considered along with academic excellence.

Applications to the Merit Scholarship Program are due, along with applications for admission, no later than November 1, 1981. For more information write Jeff Kaplan, Director, Admissions Office, UVM.

Handicapped Parking Ready

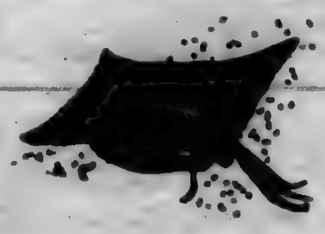
Parking spaces may be reserved for handicapped persons, including those handicapped persons not confined to a wheelchair, as close as possible to an entrance with steps, and near ground level, ramp or lift equipped building entrances.

Permanently or temporarily physically disabled persons can obtain permits for Handicapped Parking areas by first obtaining certification from the Student Health Center and then applying to the Security Services Traffic Division.

When the permit is issued, Security will establish the required spaces -- and additional spaces if necessary.

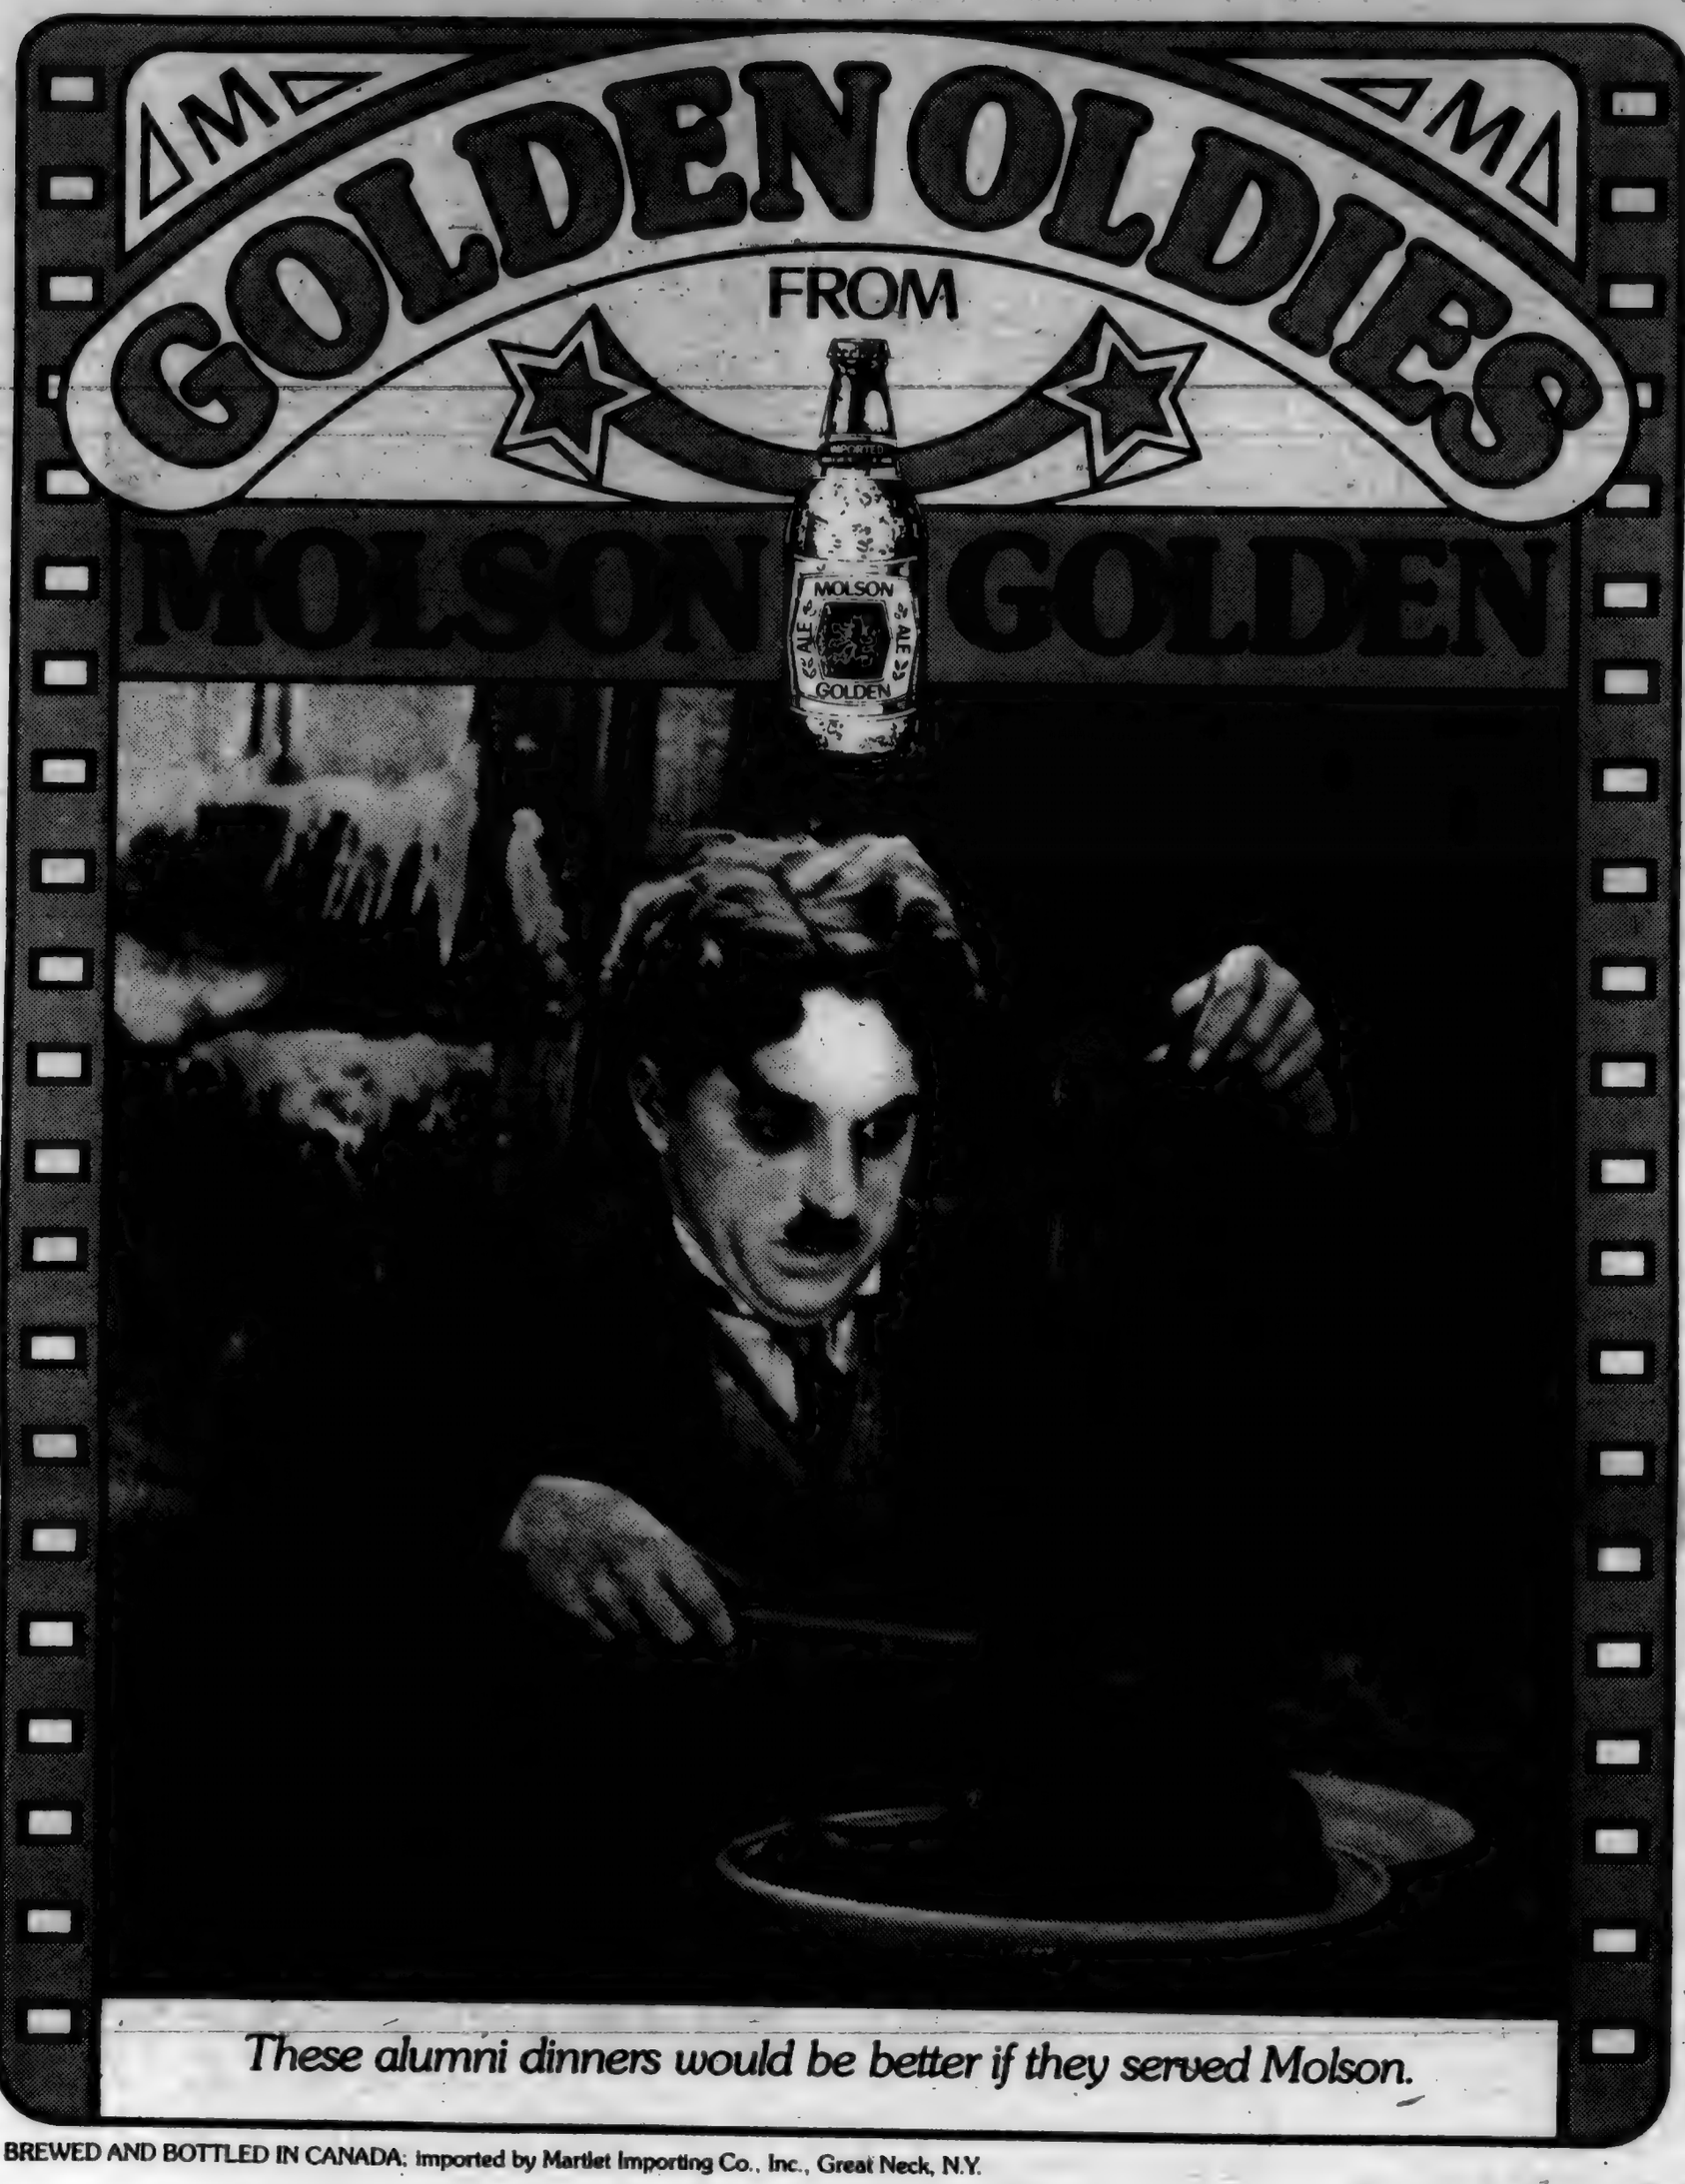
Disabled persons who require the services of a driver may be issued a moveable permit to be displayed in any vehicle being used to transport them.

Unauthorized use of a Handicapped Parking space could lead to a $25 and/or towing.



The cooperation of able-bodied persons will be appreciated. Even a few minutes of illegitimate use of such space can mean great inconvenience to disabled persons.

Phonathon Offers $1,000 Prize



The Third National Phonathon will take place in the Waterman Cafeteria from October 4th through October 29th. Thirty phones will be utilized on Sunday afternoons (2 p.m. – 5 p.m.) and Monday through Thursday evenings (6:30–9:30 p.m.). UVM student volunteers representing various campus organizations will be contacting alumni across the country in an attempt to solicit support for the UVM Fund.

Incentive awards of $1,000, $500, $400, $300, $250, $150, $75, and $50 will be awarded to the ten teams that solicit the most pledges in a single evening. Additionally, gift certificates and prizes will be awarded during each session of calling.

A "kickoff" reception for all volunteers is scheduled for September 28th from 4-6 p.m. For more information contact the UVM Fund Office at 656-3414.

few reports of a blow-hole similar to the whale.

The day ended with a panel discussion and questions between the experts and the audience. The seminar is hopefully the first of many events that will change people's attitude and encourage the protection of Champ, said Joe Zarzynski. Mansi admitted, "My biggest fear is that I have opened Pandora's box." She is referring to various dangers of mistreating Champ, including a $500 bounty offered by a Rutland man in June, 1981. "If it learned to co-exist with us, we must learn to co-exist with it," Mansi concluded.

Cornell Editors Threatened By Klan

Ithaca, NY (CPS) – Anonymous callers accused seven staff members of Cornell University's humor magazine, the Lunatic, of racism and threatened their safety after the magazine printed a mock advertisement depicting Ku Klux Klan members surrounding a flaming cross.

Two weeks after the ad appeared April 8th, all seven people received calls within a few hours of each other. Some warned of bombs or "broken necks," while other callers were "more reasonable," according to Lunatic editorial board member Adam Castro.

The timing of the threats led staff members to believe the callers "worked in connection with each other," he adds.

Castro says they were surprised by the reaction, noting the ad was meant to "compare the atrocities of Nazi Germany to the actions of the KKK."

The ad suggested Klan members who've "had a long hard day lynching niggers" should relax with a "Genocide Cream Ale, imported from Germany, of course."

The ad "was not meant to be taken at face value," Castro asserts.

The day after the staff received the warnings, Castro placed a letter in the Cornell Daily Sun inviting students to discuss the ad "rationally," but warned "we stand by what we print."

The staff did publicly apologize for the ad after two students "convincingly argued" the ad "stirred up anti-semitism in readers," even though it was meant "in sympathy for blacks."

Claiming the apology was a reaction to the students' arguments, not to the threats, Castro says, "We decided that because none of us were black, we couldn't understand blacks' situation." He added that the majority of Lunatic's staff members are Jewish, and that they'd originally drawn "many parallels between German genocide and the persecution of blacks." They later decided the situations were not actually comparable.

Student Association Seeks Common Ground

By Jonathan Goodspeed

When we go to an S.A. film, they ask us for our I.D.'s.
David Spector, Treasurer

The Student Association again foresees the inevitable — anonymity. Behind those large plate-glass windows above the North Lounge in Billings, those "unknown" persons will type and call and initiate and mediate. They are the executives of the Student Association. "We really don't care if people don't know who we are. If we can improve what's going on here at the University — that's the success."

When you walk into their office, you'll probably see a whirlwind of papers and people. Of memo's and talk. This is the home of the S.A. President Dave Stewart, Vice President Pat McCabe, and Treasurer David Spector. They are the top executives of this association, and they offered an explanation of what it was all about.

"I think we are here not to be just the voice of the students, but a common ground where students, if they want to try to change things, can do it here," said Stewart.

Their involvement with the students ranges from allocating money to all of the various clubs on campus, i.e., WRUV, the Cynic, the Outing Club, the frisbee club... to writing up the teacher evaluations, to holding a book exchange, to dealing directly with the UVM Administration.

"We are here to try to improve the quality of life here at the University," added Stewart. "The S.A. is a change maker — an instrument of change."

One of their major responsibilities is the allocation of money to the clubs. All clubs affiliated with the S.A. are given funds according to their individual budgets. Once that is done, "How they work and how they perceive themselves is their business," said Stewart.

Stewart also added that the S.A. cannot treat the Ultimate Frisbee club in the same manner they treat WRUV or the Outing Club, financially speaking.

"It's not that they aren't valid — they just don't have the same pressures," McCabe said. "If WRUV blows off a day, people will be upset."

But at this point in their term (they were elected last spring) they have more pressing worries concerning the clubs. "Because the S.A. has grown so large, and consequently has spread itself so thin, some of the groups like WRUV and the Cynic have not had anyone there to help them," Stewart said. "They begin to see themselves as totally separate. The only time the S.A. came to them was to say, look, you're overspending."

So there has been some bad relations.

To patch things up they want to restore those relations. "We want to make it better for the students next year. To do this we plan to set up better internal communications between the S.A. and the clubs," Stewart said.

Could the clubs get along without the Student Association? "I believe the groups could run themselves monetarily, but if they divorce themselves from the University," Stewart said, "they divorce themselves from a lot of the support services the University provides." For instance, if students had an accident on the lake in an Outing Club kayak, they wouldn't have the benefits of University insurance if the club wasn't associated with the university.

Because "90 percent of the students don't know who or what the S.A. is," sighed Stewart, here is a brief outline of its structure.

On the executive staff are the four mentioned above, plus Assistant Treasurer Rich Dana. These four usually chair General Assemblies. This is the key to the Student Association.

The General Assembly is where the student body can discuss any matters which the executive committee has brought up, or they can introduce their own issue. This is the link between the students and the executives. Besides the use of opinion polls, the General Assembly is where the S.A. finds out what is on the students' minds.

Another large part of the S.A. is the Senate. The Senate is composed of 39 students – the senators – with 21 members elected from on-campus and 18 from off-campus. The on-campus figure is higher because the student population is higher on campus.

The Senate is divided into six committees, including the Finance Committee, the Academic Affairs Committee, and the Student Action Committee. Any research, task or problem-solving is done in committee. Their findings are brought to the full Senate, which meets every other week. The next step for any problem or activity is the General Assembly, which meets three times each semester.

Get a new slant on math.

"The Texas Instruments new TI-40 and TI-55-II calculators have angled displays for easy-to-see-answers."

The slanted display makes these calculators easier to use at arm's length–and that's just the beginning. The economical TI-40, with built-in functions like trig, stat, logs, roots, reciprocals and more, will help you through math and science courses–especially since it comes with the informative book, Understanding Calculator Math.

The book explains how to use the TI-40 to work through, and understand, common problems.

If you're an advanced math or science major, you'll be more interested in the TI-55-II, which comes with the Calculator Decision-Making Sourcebook. The TI-55-II features 56-step programmability, multiple memories, scientific and statistical operations, conversion factors and much more–a total of 112 functions.

An extremely powerful calculator, at an excellent price. Both calculators have LCD displays, long battery life and fit right in your pocket.

UVM 9 Second in ECAC's

By Harry Eastman

While most UVM students were still recovering from final exams (and the ensuing parties) last spring, the University of Vermont baseball team proved that it was a force to be contended with in New England Collegiate baseball.

UVM eliminated the University of Connecticut in the 1981 ECAC New England Regional playoffs. The Cats beat the Huskies by the scores of 11-7 and 6-4 in the double elimination tournament. Going into the final day of the playoffs the Cats had a 2-1 record with the only loss coming at the hands of the powerful University of Maine team, 7-2. Maine had yet to lose in the playoffs and sported a perfect 3-0 record. UVM jumped out to an early lead, but could not hang on as the Bears came back to take a 12-8 verdict. Maine by virtue of their victory advanced to the 1981 Division I National World Series, where they were eventually eliminated.

The Catamounts finished with a 22-15 record including that impressive second place finish in the ECAC's. The team is coached by Jack Leggett, who has guided them since baseball was reinstated as a varsity sport in 1978.

UVM will be losing some notable players from last year's team: outfielders Jim Farrell, Bill Currier, and T. J. Valley; infielders Mike Pash and Jeff Greene; and pitcher Chip Ziegler. Currier and Greene turned professional and played this summer in the Philadelphia Phillies' and the Los Angeles Dodgers' organizations respectively. Coach Leggett will have some top players returning: designated hitter-pitcher Kirk McCaskill, who posted three victories on the mound and led the team with a .375 batting average; catcher Dan Gasparino, who was selected as the team's most valuable player, and smooth-fielding shortstop Eddie Sheehan, who was only a freshman last year.

Daddy told me I deserve only the best.

That's why I had to dump Teddy when he didn't get into Law School—it was so embarrassing. Well, anyway, Daddy's coming up to visit this weekend and he asked me if there was anything I needed—I love it when he asks me that. "Well, Daddy," I said, "maybe we should retire my old turntable. We could take a trip to Audio Den and pick up a Yamaha P450...

UVM Golf:

By Mark J. Cadigan

The UVM Golf Team is a rough diamond. Some careful polishing is all that's necessary for its brilliance to come alive.

I talked with Ken Rachlis, last year's Rookie of the Year, about the team and he said that last year was "a disappointing season... I'll be frank about it." His view of the fall lineup is considerably more optimistic: "I think this is going to be an excellent season. We've got three seniors – Captain Mike Dukette, Pete Kelley, and myself – and a number of good underclassmen, Dave Graves, Joe Phillips, Mark Comolli, and Dave Marshall, returning from last year."

Coach J. Edward Donnelly has been working with UVM's golfers for thirty years. In fact, he's the only Golf coach the university has ever had. "He's a dedicated coach," said Ken.

Rachlis shows winning form

Cross Country Teams

Building Up

The men's and women's cross-country teams are gearing up for building seasons that may yield outstanding performances. Men's coach Edward Kusiak says: "We have a lot of talent and it's just a question of how much work they've put in over the summer."

The women's team, 13th in the nation last year, will be recovering from the loss of the number one and two runners in the East, Judi St. Hilaire and Leslie Bancroft. Coach Perry Bland says: "People are going to have to come through for us if we are going to be as good as last year."

Anne Schivone, Karen Bucke, Erika Thuro, and Lies Cote will strengthen the pack as returning runners. Bland is optimistic about the women's potential. "Anne looks to be winning some meets because only Judi and Leslie were beating her last year."

The women, after a 7 won, 3 lost season last year, hope to start with a win against St. Michael's and Johnson State on September 12.

Men's coach Kusiak expects a "young and inexperienced team" this year, but several strong returning runners brighten the prospect of improving last year's 4-4 season.

Steve Stebbins, last year's number one runner, returns after earning a fourth in the New England 10,000 meter championship. Captain Bill Harvey has "a tremendous amount of potential and is in great shape," says Kusiak. Sam Davis, Kelly Bartlett, and Brad Phelps, former 800 runners who have "made the commitment to distance," will use their natural speed to strengthen the team.

These "five consistently strong runners" will provide the core of the UVM pack. Kusiak expects good things from his new runners also. The men open their season on September 15 at Plattsburgh State.

Both cross country coaches invite runners interested in making a commitment to competitive running this season to contact them soon.

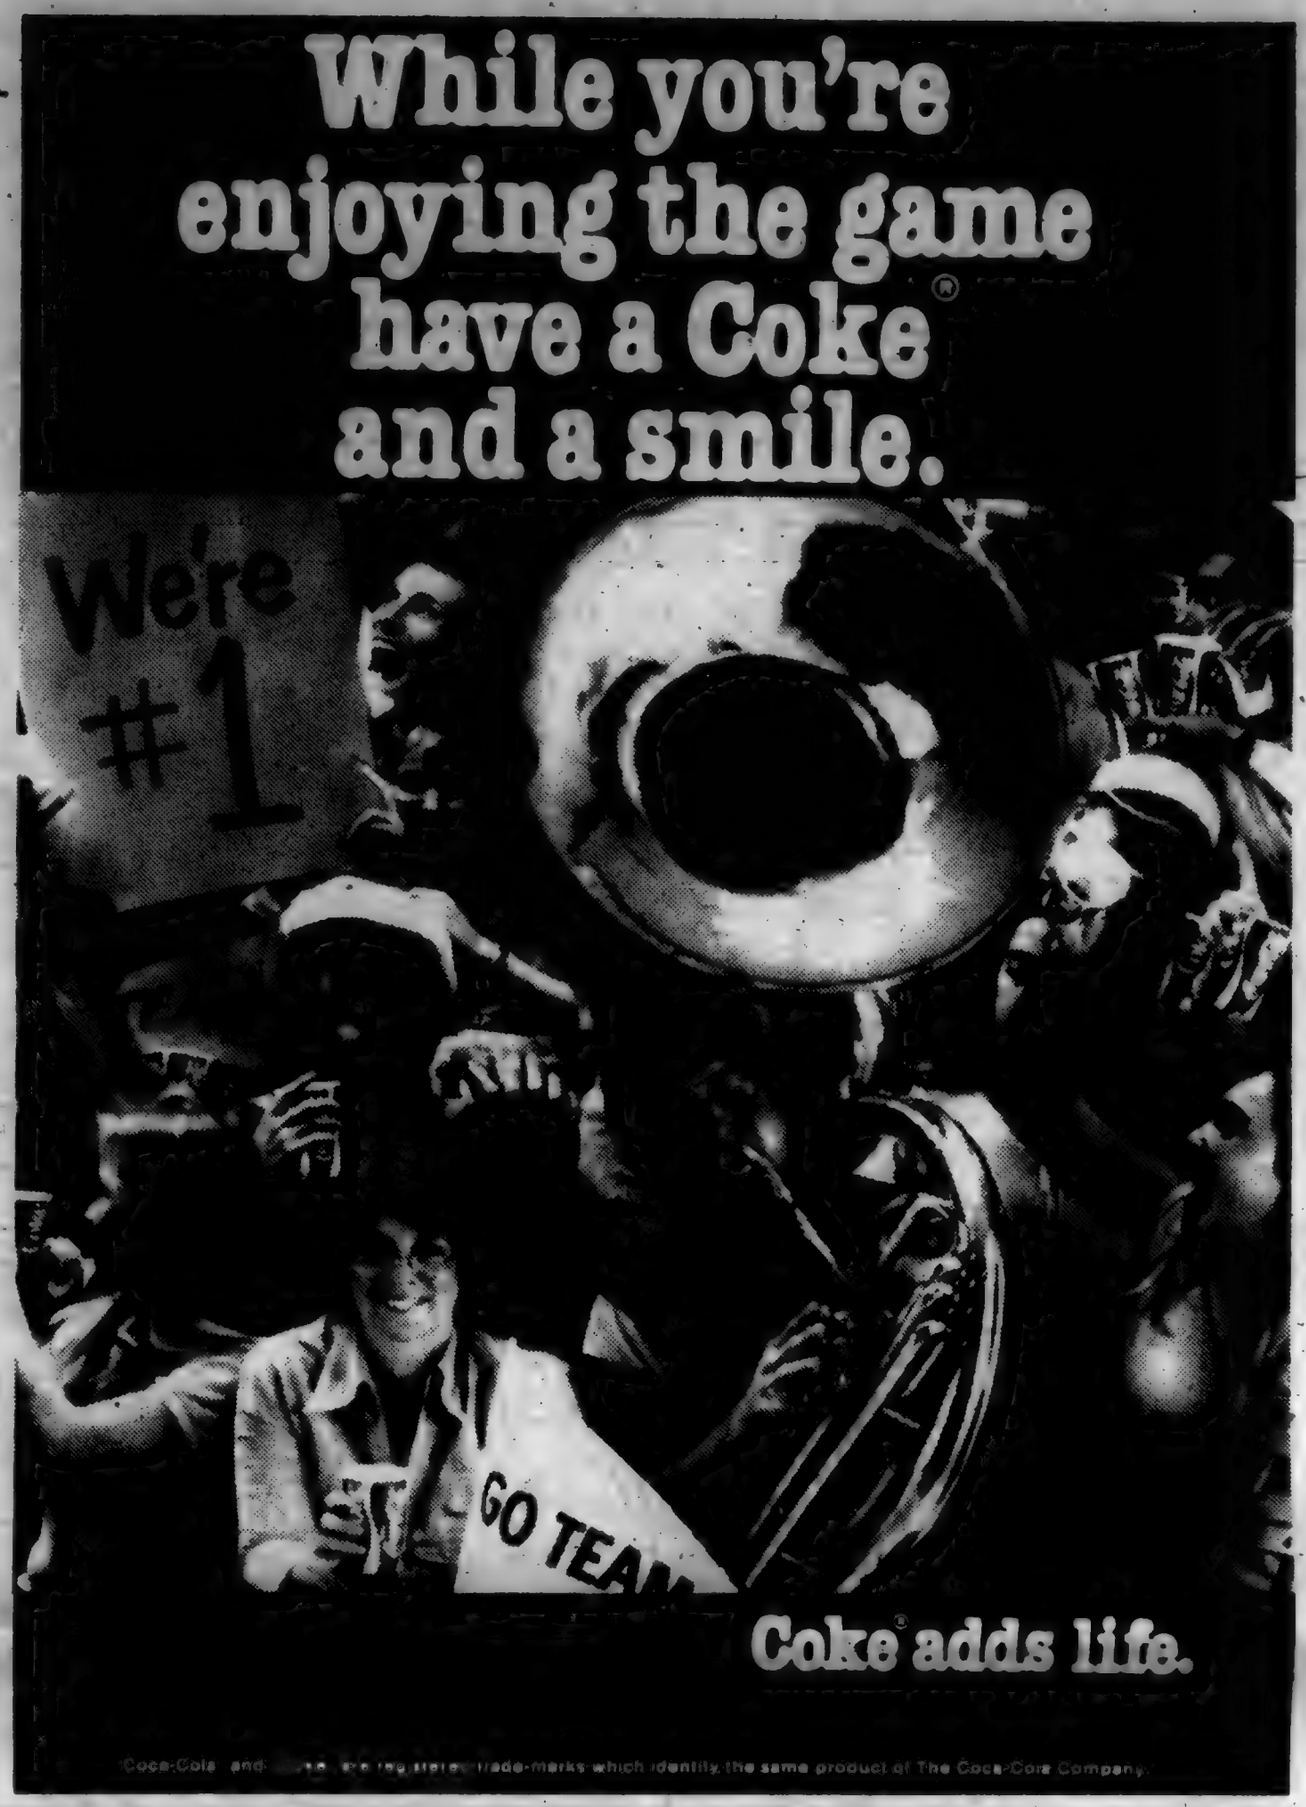
A Rough Diamond

"and I think he gets as much enjoyment out of it as we do. He shows up at the course (Burlington Country Club) every day to see who's there. He's a damn good organizer."

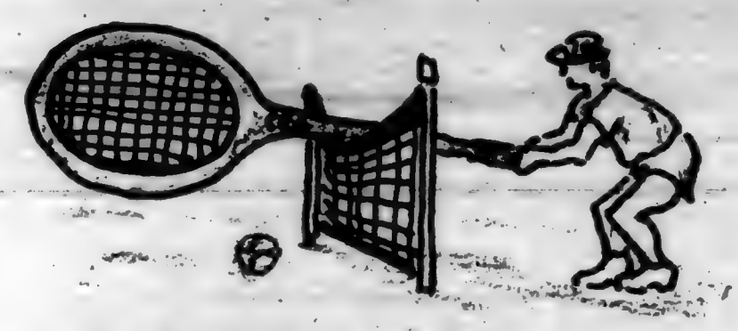
With Donnelly's guidance and a steady routine of practicing, the team should be able to accomplish most, if not all of its goals. "After seeing and playing with some of our toughest competitors," noted Rachlis, "I see no reason at all why we can't compete with and beat them. We're as good as any team in the ECAC (Eastern College Athletic Conference). We're tough... we've got five guys who can break eighty consistently and that's as good as it gets in the ECAC."

A number of small tournaments will prepare UVM's golfers for the New England Championships and the ECAC Championships, culminating with the ECAC finals at Lancaster, Pennsylvania. Rachlis calls the Lancaster course "one of the finest in the country."



Golf enthusiasts may wonder how to get on the team and have the chance to play on such classic courses. First you have to meet with the coach and set up a tryout with him. Then you should begin playing regularly at Burlington Country Club to prepare for tournament qualification. "It's totally up to you how much you want to practice," said Rachlis, "but if you want to be good, you have to practice a lot."

As far as his own training goes, Ken sets definite guidelines for himself. "I aim all summer towards peaking during September and October. In the summer, I work on my swing mechanics. Then, during Sept. and Oct., I work on scoring as best as possible with that swing."



In the off-season, Ken tones up for about an hour each day, with swinging a weighted club as his favorite exercise. He's quick to point out that you have to be healthy to play golf. "You look at the best golfers... Tom Watson, Gary Player... they're in great shape. It's pure endurance."

One of the recent additions to the golf team is the use of video machines. "We're looking forward to using video to analyze our swings, and we'd like to thank the UVM Video Department for that privilege," said Rachlis.

It looks like the rough diamond will be smooth and brilliant before long.

Catamount Tennis Faces Ambitious Schedule

Graphic by Caroline Arlen

By Harry Eastman

"We're facing our most ambitious schedule this fall," says Hal Grieg, coach of the University of Vermont men's tennis team, "and we have little time to prepare for our first match."

The Catamounts open their 1981 fall campaign September 13 against a University of Maine team, whom UVM squeaked past 5-4 last fall.

With the season opener less than a week after the first team practice, Coach Grieg sees team depth as a strength which will help the Cats weather the first week of the season. During that week they will play Albany State College at home, Army at West Point, and then travel to Rider College (Lawrenceville, New Jersey) for the ECAC Championships.

UVM will have several returning veterans: Bob McCredie (Jr.), Clark Wulff (Jr.), Mike Bonfigli (So.), Ken Wittels (So.), Chris Holmquest (Sr.), Kent Friedman (Sr.), Ed Bonfigli (Sr.), and Trip Ward (Jr.). The Cats will also have the services of transfer student Tony Scolaro (Tulane).

"Things will be very hectic at first, especially working on our doubles teams," says Coach Greig, "but most of our players will have a year more of experience which should be critical in the beginning.

Women's Soccer Team Optimistic

Special to the Cynic

The women's varsity soccer team looks in good position to have a successful season this year after a week of pre-season practice which started August 31st.

All starting players are returning except for one. Grace Emmert and Cathy Jamula are returning offensive threats. Three players, Heidi Comeau, Maddy Russell and Ellen Krimmel, who were all named to the All Regional Team last year, are returning and will anchor a strong defense with Debbie O'Connor.

UVM finished 5th in New England last season behind UConn., UMass., Brown, and Harvard.

UVM will host a series of home games against Cortland State on September 20th at 11:00 a.m., Dartmouth College on October 1st at 3:00, UMass on October 3rd at 2:00, Middlebury on October 7th at 3:00, Boston College on October 12th at 3:00, and UNH on October 27th at 2:00.

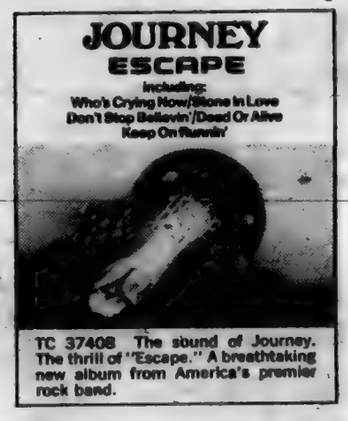
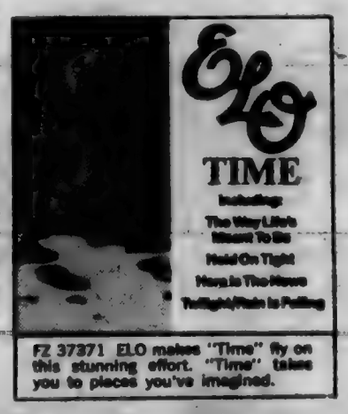
FC 37389 Where there's smoke, there's Blue Öyster Cult—and a new album loaded with enough hot licks to set the world on fire.



FC 36790 With the elegance, the subtlety and the same rhythmic excitement of his finest work, Miles is back after seven years of silence.

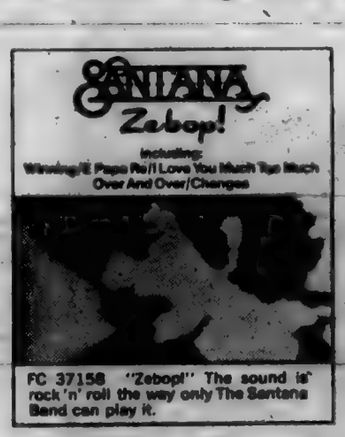
FC 37364 Original Aerosmith guitarist, Joe Perry, has got the "rock 'n' rolls" again. And naturally, it's extremely contagious.

FC 37099 The album that asks the question, "Should one man have this much power?!" A tenth anniversary blast from the premier power player!

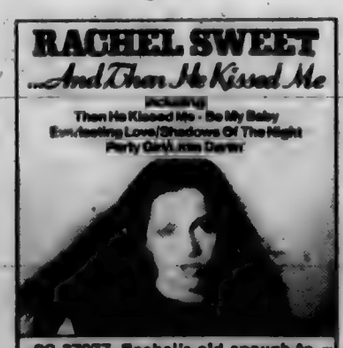


TC 37408 The sound of Journey. The thrill of "Escape." A breathtaking new album from America's premier rock band.

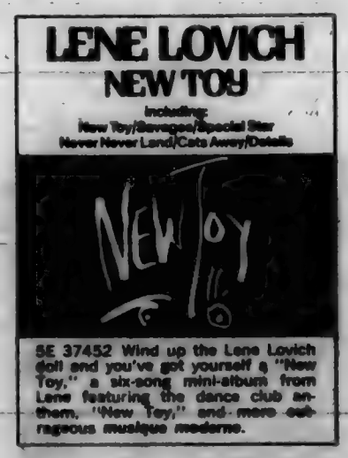
New albums in from Bob Dylan & Meatloaf & Dan Fogelburg.



FC 37152
Al Di Meola, John McLaughlin and Paco De Lucia take acoustic guitar to the third power on "Friday Night In San Francisco," a live recording of three of the best guitarists in a legendary collaboration.



Columbia



FZ 37371 ELO makes "Time" fly on this stunning effort. "Time" takes you to places you've imagined.

FC 37158 "Zebop!" The sound is rock 'n' roll the way only The Santana Band can play it.

RC 37077 Rachel's old enough to know better now, and she does. The proof is in this record. Featuring the smash duet with Rex Smith, "Everlasting Love."

SE 37452 Wind up the Lene Lovich doll and you've got yourself a "New Toy," a six-song mini-album from Lene featuring the dance club anthem, "New Toy," and more outrageous musique moderne.
